Mr. CALHOUN said he felt perfectly indifferent as to the fate of this motion. It was impossible for the proposed measure to pass at this time; and the only question was, whether it should be voted down at this incipient stage, or at some subsequent one, after it had assumed the form of a bill. The only difference was this: if it was rejected now, the further consumption of the time of the Senate would be saved; but, on the contrary, if leave was granted, two or three days more would be spent in discussion, when it would be rejected by a large majority. There were at all times many who, from courtesy or other motives, would vote for leave to introduce, but who were at the same time opposed to the measure. He had at one time intended to vote for leave himself, but as the Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who had taken the lead against the measure, had indicated his intention to vote against the motion, he would follow him as his leader on this occasion.

He had asserted that the measure could not succeed, on the ground that the objections to acting on the subject at this time were overwhelming. If there was no other, it was all sufficient that the duty on salt, under the compromise act, was going off as fast as the wants of the Treasury and the interests of commerce would permit. It is already reduced to about six or seven cents the bushel, and would be reduced the next three years to about two cents. In the mean time, the Treasury will need all its means to meet its engagements, and the interests of commerce would be injuriously affected to make the reduction more rapid than it will be. All changes in the rates of duties ought to be made gradually, even when it tended to lighten the burden.

Mr. C. said that he was far from thinking that the time already spent in the discussion of this motion was lost. It had made developments important to be known by those whom he represented, some of which were highly favorable to their future prosperity and quiet, and others of an opposite character. Of the former, he heard with pleasure the very sensible and manly remarks of the Senator from Maine nearest to him, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He took the true ground. He asked no protection for the great interest of navigation, in which his constituents are so vitally interested, and, he would add, the whole Union. All he wanted was fair play. Take off your protection on iron, on hemp, on salt beef and pork, and other oppressive duties, which bear down our navigation, and you may take off your bounties, was his manly language to the mover of this resolution; and he clearly showed that the great interest which he defended would be the gainer by the change. Mr. C. said, I will uphold him in a provision so perfectly reasonable and just, and, for one, will not assent that the bounties shall be repealed, whatever my opinion may be in the abstract as to their propriety, till the burden is removed. The same principle by which he was impelled to resist oppression, impelled him, with equal force, to uphold what is just and reasonable; and here we have a striking illustration of the great impropriety of acting on the tariff by separate and detached items, as is proposed on this occasion. It is almost the inevitable consequence of such a course, that, while one interest is benefited, another is oppressed. On this account, he was adverse to touching the subject till the whole system of duties was brought regularly under review, as it must be at the next, or the succeeding session, under the compromise act. In the mean time, he considered the great navigating interest of the country, which was so essential to the prosperity and defense of all others, among the most depressed at present. He was startled in looking over an able document from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the other House, just laid on our table, at the rapid encroachment of foreign navigation on our own. In 1826 the domestic stood to the foreign tonnage as 942,206 to 105,654; and in 1837 (the short space of ten or eleven years) they stood as 1,299,720 to 765,703. At this rate, the foreign will soon exceed our own tonnage in our own ports. This relative falling off claimed immediate and serious investigation, and the application of some efficient remedy. Without pretending to any particular knowledge of the subject, he did not doubt that one of the most powerful causes in producing this unfavorable result, was the expanded —no, that was not strong enough—the bloated state of our currency, which, by raising prices far beyond what they ought to be, was weighing so heavily on the prostrate energy of the country, and especially on all those branches of industry which, like navigation, had to compete abroad with nations that had a less expanded and a sounder currency. This he believed to be the main cause; and next to it he placed the oppressive protective duties, now fortunately going off under the compromise act, which so greatly enhanced the price of ship-building, the rigging, and supplying vessels, as well as the wages of seamen. Against this oppressive load our foreign navigation had no competition. It had to meet the competition of other nations on the broad ocean, weighed down with the enormous duties on iron, hemp, cordage, and almost every other article that entered into the construction, the rigging, and supply of vessels, without a particle of protection to lighten the burden, just as our great staple interest, the cotton, rice, and tobacco, had to meet the competition of all the world in the foreign markets with the like burden, without protection, or the probability of protection. And for what was this oppressive load laid on these, the great sources of national opulence and prosperity? To protect certain branches of industry, which were dignified with the name of home industry, against foreign competition—not on the broad ocean, not abroad in foreign markets, but at home, and at their own doors. We who had to go abroad and contend with all the world, were weighed down with an oppressive bond, that other branches should have a monopoly at home! And yet there are those, if we may judge from what we have heard in this discussion, who not only denounce the act by which this load is going off, but are ready to renew the protective system with all its injustice and oppression.

But against the voice of such he (Mr. C.) was happy to hear that of the Senator from Pennsylvania furthest from him, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] He took high and correct ground. He opposed this motion because it violated the compromise. That Senator has done no more than justice to that act. It terminated honorably and fairly, without the sacrifice of any interest, one of the most dangerous controversies that ever disturbed the Union, or endangered its existence—not the danger of a dissolution of the Union, as we learn from the Senator, was anticipated abroad. The danger lay in a different direction. Dissolution is not the only mode by which our Union may be destroyed. It is a Federal Union, a Union of sovereign States, and can be as effectually and much more easily destroyed by consolidation than by dissolution. He who knows the history of our race, and the working of the human breast, best understands the great and almost insuperable difficulties in the way of dissolution. There is scarcely an instance on record of any people, speaking the same language, and having the same Government and laws, that have ever dissolved their political connection through internal causes or struggles. He excluded, of course, colonies throwing off the control of the parent country, or a partition of kingdoms by monarchs. The constant struggle is to enlarge and not to divide; and there neither is, nor ever has been, the least danger that our Union would terminate in dissolution. But the danger on the opposite side is imminent, as was foreseen from the first by our wisest statesmen and most ardent patriots; and never was that danger more menacing than when the gallant and patriotic State he represented gave the blow that led to the compromise. That blow was not to destroy but to save the Union; not for disunion but against consolidation; and most effectual did it prove. It brought the protective system to the ground, never to rise again; that system which has brought such innumerable disasters on the country, and which had well nigh terminated our Union in consolidation, and, with it, the establishment of despotic power. At its very basis laid the assumption of a power, which, if it had been established, would have made this a Government of unlimited power, and, of course, a consolidated Government. It assumed that duties and taxes might be laid not only for revenue, for which purpose only the power was granted, but that they might be perverted to the purpose of encouraging one pursuit and discouraging another; that is, that the revenue power might be converted into a penal and rewarding power—the power of rewarding one class of industry and punishing another. Who does not see that the assumption of such a power, on the part of this Government, would give it unlimited control over all the pursuits and business of life, and the entire industry and prosperity of the country.

Acting on this false and dangerous assumption, the protective system had been introduced, and pushed to the most extravagant extent, under the act of 1828. Under its baleful influence, the great staple interest of the South, and that of the navigation of the East were paralyzed, while certain others were made to flourish. To effect this, millions on millions were taken from the people and poured into the public Treasury; where it constituted a vast fund for extravagance and unconstitutional expenditures, corrupting the community, and extending the power and patronage of the Government beyond the limits consistent with our free institutions. This vast patronage, concentrated in the hands of the Executive, had rendered that department all-powerful, and was thereby rapidly leading the way to the consolidation, not of the whole power of the Legislature in this Government, but the whole power of the Government in that department. It was against such a system, producing such consequences, that the blow was struck, bravely and magnanimously struck, that led to the compromise act, that this motion is intended to disturb. It was successful. It was directed at the root of the evil. It has stopped the excessive flow into the Treasury, and, followed up by the deposit act of 1836, it has emptied it of its corrupting mass. He saw clearly that reform, with an overflowing Treasury, was impossible, especially when that overflow consisted of bank notes. It was impossible to arrest a taste, or limit patronage, until the means which sustained them were exhausted. That great object is now effected; and retrenchment, economy, and reform must follow, or woe to those in power; and, when they gain the ascendancy, then will the blow which was dealt against consolidation, and for the Union and our free institutions, have effected the great and patriotic purpose intended by those who directed it, and of whom I shall ever be proud of having been one. The protective system, which has been the cause of all the mischief, has fallen prostrate before it in the dust. He who undertakes to revive its putrid carcass will perish in the attempt.

He (Mr. C.) was happy to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] avow his intention to carry out the compromise act to its full extent, and that he was prepared, on a readjustment of the duties under its provisions, to restrict them to revenue simply, as is provided by the act limiting the protection to manufactures to such incidental protection as was consistent with revenue, but in no case exceeding twenty per cent. to which the highest duties would be reduced in 1842. This was going back to the original principle which governed in the first imposition of duties on imports; and he was happy to hear the avowal coming from the quarter it did, and in which he trusted the Senator uttered the voice of the powerful State he represented. There were but two principles on which their readjustment could take place, unless the Government should have the madness of going back to the protective policy, which he did not apprehend. The one was that suggested by the Senator; and the other, that of bringing the whole duties to one uniform low average ad valorem, without any discrimination for or against any duty. It would be too soon to discuss the relative merits of the two at this time, and, in fact, he had not made up his mind. A review must soon take place; it cannot be postponed beyond one or two years, when it will be the proper time to examine their respective merits. In the mean time he was prepared to say that he would be ready to go into it with a liberal spirit and a disposition to do equal and exact justice to all, and to adopt that which, after a full examination, shall appear to be the best calculated to promote the interest and harmony of the whole.

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

REMARKS OF HON. F. THOMAS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 9, 1839,

On the Resolution providing for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Defalcations of Samuel Swartwout.

The question being on Mr. Wise's amendment that the committee be chosen by ballot—

Mr. THOMAS rose amidst loud cries for the question.

He said: I am not, Mr. Speaker, to be checked by rude calls from any quarter. I have unfeigned respect for the wish of a majority of this House, and believing that there is a desire to take the question before we adjourn, I shall compress my remarks within a very short space of time. But I have a right to be heard. When it is recollected the opponents of the Administration have consumed nearly all of the time which has been devoted to this debate, it is but reasonable that they should hear patiently and politely one of its friends.

In accordance with my promise to be brief, I shall omit everything I was about to say as to the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury and officers of his Department involved in this discussion. Whether they could, or could not, by the exercise of due diligence, have prevented the loss of much of the public money that has been embezzled, I will not now inquire. When all the facts, if there are any more material facts to be collected, are brought to light by the committee to be appointed, it will be time enough to examine how far these officers are culpable.

The first question now before us is that brought forward by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND.] He proposes, in this instance, to depart from the usual mode of appointing committees, and to elect the committee now to be chosen by ballot. After hearing the arguments which have been urged in support of this proposition, it is one that should not receive my vote, no matter what was the nature of the duties to be performed. Gentlemen complain that our presiding officer has placed upon some of the most important committees ordered by the House a majority of the friends of the Administration, and urge this circumstance as good cause for depriving the Speaker of the power to make the selection in this instance. This argument ought not, surely, to have an influence upon those by whom the Speaker was chosen. We voted for him because he was known to be friendly to the Administration. We expected that he would, in compliance with the uniform practice of those who had preceded him, place upon the most important committees a majority of the friends of the Administration. The dominant party in the House is responsible to the country for the public measures to be brought forward by the standing committees, and ought to have the power necessary to frame and fashion those measures before they are reported. This has been always conceded. It should be claimed now, unless, indeed, the friends of the Administration are willing to admit that they are not to be confided in, and that the superior patriotism of their opponents must be put in requisition. For one, for myself, and for my political associates here, I spurn indignantly all insinuations and imputations tending to such a conclusion. If the friends of the Administration have the majority in this House, they should claim and exercise the right, through the Speaker, to organize the important committees. If they are in a minority, produced by a combination of Conservatives and Whigs, they must submit, and will be relieved by the country from that responsibility to which they are now held, under the belief that they have control in this body.

Not content with denouncing, generally, the Speaker for the manner in which he has organized the committees, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has selected an instance to prove that these denunciations are merited. If the other cases which he has not adduced are like that particularly referred to, the gentleman has done, in my opinion, cruel, gross, monstrous injustice. The select committee on the subject of the public lands was to consist, according to the order of this House, of one member from each of the States. In executing this order, the Speaker had not unlimited discretion. He was required to select one member of the committee from each State. He was bound to suppose, too, that the House designed that the will of the several States should be respected in the selection of the member of the committee to which the States were to be respectively entitled. Take, then, these most obvious considerations into view, and it will be seen that gentlemen who complain that their peculiar opinions as to the manner in which the land fund is to be disposed of are not probably to be sanctioned by this select committee, are themselves in fault. If they had ordered a committee to be appointed generally, without imposing limitations upon the Speaker, he could have had reference to the supposed will of a majority of the House. But the movers in this matter thought proper to do otherwise. They have directed that the States, without regard to population, should be put upon an equal footing in the committee, and now complain because their own rule, when fairly worked out, does not show that a majority of the States and a majority of this House concur as to the mode in which the land fund shall be disposed of. In support of the premises upon which their reasoning is founded, I beg leave to advert to a few facts. The complaint against the Speaker is founded in the supposed fact that a majority of this land committee is hostile to the distribution among the several States of the money derived from the sales of the western lands. Could the Speaker, consistently with the order of the House, have produced a different result? There are ten States represented here having lands within their limits, and known to be hostile to the distribution. From each of these States, then, ten members of the committee were necessarily to be taken hostile to that plan. From New Hampshire the representation harmonizes in hostility to distribution, so that no sound objection can be urged to the selection of the gentleman who has been chosen to represent that State. The member of the committee selected for Georgia has submitted a plan of his own for disposing of the proceeds of the land sales; he is one of the majority of the delegation from that State, and I know no reason why the Speaker should suppose that he would not act in accordance with the wishes of those whom he in part represents. From Maine, the member of the committee coincides in opinion on this subject with the majority of his colleagues, and, I presume, will speak the sentiments of the party known to be in the ascendancy in that State. The member of the committee from Pennsylvania is one of the majority of the delegation from that State here, and is of the political party in the ascendancy at home, and could, therefore, without impropriety, be selected to represent the State. In addition to this, he was not here at the commencement of the session, to be placed on one of the standing committees, and this furnished good reason for the preference given him over his colleagues. Here, then, are fourteen members of this committee, being a majority, for whose selection an unprejudiced mind can find good and sufficient reasons, without imputing to the Speaker a desire to thwart a favorite measure of any one. It is not necessary, therefore, to review further this proceeding, to vindicate the Speaker from a most unjust attack. If it were necessary to do so, material could be found in the choice made of members of this committee from Virginia and Vermont. From the latter State a friend of the Administration has been overlooked, and the preference properly given to one of its opponents. And from Virginia a gentleman has been selected who is in the minority of the delegation from that State here, and who must be in the minority at home, unless the people of the State have changed their opinions, and are now in favor of distributing the money of the United States for purposes of education and internal improvements in the States. Although the last gentleman named may not accord in opinion with the sentiment of his State, yet, as there is reason to doubt upon that question, there can be no objection to his selection, as he, like the gentleman from Georgia, has a favorite plan, to be submitted to the committee of which they are members. These considerations were urged by me privately to the gentleman last referred to [Mr. ROBERTSON] in conversation, soon after this committee had been selected, when I had enjoyed no opportunity to learn the motives by which the presiding officer had been influenced. They were then, they are now, esteemed by me good reasons to remove unfounded suspicions, and to guard against ungenerous imputations. Besides, where do gentlemen get the extraordinary notion that this committee was to be composed of gentlemen, a majority of whom were to favor any particular measure? There is certainly nothing to be found in the proceedings of this House to justify such an opinion. To this committee the House has referred a communication from the Land Office, and varying projects offered to the House by different members. This being the case, there can be no pretext for the supposition that one plan for disposing of the proceeds of the lands was to have given to it a preference over another in the organization of the committee. It was the duty of the Speaker to place upon the committee members reflecting every variety of opinion which have been indicated in this House, as far as this could be done consistently with his obligation to choose one member from each State. And this he has done in a manner that ought, with all liberal men, to shield him from censure.

Finding nothing in these proceedings to destroy confidence in the Presiding Officer of the House, I must be permitted to express my regret that two gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND and Mr. MASON,] who were elected as friends of the Administration, and who represent districts supposed to be of the same creed, should separate from their former political associates upon this occasion. It cannot be contended that the committee to be appointed will have much to do in connection with any default that has occurred, except those of the collectors and attorney of New York. The resolution before us is very general in its terms, and has reference to all defalcations of public officers from the origin of our Government to the present moment. But then we all know that the extracts from the public records have furnished all the information expected to enable us to judge of the conduct of those public officers who are involved in those transactions. So far as the officers of the Government are concerned, we have no reason to expect that further information will be collected in the New York defaults. We have before us extracts from the public documents in these cases also, sufficient to decide upon the culpability and capability of the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates. What, then, is this committee to be especially appointed for? Not, sir, to afford an opportunity for a combination of Whigs and Conservatives to make a report against an independent Treasury. Not, sir, to get up by such means a book or treatise on our financial condition, to be distributed with a view to prejudice the public mind against the leading measures of the Administration. We have a right to suppose that this committee is to be organized for some practical purpose. We know that the collector at New York has embezzled a very large amount of public money. We desire to know where this money is, to see whether any portion, and what portion, of it can be recovered. These being the objects for which this committee is to be appointed, let us look to the facts of the case to determine upon the propriety of depriving the Administration of the advantage of having the investigation committed to a majority of its friends. The Administration is held responsible for the loss of this money; it ought, on that account, to have the means furnished to ascertain who has it, and how much of it can be recovered. The documents before us show that a very large proportion of the money embezzled by Swartwout, with whom Price is probably connected, was derived from collections said to be made from the merchants of New York in the first and second quarters of the year 1837. The question naturally arises, was all this money actually paid? Were there any compromises between the collector and the merchants, by which their bonds were discharged, by any means except by the actual payment of the whole amount of the money due? I know nothing of the merchants concerned. I know not whether there is one single man amongst them capable of collusion with the collector to deprive the Government of its just due. My respects for human nature forbids me to believe that there has not been a bona fide payment on the part of these merchants of every dollar due upon their bonds, as stated by Swartwout.

But, in ordering this examination, the House must proceed upon the supposition that all of the money for which Swartwout is in default has not been used by him alone. And in looking to ascertain whether others are concerned, it is most natural that we should turn our attention to those with whom we know the defaulter was intimate and had moneyed transactions to a large extent. Taking this view, then, of this matter, adverting to the point to which the investigations of the committee are naturally to be directed, I appeal to gentlemen on this floor who profess to be friendly to the Administration—I appeal especially to the gentlemen from Virginia, to whom I have already taken the liberty to address myself, and ask why should the usual mode of appointing committees be departed from? Why should the examination not be conducted by the friends of the Administration, to be held responsible for the loss of public property? I repeat, the conduct of the officers of the Treasury is not to be inquired into in connection with the New York defalcation. We have copies of the records from the Department exhibiting their connection with this transaction. Those extracts exhibit the whole case, except in that particular feature of it which directs the mind to those private citizens who may have had dealings with Swartwout. It cannot be pretended that the friends of the Administration in private life are most probably involved in this stupendous fraud, and, therefore, a majority of that party ought not to be chosen to prosecute this proposed scrutiny. The probabilities are all on the other side. Swartwout did not vote for the present Chief Magistrate. He has long cherished towards him feelings of decided hostility. He enjoyed, we all know, about the time most of this money was embezzled, the confidence of the Whig and Conservative merchants generally of New York. His intimate associations must have been chiefly with those political classes. Among them, then, I repeat, we should look for information to enable us to discover to whom and how this money has been disposed of. Without intending to intimate that any discoveries will be made—in fact, I believe little will be learned that we do not now know—I insist that the scrutinies of this committee must have a direction that justifies an adherence to the customary mode in its selection. But, if this mode is now to be departed from, let us not have a choice made in the dark. If one known to the public, responsible for his acts, is not to name this committee, then, sir, let us proceed in a way to know where, upon whom, the responsibility is to rest. Before I sit down, I shall propose to strike out the words “by ballot,” in the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, and insert in lieu of them the words “viva voce.” If this proposition should prevail, the public will be guarded against many evils which will be inevitable if the practice of electing committees by ballot shall ever prevail in this House.

Before I take my seat, I desire to comment briefly upon one or two topics introduced into this discussion. An attempt has been made to throw upon the present and the last Administrations responsibility for the defalcation of which I have been speaking. A few well-known facts will place that matter in its true position before the public. The present Chief Magistrate did not appoint Mr. Swartwout. He never had confidence in him. But gentlemen may say, why did he not remove him? Is there any one who will deny but that Mr. Van Buren would have been most ruthlessly denounced, if, upon coming into the Presidency, he had forthwith removed the collector of New York, who had been appointed in 1834, at the instance of the most respectable merchants of New York, and who enjoyed, in the spring of 1837, the entire confidence of the whole mercantile community where his duties were to be performed? If he had been removed under such circumstances, the President would have been lampooned and vilified from all quarters, by the Opposition, for having, as it would have been said, turned out a faithful and popular public officer, simply because he had not voted for the present Chief Magistrate at the election of 1836. But it will be said the Administration is to be censured for failing to discover these defalcations at an earlier day. To this charge I have not an opportunity now fully to respond. Whether there has been too much confidence placed in the late collector at New York by some of the officers of the Treasury Department, I will not now undertake to discuss. If gentlemen will examine the whole subject without prejudice, they will find that the legislative branch of the Government has much to answer for in the premises. Under the old deposit system, collectors and other public agents had too easy an access to the public money. To this conclusion the public mind is rapidly tending, and it is to be hoped that Congress will, before we adjourn, take care to throw new guards around the public treasure. That the laws are now such as to have afforded opportunities to the New York collector to escape detection, no matter how searching had been the examinations made into his transactions, can be shown without difficulty. But I shall not now go into that branch of the discussion. I shall content myself for the present by showing that Swartwout eluded the vigilance of distinguished men whose duty it was to examine into the matter, to whose capacity for high office, integrity, and patriotism, the whole Opposition in this House will cheerfully bear testimony. And when I have shown this, I shall claim that the denunciations uttered here, in the coarsest style, against the Administration, are revolting, from the grossness of their injustice.

In March, 1834, Mr. Swartwout was nominated for reappointment. At that time rumors were afloat prejudicial to his character as a public officer. He had, nevertheless, the recommendations of most of the respectable Whig merchants of the city of New York. The suspicions which had been excited found their way into the Senate Chamber before his nomination had been acted on. An investigation into their truth was had in that body. We have no means to decide with entire certainty who conducted that examination. We know, however, that it is the practice of the Senate, when in secret sessions, to refer nominations of collectors of customs to the Committee on Finance. We know that at that session of Congress, Mr. Webster, Mr. Tyler, Mr. Mangum, Mr. Ewing, and Mr. Wilkins, four opponents and only one friend of the Administration, composed the Finance Committee. To these gentlemen, then, we have authority for saying the Senate referred the nomination of Mr. Swartwout. It became their duty to inquire into the truth or falsehood of the suspicions afloat, that the nominee had accounted for all the public money received by him. That committee had access to all the laws and regulations of the Treasury, and to all the returns made by Swartwout to the Treasury Department, to which the officers of the Treasury had access, to enable them to detect defalcation. Notwithstanding, no defalcation was discovered, although it now appears that Swartwout's peculations commenced in 1830, and were, in 1834, when his nomination was confirmed by a Whig Senate, then very large in amount.* These things ought to teach gentlemen moderation and decency of language, when discoursing upon the conduct of those who have the laws to execute. They should teach more than that—they should lead us to suspect that there is fault in the laws, since a public defaulter could so effectually elude detection, notwithstanding his conduct was strictly inquired into; and we should set about correcting this evil at its source, by new guards to secure the public treasure.

Besides this, there are other things to be learned from the facts to which I have referred. The most unmeasured abuse has been heaped upon the present and last Administrations, and upon the whole party by which they were supported. We have listened day after day (said Mr. T) to the charge that the whole are corrupt. Sir, I must say that such a charge is a slander, no matter from what quarter it may come. And I know too, that my words will be responded to by the great mass of the people, of all political complexions. However men may differ as to the manner in which our Government shall be administered, they will not believe, they do not believe, that base motives influence any respectable portion of that immense mass composing the Administration and its supporters. But upon what evidence is this charge of general, universal corruption founded? A public officer here and there, it is discovered, has embezzled public money. To a liberal mind, to a man having some little confidence in the integrity of human nature, such occurrences would lead to the charge of negligence, inattention on the part of those whose duty it was to guard against defaults. But a different course is adopted, and bad motives are, in all cases, imputed. How are gentlemen to be circumstanced, if this rule were applied to them in the case of Swartwout? Under the last Administration he was appointed to office. He was not removed forthwith by the present Administration. And gentlemen, upon this state of the facts, say both these Administrations are corrupt. Well, sir, what then would be the condition of the Conservative and Whig parties? A Whig Senate committee examined into the conduct of Swartwout, as collector, and approved it in 1834. Whig merchants of New York, well acquainted with him, recommended him for appointment at the same period, and a Whig Senate confirmed it. In January, 1837, after this man had steeped himself in peculations, but before that was known to the public, he was a vice president of a Conservative meeting in New York, the proceedings of which I now hold in my hand. Vast numbers of copies of these proceedings were published at the time, and forwarded to their constituents by Whig and Conservative members of the House. In March, 1837, the same man presided at a meeting to nominate a candidate for mayor of New York, to be supported by the Conservatives, who were not ready openly to join the Opposition. In July, of the same year, he signed the celebrated letter to Mr. Tallmadge, approving his political course, and, in the same month, was chairman of a meeting of the friends of the credit system and opponents of an Independent Treasury, held at the National Hall, in the city of New York. In all these various capacities, for all these acts, Swartwout was applauded, countenanced, and encouraged, by the whole Opposition. He was their political associate. Nevertheless, he was then a defaulter. He had large amounts of the public money fraudulently in his possession, and used, doubtless, large sums of it to print and circulate the documents to which I have referred, to teach, in the language of them, sound public and private morals to the American people.

Finance. In this he afterwards discovered there was a mistake. Nominations of that character go to the Committee on Commerce, and not to the Committee on Finance. Messrs. Silsbee, King, of Alabama, Wright, Waggaman, and Sprague, composed the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, when the nomination of Swartwout for reappointment was made. These gentlemen, three of whom were Whigs, were imposed upon by Swartwout. They were led to believe that his accounts were correct, and his nomination was approved by them, and finally ratified unanimously by the Senate.

*It will be seen that Mr. THOMAS made the above remarks under an impression that nominations of the collectors of customs were uniformly, in secret session in the Senate, referred to the Committee on

These facts are not passed thus rapidly in review to wound the feelings of those who have been thus identified with a public defaulter. It is not in my nature to intimate that a whole party is corrupt because here and there one of its prominent members has proved himself to be unworthy of public or private confidence. These facts are adduced solely to make gentlemen feel the monstrous outrage upon every principle of justice and propriety which is so often committed here by gentlemen who continually charge with corruption a whole party without better cause than that now furnished by the case of Swartwout to denounce, in like coarse language, both the Conservative and Whig branches of the Opposition.

In conclusion, I have to say that I shall vote for the viva voce mode of voting in preference to that by ballot, and that I shall, in justice to the Administration, and to the Speaker, and for the purpose of insuring a proper prosecution of the investigation to be ordered, vote to have the committee in this case appointed in the customary mode, by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. T. then moved to amend the amendment to the resolution by striking out the words "by ballot," and inserting the words "viva voce."

On a later day, in the same debate, in reply to Messrs. MENEFEE, LEGARE, and HOFFMAN,

Mr. THOMAS said, he rose under pleasurable emotions. He had listened with gratification to the concluding remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN.] Amidst that torrent of obloquy and reproach flowing in from all quarters upon Swartwout, the gentleman from New York does not shrink from the discharge of a duty due to a former personal and political friendship. He tells the House and the country that the great defaulter has some redeeming qualities. This, doubtless, is true; for there is a "green spot" in the arid waste of the darkest human characters. No man thinks otherwise who is guided in his judgment of others by that golden rule, given with simplicity and clearness by the poet of Scotland. Burns says:

"Gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Though they may gang a kenin wrang,
To step aside is human."

But again, I say, why are the crimes of those who oppose the Administration to be palliated and mitigated in our discussions here, while the slightest errors of all who are its friends are seized hold of to furnish occasion for ruthless, reckless, and scandalous denunciation?

But, sir, under a momentary impulse, I am out of the course I have marked for myself.

Before I make a brief reply to the three gentlemen who have noticed my remarks made on this question, it is due to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MENEFEE,] and to myself, that I should ascertain whether I was correct in supposing that he did not intend, by his remarks on Wednesday last, to offer to me an indignity.

Mr. MENEFEE. I hope the gentleman does not wish to force me into an expression of my opinion of him, or of any other person.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the gentleman whether he intended, by his remarks or manner, to offer me an insult? To this question I am entitled to have an answer.

Mr. MENEFEE. Oh, certainly, certainly I will. I only intended to relieve myself from superhuman influences. As to offering the gentleman an affront, I have too much respect for myself in this place to offer an affront to any gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied with the explanation. I have but little to say, then, of the speech of the gentleman intended as an argument to influence the House. Instead of replying to what I did say, he avoided every little point there was in my remarks. Persisting as he did in imputing to me what I did not say, I have a right to suppose that he considered my positions impregnable. Seeing that the gentleman misunderstood me, I took the trouble to correct him. He insisted, notwithstanding, that I had admitted unqualifiedly the responsibility of the Administration for the loss of the public money purloined by Swartwout. Now if, in the course of the debate, I had used language capable of that construction, courtesy required of the gentleman to permit me to state my true meaning and intention, and he should then, if he could, have replied to what I did say.

Mr. MENEFEE. The gentleman from Maryland, three times over, declared the prima facie responsibility of this Administration. He declares that he did not mean to say so.

Mr. THOMAS. Fortunately, I have armed myself with authority upon this point that cannot be disputed. I took the precaution, on the evening of the day when I spoke before, to address a letter to the reporter for the National Intelligencer, (Mr. Stansbury,) asking him to send me his notes of my remarks. Those notes I now hold in my hand. They were taken at the time, without a view to an issue like this between the gentleman and myself. And in every instance in those notes, where I am made to speak of the responsibility of the Administration, I used the words as I have stated, "held responsible." In no instance does the reporter represent that I used the words imputed to me by the gentleman from Kentucky. This must surely settle the question, as to the accuracy of the recollection of the gentleman. And as the foundation upon which his speech mainly rested is thus destroyed, the superstructure must fall also.

Mr. MENEFEE. Will not the gentleman now say that the Administration is prima facie responsible for defaults of public officers?

Mr. THOMAS. Doubtless the Chief Magistrate is considered by the public, prima facie justly responsible for the loss of money intrusted to the custody of an officer appointed by him. But from this responsibility he is relieved as soon as it is shown that he used all reasonable precautions to guard against a default. In the case of Swartwout, I have contended that General Jackson is exculpated by the facts already known, and which have been so often referred to in this debate. We are not to suppose that he, or any other President, can guard effectually against all errors. The President has thousands and tens of thousands of public officers to appoint. From these officers official bonds are to be taken. It is the duty of the President to take care to place men in office having a good character, and to exact from them bondsmen known to be responsible.

In Swartwout's case, the securities on his bonds, it is conceded, were good; and I have shown that he was considered honest and capable by the merchants and others, of all parties in the midst of whom he lived. Having shown this, I contend that the responsibility to which the late President was to be held in the first instance is thrown off; and I have contended further, that the present Chief Magistrate cannot with propriety be called to account for omitting to remove Swartwout when he had no knowledge of his default; nor have we evidence to justify a harsh condemnation of the Secretary of the Treasury who confided in the integrity of a man who has deceived all who trusted him. This was the course of my former remarks. Instead of answering them, language has been imputed to me which was never used, and gentlemen have been demolishing the creations of their own imaginations.

To the notes upon which I have relied to correct one error, I have looked to see where the three gentlemen who have undertaken to reply to me [Messrs. MENEFEE, LEGARE, and HOFFMAN] derived authority for imputing to me a claim to be exempted from those infirmities which sway the judgments of us all. In these notes I can find not one word justifying this criticism. The reporter says that I declared I spurned the idea that I, or my party, had not full as much honesty as our opponents. Upon this solitary declaration these gentlemen cannot surely have founded this declamation about my pretensions to disinterested patriotism. To these fancy sketches of the gentlemen I do not feel called upon to reply.

Having shown, as I think, that nothing which I did say has been impugned by the gentleman from Kentucky, and that the personal allusions of the gentlemen named are without warrant, I will, in a few sentences, endeavor to dispose of the remarks of the two other gentlemen who have noticed my remarks.

I have here again to complain of misrepresentation, unintentional, without doubt. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] represents that I have declared that the Administration—meaning, I presume, the Executive—ought to have the appointment of the members of our committees. I made no such preposterous declaration. In confirmation of my recollection, I refer again to the notes of the reporters for the National Intelligencer. I contended, and now contend, that the friends of the Administration on this floor, if they have the power, ought to have the control in our principal committees. Gentlemen of the Opposition seek to make us responsible for everything done in this House. Every extravagant appropriation is charged to the Republican party; and yet the men who make the charge seek to deny to the same party the power to appoint the committees who are to mature and recommend the passage of the bills in pursuance of which the public money is to be expended. Against this injustice I have protested, and will protest; and in so doing, feel that I am justified by the proceedings of all parties who have had majorities in this body, and by the public opinion of the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina would have been correct, if he had imputed to me the declaration that the Administration, meaning the Executive, ought to have a majority in the committee of investigation about to be appointed. I believe that the public interests, as well as a sense of justice to the Executive, demands this at our hands. Need I recapitulate the reasons already assigned for this opinion? I contend that this investigation is one of a peculiar character. We cannot practically institute an inquiry at this short session into the operations and condition of all the various Departments of this Government. Whatever may be the language of any resolution we may adopt, I maintain that no one committee to be appointed can undertake to examine fully, in all their bearings, any other one of the defaults of public officers already known, if they first scrutinize, in all its ramifications, that stupendous fraud which has been committed at New York. It, on account of its magnitude, and other circumstances, has an importance that gives it a claim above all others to attention. Of that fraud, I have insisted that we have a right to suppose everything natural to the issue has been communicated that can be gathered from the public records here or at New York. In all the Departments there are men instigated by their political feelings to expose the misconduct of their official associates; and it is reasonable to suppose that they have, directly or indirectly, communicated all the facts to be found on the public records implicating any one of the public officers. The committee is not, then, as gentlemen suppose it to be, appointed to ferret out the misconduct of the public officers in the New York case. We have in that case the law and the facts before us to form an opinion; but we need further information as to the unofficial colleagues and associates, if there be any, of Swartwout; and I must believe, until the contrary appears, that they, if they exist at all, will be found, not in the ranks of the friends of the Administration, but in the political ranks where he has stood since 1836; and if so, the Opposition members of this House have no just cause to conclude that they, constituting a majority of this committee, would be more diligent or persevering than others in conducting the examinations required. On the contrary, they would be less apt than the occasion demands to doubt the infallibility of their own political friends; and it cannot be denied but that those who are politically identified with the Executive would most diligently strive to trace out and recover the money which Swartwout has embezzled, since they see that an effort has been made, and is to be made, to fix upon the Executive all the responsibility to be incurred, if no part of the money lost is restored to the public Treasury.

But, sir, whatever may be the views of gentlemen upon the point I have just examined, we ought all to concur in preferring that the election of the committee shall not be made by ballot. By proceeding in that mode, we may be involved in much difficulty. I presume that it is the purpose of the House to have all parties fairly represented in this committee. So much has been said about the partiality of the Speaker, that I will not suppose that the House are about to organize a committee less fairly than he has done. The Speaker has, in all cases, had all parties well represented on the important committees. How can we, if we proceed by ballot, foresee the result? We may have a committee composed entirely of members of one or the other party. One member of the House will not know who are balloted for by others; and it may happen that a majority of the House, desiring to have a fair committee, may have that wish frustrated by a few members acting in phalanx, while the great majority of us are acting without concert or previous consultation. If, on the contrary, we proceed to elect viva voce, each member will have an opportunity to see how others vote, and the House may select a committee entitled to the confidence of the country.

The gentleman from New York has thought proper to deliver a eulogy upon the merchants of the city of which he is a Representative. There did not appear to me to be any necessity for so doing. No one has undertaken to question the integrity of the great body of the merchants anywhere. There is no class of citizens who can have strict justice done to all who compose it, by eulogies or condemnations pronounced upon the whole mass. There are honest men and rogues to be found among farmers, manufacturers, or mechanics; and the gentleman must not consider me illiberal in supposing that there may be one, two, or even a half dozen black sheep in the flock of merchants whom he has praised in such handsome language. Notwithstanding all that has been said of them as a body, and I respond to most that has been said, it may appear that one or more of these merchants, whose bonds were delivered up by Swartwout, gave in exchange for them not money, but houses and lots, or fancy stocks, estimated at four times their intrinsic value.

I was about to dwell a moment upon the question, how far is the Secretary of the Treasury chargeable with negligence in failing to discover the defalcation of Swartwout at an early day. But I will not do so now. I will merely remark, that no candid man will deny but that the defective character of our laws afforded facilities to commit the plunder of which the late New York collector is guilty. He was authorized, under the law, to retain large amounts of public money in his hands, to pay the salaries of officers in the employment of the United States at New York, and to satisfy claims of merchants of various characters and of large amount, arising under our revenue laws. Besides, under the old deposit law, which is now extinct, the collector had placed to his own credit, in the deposit banks, all the money received from merchants in payment of duty bonds. This immense fund he could dispose of as he pleased, without having the previous consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

That this discretionary power ought not to have been given to any one man, we all now see and confess. But the law which conferred it did not emanate from the Executive Department. It was passed by Congress, and received the sanction of all parties here. And now, when the discretionary power which it gave to our collectors of the customs has been grossly abused by one of them, an attempt is made to heap upon the head of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, all that responsibility which should be shared, in some degree, by every public man who has aided to frame the system of laws regulating the Treasury Department. There is a sense of stern justice in the public mind, that will revolt at such a procedure. Again, I say, let us perfect the laws, and then, and not till then, arraign the chief executive officers for a failure to guard against all misconduct upon the part of those in employment under them.

DRY-DOCK AT PHILADELPHIA.

REMARKS OF HON. G. M. KEIM,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 11, 1839,

On the bill for erecting a Dry-Dock at New York.

The above-named bill, which Mr. PAYNTER had moved to amend so as to provide for a similar improvement at Philadelphia, being under consideration in the House as in the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. KEIM said he should trouble the committee but a short time, but could not allow this opportunity to pass by without briefly expressing his views on a proposition which had met with such decided, and, to him, unexpected, opposition. He could perceive a disposition to refuse the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. PAYNTER,] and deny that to Philadelphia which was proposed for New York. But if this was the intention, he trusted the bill itself would be rejected; for there had not been advanced a single reason in favor of one situation that did not with equal force apply to the other.

He would ask in what respect Philadelphia was less worthy than her sister city of the bounty and protection of the General Government? Is there less skill amongst her mechanics? It is too well known that she stands unrivaled for all that science can suggest, or ingenuity can achieve, in the art of ship-building. Will it be contended that materials are there procured at greater cost? Or on what possible ground can the committee have reported this bill, without being obnoxious to the charge of partiality? It is not for Philadelphia alone that this improvement is urged, but for the benefit of the whole Union. It is, as a national measure, essential to the welfare of the whole country, and connected closely with the protection of an extensive line of coast, otherwise entirely at the mercy of an invading enemy. In the midst of a war it is no time to incur the risk of sending ships to other distant ports for the purpose of completing them. What a reproach upon the patriotic feelings of our industrious working men, that they should witness a ship of the line lying in ordinary, because, forsooth, there is no facility for her completion. There is too much danger, not only from the elements themselves, but from the steamers of the enemy, to countenance the propriety of any ship of war quitting port without being prepared for battle.

Pennsylvania demands as a right the fullest protection to her commerce. That mighty Commonwealth, through an extensive system of internal improvement, and at an expense of more than $25,000,000, has concentrated her trade from the interior to her metropolis. The interest of nearly every section of the State finds a market at Philadelphia. And is it asking too much that it should find at least the assurance of safety at the hands of the General Government? The erection of dry-docks was one of Mr. Jefferson's earliest and most favored topics. In his message to Congress in 1802, he earnestly recommended the commencement of dry-docks in this District, capacious enough for twelve frigates of forty-four guns each. And when we reflect at the lapse of time that has occurred since then, it is impossible to withhold our admiration at the sagacity of that great statesman and philosopher. Thirty-six years have now elapsed, and although each succeeding Administration has urged similar objects, yet such is the apathy on the subject, that it betokens a great and culpable neglect somewhere. Shall it be said that we will only adopt measures when other nations have rejected them, or when the march of improvement shall have superseded their necessity? The necessity for dry-docks at every naval station is indisputable; nay, is conceded by the concurrent opinions of the Secretary of the Navy and Navy Commissioners. By them calculations have been made of the great expense and loss of time that occurs in repairing vessels below the water's edge, and the advantages of a dry-dock are very clearly set forth. The report of the committee also insists that every navy-yard should have a dock:

"The necessity for dry-docks being, then, well established, the inquiry will be, how many are requisite? And here starts the question, whether, to secure a proper efficiency in our naval construction, it is not necessary that every navy-yard should have a dock. One thing is clear and certain, and was well said, that in time of war vessels cannot be taken from the port where they are fitted, to another port, to be docked, without great risk of capture. Another suggestion is, that to secure a ship every advantage in sailing, her form should be kept to its original shape, and lest she might be strained, or receive bruises to her bottom, in sailing for another port, it is desirable she should be coppered at the yard where she was built. Again, it is suggested that no ship of any magnitude should be coppered on her ways, being liable to have her copper injured from launching. However careful carpenters and calkers may be, leaks are frequently left, which will discover themselves as soon as the ship is launched, and can then be substantially repaired as soon as she is got into dock. It would, moreover, probably be no more than an act of justice to the mechanics and ship-builders at each station, that the arrangement at each yard should be such as would enable them fully to complete the work before it went to sea. Under this view of this subject, it does appear to be a matter of importance, if not of essential necessity, that a dry-dock should be constructed at each of the navy-yards where vessels of a large class or size are built."

There are many objections from southern gentlemen as to the locating of these improvements, and many scruples entertained as to the expenditure to carry them on. It seemed to him (Mr. K.) that no measure could be more explicitly detailed under the provisions of the Constitution than this. The power "to provide and maintain a navy" is so explicit that "he who runs may read" and comprehend it; nor can any contend that a navy can be provided without means are dispensed for that purpose.

The policy of delay has been practiced too long for any good result. A few thousand dollars, promptly applied to the satisfaction of a few Indian claimants, might have saved the expenditure of twenty millions in the Florida war; a few dollars, promptly invested now, may save us incalculable sums, when the period returns which shall present a hostile fleet upon our coast. In all human calculation, the atmosphere of peace may soon be reddened with blood, and its dull portentous silence be disturbed by flashes of fire and the thunder of cannon.

It will then be too late to resort to any effort that will divert our physical energies from deeds of war to works of peace. In defense of the country a human hecatomb must assuage the neglect of a high duty, so often and so justly solicited from us.

He was sorry to hear his colleague [Mr. PETRIKEN] denounce these appropriations as not being Democratic, and had only now to say that he had yet to learn that true Democracy consisted in opposing measures having for their object the general defense of the country. He believed we were not only empowered by the Constitution, but that one of the great objects for which our Government was established was to render aid whenever required, to strengthen the line of coast defense, and so to protect it as to be prepared to meet the common enemy.

He was satisfied, without regard to sectional distinctions, whether of the North or the South, that all were alike entitled to ask aid for such purposes; and that all alike ought to be sustained. He discarded all sectional feeling, and had but one object in view, and that was, the general defense of the whole Union. The beautiful metaphor that, "from the South comes the whirlwind, and cold from the North," cannot apply in this debate. They were all here, or ought to be here, acting as freemen combined for the public good; they were not here for the purpose of representing sectional differences. Territory did not weigh an atom with him; it was the fitness of things, the adaptation of the site to the purpose for which it was designed, and the peculiar position of the country, no matter whether North or South, would alike find in him a friendly support. Let me tell you, sir, that we are behind the age in most of our preparations for war. Whilst it is said that other nations are already applying the steam-engine to their vessels, we have the merit of the first application of the principle, without a single evidence of its utility. There was no one opposed to expenditures more sincerely than himself—unnecessary or uncalled for expenditures—but experience had confirmed the maxim that "in peace prepare for war." Economy is, indeed, a virtue; but a proper discrimination between appropriations uncalled for by the country, and those which are essential to its safety and happiness, should ever guide the action of every patriot. For his part, he felt convinced that his constituents would never allow a rich harvest to be ruined for want of protection from the weather; nor would they, on the same principle, suffer the property of the country to be exposed to danger, without at least some effort to shelter it from an invading foe.

UNITED STATES BANK BONDS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN M. NILES, OF CONNECTICUT,

IN SENATE, January 5, 1839,

In reply to the remarks of Mr. RIVES, on the Resolution submitted by him calling on the President for additional information relative to the transactions between the Government and the Bank of the United States, growing out of the sales of the Bonds of said Bank.

Mr. NILES addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: If anything could surprise me, coming from a certain quarter, it would be the remarks of the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat, [Mr. RIVES:] and the same observation will apply with equal force to his speech the other day, on his first resolution of inquiry, to which the one now under consideration seems to be a sort of supplement. I have, however, long since ceased to be surprised at anything coming from those who can be satisfied with nothing as long as they are not permitted to have the direction of public affairs. What have we witnessed now, and on the occasion referred to? A Senator who, during the last two sessions, at least, was first and foremost, at all times and on all occasions, to denounce the Administration for a course of policy alleged to be hostile and ruinous to the banking institutions of the country, suddenly changes his position, and with equal boldness, and apparently with sincerity and confidence, charges the same Administration, still pursuing, as was generally supposed, the same general line of policy, with having formed an improper, suspicious, and dangerous connection with the banks—a connection which has restored the deposit system without law, and which will finally result in the establishment of a national bank, without the action of Congress.

The Administration is now assailed and denounced with a tone of asperity seldom surpassed, for having done precisely what we have heretofore so often been told by the Senator making the charge, and those with whom he now acts, it ought to do. It is condemned for an alleged course of policy friendly to the present Bank of the United States and other State banks, by the same men by whom it has been so long and so often denounced for hostility to banks and the credit system.

Sir, how is this strange movement on the political boards to be explained? I shall endeavor to demonstrate, before I have done, that there has been no change in the general policy of the Administration on this subject. But if there had been, that would be no explanation. If it was right one year ago to conduct the financial concerns of the Government so as to favor the banks, it is proper now. Will gentlemen urge certain measures on the Administration, and then condemn it for adopting those very measures? If what is now alleged against the Secretary of the Treasury was true, the Senator and his associates should be the last men in the country to condemn it. Can they blow hot and cold at the same breath, and censure a policy to-day that they themselves recommended yesterday? Were they sincere in charging the Administration with hostility to the banks last session? If so, how can they now turn round and denounce it, if what is alleged was true, for having revived the deposit system? The opponents of that system might, with propriety, complain; but with what propriety or consistency do censures come from its friends? Have the opponents of the Administration generally assumed a new position; or is this position one that belongs to the "armed neutrality" only? I am anxious for information on this subject, and think it somewhat important to the country to know whether the Government is to be assailed, as heretofore, on the ground of an alleged hostility to banks, to the credit system, to trade, commerce, manufactures, and the business of the country, or whether this ground is to be abandoned, and a new and directly opposite position to be assumed. We are told from two high sources that this ground is abandoned. Mr. Biddle, whose knowledge on this subject can hardly be doubted, says the controversy between the Government and his bank is at an end; that he has no longer anything to complain of; that the bank war is over, and that he now advocates all political power which the hostile policy of the Government had compelled him to assume. And the Senator from Virginia confirms this statement. He says, that not only is the war at an end, but that a treaty offensive and defensive has been entered into between the Government and the Bank of the United States. Future events will doubtless throw more light on this subject; but as the matter now stands, we are bound to consider that the Opposition have abandoned their old ground, and assumed a new position.

Taking this to be the fact, the next question is as to the cause of this new movement. Is it a change in the policy of the Administration? Certainly not, for there has been no change further than what a change of circumstances has occasioned. This he would endeavor to demonstrate. Mr. N. said: he would assign a cause, which he believed to be the true one, as he could discover no other. The clamor, which has been so long and successfully kept up, of hostility on the part of the Government towards the banks and credit, has answered its purpose; it has done all it could for the Opposition, at least for the present. It will no doubt be resumed after a while; but it is now rather stale, and has lost its influence. But it has worked well, and aided by the coöperation of the money power, has produced two panics, agitated the country prodigiously, and revolutionized several States. A considerable portion of the people believed this charge, so boldly made, so perseveringly insisted upon, and even some of the friends of the Administration were deceived, and thought its measures were, whether so designed or not, unfriendly to the moneyed institutions of the country. The suspension of the banks in May, 1837, gave somewhat a new aspect to this controversy, and the measures which that event rendered it necessary for the Government to adopt, gave additional force and effect to the clamors and denunciation against the Administration, which was held responsible for all the disorders of the currency and the general derangement and interruption of business. The additional interest which these circumstances gave to the subject, in connection with the discussions on this floor on the Independent Treasury bill, and other propositions relating to the finances, aroused a universal spirit of inquiry. The subject has been taken up by the public press, and has been thoroughly examined and discussed.

Not only have the views and measures of the two parties been extensively discussed, but the principles for which the friends of the Administration contended, have been partially brought into practical operation. We were not able to pass the Independent Treasury bill; yet we were able to resist the attempts to restore, by legislation, the connection between the revenues of the country and the banks, and to maintain that separation which their suspension of payment had occasioned. We were enabled to resist all attempts at interference on the part of Congress, to aid the banks either by the funds or the credit of the Government, leaving those institutions to recover upon their own resources, and the operations of the laws of trade. And above all, we were enabled to hold on to the true standard of value, the only safe and true "regulator" of the currency to sustain and hold up the credit of the Government, to the standard of gold and silver. The wisdom of these measures has been proved by their results. Their beneficial influence was soon perceived; sooner and more extensively than their most strenuous advocates anticipated. By sustaining the true specie standard, and in the transactions of the Treasury, receiving only specie or paper deemed equivalent, the credit of the Government was maintained, which operated to raise the credit of the sound banks to the same standard. The general result is known. The country recovered, in little more than one year, from the most severe shock and revulsion it ever experienced.

The banks in most of the States resumed specie payments; the currency was restored; the exchanges, in a great measure, regulated; commerce revived, and every kind of business became active and prosperous. If we compare the late period of the prostration of the currency and credit of the country with a similar period in our history, the rapidity with which we have recovered from the late revulsion will appear astonishing. Then the suspension lasted four years, and, in a large section of the Union, from six to ten years, with the assistance and regulating power of a National Bank. Other causes than those he had referred to, no doubt, had their influence; the resources of the country were greater now, and it possessed a vastly greater specie currency than it did in 1816. But our firmness in maintaining the true specie standard of value, and the practical separation of the revenue from the banks, must have exerted an important influence. If the Government is held responsible for the disorders of the currency, occasioned by overtrading, it must have some credit for its restoration, effected in part by its judicious policy. These results are before the country, and they have had their effect upon public sentiment. The discussions which have taken place here and elsewhere, have also had their influence. Both from argument and experience, much light has been shed on this important subject. The people have had an opportunity to judge whether the views of the friends of the Administration or its opponents were most correct. The result has been a reaction in the public mind, which is still going on all over the country. Many, who were deceived or enticed away, for a time, by the clamor against the Government, have discovered their error. The true causes of the derangement of the currency have become understood, and the injustice and absurdity of attempting to hold the Government responsible, has become apparent to all. This gross delusion can no longer be kept up.

The changes which are going on in public opinion, are too palpable to be mistaken. They are manifested in the tone of the public press, and more emphatically in the elections which have taken place.

These, sir, in my judgment, are the circumstances which have induced gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber to change their ground, and assume a new position. Having derived all the benefit they can from the agitation of the questions of the currency and finances, and perceiving a reaction taking place, they now wish to abandon the whole subject; to arrest the inquiry which is going on, and direct the public attention to some new ground of complaint, and raise an excitement about defaulters and extravagant expenditures. This is all natural enough, and perhaps perfectly fair in political warfare. But it is a little extraordinary that a position should be taken directly opposed to that so recently occupied, and the Administration be charged with forming a league, offensive and defensive, with the banks.

How do we now stand in the Senate? Why, the Opposition, after having for two years kept up a constant clamor about the hostility of the Government to the banks, have suddenly gone back and taken the old position they occupied in 1836, when I first took my seat on this floor. Then their daily tirades against the Administration were about the corrupt and dangerous connection between the Treasury and the deposit banks. The "pet banks" were the constant subject of remark and censure. This continued to be the case until the banks failed in 1837, with between twenty and thirty millions of the public treasure in their vaults. This event led both parties to change their positions. The Administration abandoned the deposit-bank system, and the Opposition immediately took it up. The merits of this movement depends on the consideration, which party had the best reasons for their course. The friends of the Administration abandoned the State-bank system because it had failed, and proved untrustworthy; and the Opposition, he supposed, embraced it for the same reason. And now, returning to their old position of 1836, they charge the Administration with renewing its connection with the banks, and forming a league with them for political purposes. In the present instance we shall not accommodate them by an exchange of positions. They may abandon theirs, but we shall not take it. We deny altogether the charge of a reunion of the Treasury with the banks. But if it was true, (Mr. N. said,) he would not go with it in that measure, either here or elsewhere. And, in saying this, he believed he spoke the sentiments of all on this side of the Senate. We do not go for the reunion, but for a more complete and effectual separation.

Having, Mr. President, made these introductory observations, I will proceed to notice some of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, and to examine some of the very extraordinary charges which he has made against the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President himself. I am aware, sir, that the gentleman's speech was not made for me, or with an expectation that I would reply to it; he is aiming at higher game; his envenomed shafts are aimed at the highest mark; they are intended to reach the President himself, through the sides of the Secretary of the Treasury; and he doubtless expected that the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. Wright,] would interpose his strong arm to ward off the blow; and I think it quite probable, that before this debate is ended, the Senator may have the honor of a broadside from that quarter. But, however this may be, inasmuch as the Senator has presented an issue between his speech made in advance of the report, and my remarks made after it was read, and has thrown out a sort of defiance, asserting, in an emphatic tone, that he would demonstrate that all the charges, inferences, and imputations in his first speech were fully and triumphantly established by the report, I felt called upon to meet the gentleman upon the issue he has tendered, and hope I shall be able to show that what I said the other day was strictly correct; that the report of the Secretary was not only a response to the Senator's resolution, but an answer to his speech and all its accusations.

Whilst I feel grateful to the body for its indulgence in affording me the opportunity I now have of concluding what I desired to say, I regret to have to detain the Senate as long as I fear I may do, in a debate of this description. This whole Government, I regard, sir, as entirely and exclusively of a political character. The Senator's resolutions, it is clear, can have no relation to any matter of legislation that now is, or may be, expected to come before the Senate. The object is political; it is a bold attack on the President and the Secretary of the Treasury; and one more entirely gratuitous, unfounded, and preposterous, has never come from any quarter, whether friend, or foe, or neutral. This may be all right in political warfare; he did not complain of it; but only wished that the responsibility of occupying the time of the Senate in merely political discussion, should be placed where it belonged. These political debates usually originate with the Opposition; they are the assailants; we stand on the defensive; but, for one, he was disposed to meet all assaults on the spot, and thus to settle accounts as we go along, and to leave the general reckoning to the people. What special purpose there may be in this movement, he did not pretend to know; but, for some reason or other, there seemed to be, on the part of the Senator, an unusual haste and anxiety to make known his new position to his constituents and the country.

I will first notice, Mr. President, several of the specific charges made by the Senator in his speech of yesterday, before I take up the general issue whether the Senator's speech, with its charges, inferences, and imputations, made in advance of the evidence, is borne out and sustained by the report or not; and shall conclude with some observations on some other topics connected with the general subject, and by no means beyond the proper range belonging to the debate.

The first specific charge against the Secretary of the Treasury is the sale of the bond held by the Government against the present Bank of the United States, which was payable in 1839. The disposition of this bond was authorized by an act of Congress, passed at its last session. It is claimed that the sale was made on terms not authorized by the law, and so disadvantageous to the Treasury as to authorize a belief that there was an intention to favor the Bank of the United States, which was the purchaser. Two objections have been urged against the legality of the transaction; one, that the payment was not made in money; the other, that a credit was allowed, which the law did not authorize. By the terms of the act, the bond was to be sold for "money in hand," and at a sum not less than its par value at the time of sale. It was sold for its par value, and the avails of the bond agreed to be placed in special deposit in the Bank of the United States, to the credit of the Treasurer, in specie or its equivalent. It was also stipulated "that the Bank is to keep the money safely, till drawn out by the Treasurer, without making any charge to the United States for keeping or paying it out on his drafts." These were the terms of the sale as appears from the report before me; but I will not fatigue myself or others by reading the correspondence. It is claimed that, because the act required payment to be made in money, nothing but gold and silver could be received. The Senator, after having so long and strenuously contended for the receipt at the Treasury of the paper of specie-paying banks, seems now getting back to his hard-money notions of 1834. But there is nothing in this argument. All public dues are required by law to be paid in money. The customs, the receipts of lands, and all other public dues are payable in money. There is nothing in the act to distinguish this payment from any other to be made in the United States. But by the practice of the Treasury, from an early period, the notes of specie-paying banks and bank credits have been regarded as equivalent to specie; and the joint resolution of 1816 gave a legal sanction to that practice. That resolution is still in force, and authorizes the receipt of the bills of specie-paying banks, but is not compulsory in its provisions, leaving it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury. Such paper, however, always has been received under certain restrictions, and no doubt will be, until Congress interfere. The payment for this bond, having been made in specie, or what, according to the practice of the Treasury, was equivalent, the charge of illegality is entirely groundless, as much so as if applied to the receipt of convertible paper for duties.

In regard to the assertion of the bonds being sold on a credit, it has no foundation in fact. There was no stipulation for credit in the conditions of the sale. The money was agreed to be, and was, in fact, deposited in the bank, to be kept, and paid out on the draft of the Treasurer. It was, of course, subject to be drawn for immediately. In referring to this part of the contract, Mr. Biddle, in his letter of the 1st of August, 1838, says: "On the part of the bank I confirm that understanding." It is true that at a subsequent period, an arrangement was entered into between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank, specifying the times, sums, and places of payment in respect to the drafts of the Treasurer upon this fund. But this arrangement was made after the money was in the Treasury, and by authority of the general power of the Secretary, and not under the authority of the act authorizing the sale of the bond. It amounts to nothing, therefore, to show that the act did not authorize the sale of the bond on credit, because the bond has not been so sold. Neither can there be any foundation for a suspicion that there was a secret understanding, at the time of the sale, that a credit was to be given. The arrangement referred to was made in consequence of the communication which had previously been made to the bank, by the Secretary of War, suggesting that this money would be wanted for the service of his Department, and in sums of about five hundred thousand dollars per month. Mr. Woodbury states distinctly that he knew nothing of this communication when he negotiated the bond; but that, being informed of it by the bank afterwards, which claimed that it had relied upon it, the Secretary of the Treasury thought it no more than just and equitable to conform to it, in drawing out the deposit.

This interference of the Secretary of War has been commented upon by the mover of these resolutions with great severity. But it is a little remarkable that his censure has been cast, not upon the Secretary of War, but upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It is said that he suffered himself to be made a cat's-paw of, and permitted the Secretary of War to negotiate the bond, when the law had confided this duty to the Secretary of the Treasury. But the groundlessness of this charge is apparent, from the fact that Mr. Woodbury knew nothing of the communication of the Secretary of War, until after the sale was made. The negotiation for the sale of the bond was closed on the 30th of July; and on the 13th of August, Mr. Biddle informed the Secretary of the Treasury of the proposition which had been made by the Secretary of War as to the disbursement of the money for the service of his Department. These reproaches, cast on Mr. Woodbury, have not the slightest foundation to rest upon.

In regard to the conduct of the Secretary of War, I see nothing in it to condemn. It is well known how moneys are drawn from the Treasury. The heads of the different Departments make their requisitions on the Secretary of the Treasury for the sums of money which are wanted for the service of their Departments, and the warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury are issued upon such requisitions. This money was required for the military service, and the Secretary of War probably supposed that, by apprising the bank of the times when, and the places where, the money would be wanted; might facilitate the sale of the bond. His interference was little, if anything, more than the communication of information which he supposed might have a favorable bearing on the pending negotiation with the bank. I can see nothing in this "worthy of death or of bonds." But it may appear to be a very serious matter in the eyes of a neutral.

But it is insisted upon that the contract was disadvantageous to the Treasury, and highly beneficial to the bank; and this seems to be a circumstance relied upon as proof of a friendly alliance between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States. It is certainly very strange that such a charge as this should be made in the face of the fact, appearing in the very document upon which it professes to be founded, that the offer of the Bank of the United States was not only the most favorable, but the only one received coming within the limitations of the law. The Secretary published a general notice inviting proposals. He likewise applied to Mr. Newbold, president of the Bank of America in New York, to the president of one or more of the banks in Philadelphia, wrote to the bankers of the United States in London, and to our Minister in Paris. But no offers could be obtained in Europe, on account of the shortness of the time the bonds had to run, and because the law did not authorize the guarantee on the part of the United States of their eventual payment. No offers could be obtained in the United States except from the debtor bank. Publications appeared in some of the bank presses, instigated no doubt by Mr. Biddle, intimating that the bond might not be paid at maturity, and that the Bank of the United States would claim offsets. Under these circumstances no offer could be obtained except from the debtor bank, which proposed to purchase in the bond on the terms prescribed in the act of Congress. The condition of the Treasury shows that the money was wanted, and it was therefore the duty of the Secretary to dispose of at least one of the bonds.

The next specific charge is the arrangement for the payment of the second bond, which fell due in 1838. It is alleged that there is something very remarkable and suspicious in this transaction; the bond being paid before it became due, and when the money was not wanted for the purposes of the Treasury. The facts are, that the bond was payable on the 30th day of September, and the arrangement was to pay it in three installments; on the 15th day of August, the 15th of September, and the 15th of October, the interest to cease as the respective payments were made, and the money to be placed on deposit in the bank, and to be drawn out on the drafts of the Treasurer. Although by this arrangement a part of the money was anticipated, yet a part of it was postponed beyond the period when the bond fell due. It is asked, what was the object for this arrangement? One object doubtless was, as the sum was very large—nearly two millions and a half—that it was more convenient to divide it and receive it at different times. The Secretary also assigns as another reason, that he was apprehensive that a part of the amount would be paid in Treasury notes not re-issuable, and that the whole sum was required to meet the demands upon the Treasury.

To prove the alliance between the Government and the Bank of the United States, the Senator asserts that moneys have been deposited in that bank in addition to those paid by it to the United States. The only case specified, is a payment of $300,000 by the Bank of Kentucky. This money, it is confidently asserted, was received in the Treasury, and was afterwards deposited in the Bank of the United States. The facts are not so. The Bank of Kentucky was indebted to the United States, and paid that debt by a check for $300,000 on the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, in pursuance of an arrangement made with that bank. These facts appear from the report. The check on the Bank of the United States made it the debtor of the United States. The money was not deposited in that bank; but the check was sent there, and the amount of it placed to the credit of the Treasurer, to be drawn out when wanted. This money was in the same condition as that received on the bonds; it was a payment from the bank to the Treasury, and the money was left in the bank on deposit, to be paid on the drafts of the Treasurer.

In connection with this subject, it is charged that the Secretary of the Treasury has not answered that part of the inquiries in the resolutions, which asks whether there had been any other transactions between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States, except what grew out of the sale and payment of its bonds. This is a mistake. The Secretary names the several transactions the Treasury has had with the Bank of the United States, namely, the negotiation of the bond payable in 1839, the payment of the second bond which fell due in September, 1838, the payment of $300,000 for the Bank of Kentucky, and the payment in part of the demand of the United States, against the old Bank of Columbia, for which the United States' Bank had taken security, and in that way become a trustee for the United States. After specifying these several transactions the Secretary says: "With these exceptions, there have not been dealings of any description between this Department and the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, from its establishment to the present day. No collecting or disbursing officer has ever been directed by this Department to make any deposit whatever in said bank; nor has any money been placed by the said bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, or of this Department, or, to my knowledge, of any of its officers, except the avails of the transactions specifically referred to above, and on the details of which, so far as they relate to the present subject, full information is given in the correspondence and tabular statements annexed." Yet, with these facts before him, the gentleman tells us that the Secretary has not responded to his inquiry whether any moneys have been deposited in the Bank of the United States, other than those growing out of the demands of the United States upon the bank. This complaint is not only without any foundation, but directly in face of the report.

The next specification in the gentleman's bill of indictment is the allegation that the Secretary of the Treasury has attempted to impose upon the public in regard to "special deposits," both in the Bank of the United States and other State banks. In regard to this matter, the conduct of the Secretary is denounced in the most offensive and opprobrious terms; language which he was shocked to hear applied to any high officer of the Government, by any one honored with a seat on this floor, whether enemy, professed friend, or "armed neutral." Sir, the Senator, with great emphasis of tone and manner, charged the Secretary with practicing a base fraud on the country. [Mr. Rives said that he used no such language.] No, sir, the gentleman did not use this language. I was stating the high charge he made against the Secretary in my own language. I thought his language too foul and vituperative to repeat; but I will now do it. He said that the Secretary had attempted to impose upon the country, to humbag and cheat the people.

The gentleman from Virginia says these special deposits are the same as general deposits, and that, to characterize them as special deposits, is altogether deceptive and fraudulent. How far they may differ from general deposits, I cannot pretend to say. Some of them, it seems, have been special deposits in a strict legal sense; that is, specie has been deposited, and kept in a box separate from the funds of the bank, and the identical money restored or paid out when called for. But the deposits with the Bank of the United States, and most of the other State banks, have not been of this character. These deposits have all been temporary, and made under special contracts, as to the custody and paying out of the money. These, in the operations of the Treasury, must be distinguishable from general deposits, which presupposes a general depository, or fiscal agent, for receiving and disbursing the public funds. Any deposit made under a special agreement, differing in any respects from the legal obligations which exist where there is no particular agreement, would, in some sense certainly, be a special deposit. So far as respects the general operations of the Treasury, I have no confidence in any plan of special deposits. In a strict legal sense it is impracticable; and, in any other, it cannot essentially obviate the evils of the general deposit system. But the question now is, whether the Secretary, in using the terms special deposits, has attempted to practice a fraud upon the country. Is the gentleman aware that the same language is used by the agents of the Bank in these transactions? Mr. Macalester, who was the agent of the bank for the purchase of the bonds, says: "I will deposit the amount thereof, in special deposit, in the Bank of the United States;" and Mr. Cowperthwaite, the cashier, in acknowledging the receipt of the money, says: "That Charles Macalester, Esq., has this day deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in special deposit, the sum of $2,254,871 38, subject to the drafts of the said Treasurer." Mr. Biddle, I believe, used the same language. Does the Senator mean to charge these gentlemen with having entered into a conspiracy with the Secretary of the Treasury to practice a fraud on the public? Will he apply to these gentlemen the offensive terms which he has to Mr. Woodbury?

Mr. President, there is one particular charge more, which I will notice when I shall have done with the gentleman's remarks of yesterday. It is, that there was an agreement to circulate the notes of the Bank of the United States in the financial concerns of the Government. It is not claimed that any such agreement has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, but some letter of instructions from the Paymaster General, or some officer connected with the military service, is referred to, as having directed the disbursement of the notes of the United States Bank. If there has been any such order, there is no evidence that it has received the sanction of the head of the Treasury, and no reason to suppose that such can be the case, as all the moneys placed on special deposit in the bank were to be paid out on the drafts of the Treasurer. Under existing laws, disbursing officers are not prohibited from offering in payment bank notes which are equivalent to specie on the spot where offered. This is certainly a strange complaint to come from the quarter it does. Who, for the last two years, has so repeatedly and so earnestly urged the propriety and necessity of receiving and paying out the bills of specie-paying banks as the Senator from Virginia? Not to do this, he has declared, was to discredit the local bank currency, was to proclaim it to be worthless, and to induce the holders of bank notes to return them upon the banks for specie. In his speech at the extra session he urges the necessity of receiving and disbursing the bank-note currency as a measure of indispensable importance. "But, sir," would not the example of the Government, in the indiscriminate rejection of all bank paper, have an important moral influence in exciting the jealousies and suspicions of the whole community?

"If the Government, by its acts, shall declare bank paper to be worthless and unsafe, will not the people also take the alarm? Will not a general distrust be created of all banking institutions, and will not every person holding their paper become impatient to convert it into specie?" He speaks of the "just, safe, and paternal policy" which the Government ought to pursue towards the banks, in receiving and disbursing their notes. And yet, after all this, it is now made a serious ground of complaint that the notes of the Bank of the United States have been received and disbursed by some subordinate disbursing agents. If gentlemen can blow hot and cold at the same breath, it will no doubt be difficult to please them.

It is claimed that the transactions with the Bank of the United States have been advantageous to that institution, at the expense of the Treasury—that the avails of the bonds have been drawn out by drafts payable at the South and West, at points where exchange on Philadelphia bore a large premium. But the truth is, this premium was in consequence of the depreciation of the local currency. On specie, Treasury notes, or bank notes convertible into specie, the difference in exchange was very trifling, as appears from the Secretary's report. These distant places of payment are declared by the Secretary of the Treasury to have been a convenience to the Treasury and a benefit to the public service.

It is no doubt true that these transactions were beneficial to the bank; but it does not follow from this that they were disadvantageous to the Treasury. It may also be conceded that Mr. Biddle speaks of them as having been highly satisfactory to him, and somewhat in a strain of exultation and boasting. This is a weakness of some men possessing talents of a certain description. In the same letter, in which he speaks of the pacification between the bank and the Treasury, he very modestly claims the sole merit, not only of having sustained American credit in Europe, but of having brought about the resumption of specie payments by the banks, which restored the currency; notwithstanding every well-informed man in the Union knows that he placed himself at the head of the non-resuming banks, and brought all his power and influence into requisition to prolong the suspension. Mr. Biddle also boasts that the transactions as to the bonds, brought the Treasury into cooperation with the bank in restoring the currency. This is a mere inference of Mr. Biddle from the facts. But if it had any foundation, why should the Senator condemn it, when he has so repeatedly and earnestly urged the necessity of a cooperation on the part of the Treasury?

There have been other instances of this weakness still more conspicuous. All must recollect that some years since a distinguished Minister of the United States to one of the first Powers in Europe, negotiated a convention of indemnity, highly honorable to the country and to himself, but was so unfortunate as to boast in some of his communications of his having overreached and outwitted the French Government; and in consequence of this unfortunate indiscretion, the country came near being involved in a war with one of the most powerful nations on the globe. I do not allude to this by way of censure, but only for illustration, and to show that other great men, as well as Mr. Biddle, have sometimes fallen into this unfortunate error. I have now, sir, examined the facts of the several transactions which have been made the subjects of such severe censure and condemnation. It only remains for me to consider the more general charges contained in the more comprehensive question, whether these facts sustain the charges against the Administration, contained in the speech of the Senator, made in advance of the facts. It has been emphatically asserted that the documents accompanying the report, triumphantly sustained, not only all the specific charges, but all the inferences, deductions, and imputations made in advance of the report.

What, sir, are those charges? There are three only which I shall notice, passing over all of less importance, and the numerous imputations and insinuations with which the speech abounds. The first which I will notice, is, that the Secretary of the Treasury has restored the connection between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States; that that bank has again become the fiscal agent of the Government; that this connection, originating from executive power, unregulated by law, will result in the establishment of a national bank without the action of Congress. That I do not state the charge too strong, I will refer to the published speech of the Senator, revised no doubt by himself. "These questions acquire a still graver character and deeper interest from the significant speculations, indulged on the appearance of Mr. Biddle's letter, by certain leading journals known to be friendly to the bank, and supposed to be more or less conversant with its views. One of them, commenting on the letter of the president of the bank, says, 'the bank will no doubt, in the course of a short time, by an insensible process, become the fiscal agent of the Government.' Another, with reference to the same letter, says, 'it will be a serious, and not improbable spectacle, if we see, through the instrumentality of concurring circumstances, a national bank reestablished without the action of Congress.'" This grave charge is first introduced in the name, and on the authority, of journals friendly to the bank, and of course hostile to the Administration. This is most excellent authority for any one, even a neutral, to decide, not only on the acts, but the future purposes, of the Administration. It is, however, indorsed and reaffirmed by the Senator, who repeats with emphasis, "a national bank reestablished without the authority of Congress! What is easier or simpler than to do it by the insensible process already commenced! Let the Executive, at its own will and pleasure, adopt the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States as the fiscal agent and depository of the Government; let it join the weight of the public revenues to the already enormous capital of that institution; let it supersede the credit arising from the connection with the Government to the extensive and pervading operations in which the bank is engaged throughout the Union, and have you not a national bank reestablished to all intents and purposes—reestablished without the concurrence of Congress, and in despite of its authority? And would it not be a national bank of the most dangerous and worst possible kind, created by the fiat of the Executive alone, and allied with the Executive, and dependent on the Executive?" The Senator goes much further than the bank journalists; they only assert the fact, or rather insinuate, that a national bank, by an "insensible process," may be reestablished without the action of Congress; but he describes the process by which this result is to be brought about. Who can read this glowing picture and not feel that the country is in great danger? The magnitude of the evil no one will deny. This, sir, is a very grave accusation; no less than a design on the part of the Executive to supersede the authority of Congress, upon a subject of the deepest interest to the country.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Well, sir, on what foundation does it rest? Is it supported by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury? Has Mr. Woodbury furnished evidence against himself of having conspired with Mr. Biddle to establish a national bank without law? This would certainly be very extraordinary. It is apparent that this frightful picture of danger, wrought up with so much art, is a mere creation of the imagination—that it has no foundation in fact, derived either from the report or any other source. Is it not surprising and lamentable that any gentleman on this floor should take up the mere insinuations of Opposition presses, and make them the basis of such grave charges against the Government? Even Mr. Biddle, the Senator's own witness, bears testimony against him. He entirely puts down this charge. He admits that he has found it necessary to assume the powers of Government, or, at least, to fall back into his old position of a national bank, to carry the country through the late crisis, to sustain American credit at home and abroad, to protect chartered rights, maintain the public faith, and restore and regulate the currency. But having accomplished all this, he abdicates, retires, and throws off the cares of empire. He has no longer any controversy with the Government, and is resolved hereafter that his Bank shall be confined to its appropriate sphere of action, as a mere State institution. If the Senator will place no confidence in the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, ought he to discredit his own witness? Shall he be permitted to use Mr. Biddle as a witness against the Administration, and thrust him aside when his testimony is in their favor? Or is the testimony of the Opposition journals, on a subject of this kind, held in higher estimation than that of Mr. Biddle? But as totally unfounded as is this imaginary coalition and conspiracy between the Executive and the Bank of the United States, the Senator really appears to believe it, and, in the emphatic language of a British statesman on a memorable occasion, declares, "In the name of my country I forbid the bans."

I am somewhat surprised, sir, at the allusion to the memorable coalition between Mr. Fox and Lord North, which was so unnatural and preposterous as to have shocked honest men of all parties in England. It appears to me that what we witnessed the other day, when the Senator openly took his stand with the enemies of the Administration, the old opponents of Democracy, that that was a case bearing a much nearer resemblance to the odious coalition to which he had referred. But, however, under other circumstances, I might have regretted the occurrence, after what I have witnessed, I, for one, have no disposition to forbid the bans.

Mr. President, the next accusation which I will notice is, that the Executive does not desire the establishment of the Sub-Treasury system, but that his real object is to restore the State bank deposit system, unregulated by law, and subject entirely to executive discretion. "The practice of the Executive," says the Senator in his published speech, "even while professing to have adopted the Sub-Treasury system, affords the most complete recognition of the superior value and advantages of banks as depositories and fiscal agents. They deprecate, it is true, a connection with banks; but it is a legal connection, sanctioned and regulated by law, it seems, which they deprecate, not one depending on executive discretion. Not only the practice of the Administration, but the express language, both of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, recognize the high, and, in the present condition of the commercial world, almost the indispensable utility of bank agency in the fiscal operations of the Government; but they are for leaving the employment of banks to the will and discretion of the administrators of the Government." Sir, a more grave and serious charge than this could not well be made against the executive officers of the Government. What is it but to denounce the President and his Cabinet, or at least the Secretary of the Treasury, as attempting to practice a base fraud upon the country. The Administration preach one thing and practice another. "The Sub-Treasury scheme," although still recommended, and earnestly recommended in name, and intended possibly to be pressed in fact, is virtually abandoned in argument." The people of the United States are told by a Senator in his place, that although the President has, on three occasions, in his most solemn official communications, recommended the entire separation of the fiscal concerns of the Government from all banks, and has earnestly, and with great ability, urged upon Congress the adoption of that measure—that although the Secretary of the Treasury, in three official reports on the finances, has urged the adoption of the same measure, and attempted to show its practicability, safety, utility, and beneficial influence—notwithstanding all this, the Senator now declares to the country, that neither the President nor Secretary meant any such thing; that they did not desire the measure to be adopted, and were only attempting to deceive and cheat the people by a false issue, as their real purpose was to use the State banks, and they only wished to get rid of the restraints of law.

Could anything add to the extraordinary character of this charge, it would be the fact that it comes from one who, during the last session of Congress, repeatedly expressed his astonishment at the pertinacity with which this measure was pressed upon Congress. The language of the gentleman, and others among his present friends, all must remember. They were really astonished at the perseverance and obstinacy of the Executive and his supporters in adhering to this measure. In their eyes, we seemed all to be perfectly infatuated, reckless of consequences, blind to what was taking place around us, and totally regardless of public opinion, which everywhere, it was said, had declared against it, and yet the same determination was manifested to carry it through. It must be forced upon the country against the known will of the people, and at the sacrifice of the most important interests of the country. Such was the language of honorable Senators a few months ago, who now tell us that the Administration is not sincere in pressing the Independent Treasury plan, and only wishes to avoid all legal restraints in the use of the banks as fiscal agents. Were gentlemen sincere then? If so, what ought to be thought of their present declarations? But, sir, this charge of deception and imposition, practiced upon the country, cannot be confined to the Executive; it must apply equally to the supporters of that measure in Congress. We must all have been parties to this fraud, and equally guilty with the President.

Well, sir, on what authority is this grave charge preferred against the Executive and his supporters in Congress. Two circumstances are referred to: the practice of the Treasury, and a single remark of the President in his message, and a suggestion of the Secretary in his report. What the practice of the Treasury has been the past year, we have already examined. The Secretary has placed the avails of the bonds, and other payments made by the Bank of the United States, in that Bank, on special deposit, to be drawn out as the public service might require. This has been the only connection between that bank and the Treasury. It has employed four deposit banks, under the act of 1836, which was obligatory upon the Secretary; and he has made temporary special deposits in sixteen other banks, at points where no other depositories were provided by law, and where the safety of the revenue or convenience of the service required it. From these facts, it is argued that the Administration, in conducting the finances, practiced upon the bank-deposit system, and thereby gave its sanction to it. This is a strange argument, truly. The President proposes a change of the financial system, and the establishment of other depositories than banks. This measure the Opposition in the House defeat, and then turn round and charge the Administration with having no confidence in the Independent Treasury plan, because they have been compelled to conduct the finances partially, at least, upon the old system. Who ever contended that the bank-deposit system could be entirely dispensed with, without providing some depositories and financial agents as a substitute for the banks?

But although no substitute was provided, the concerns of the Treasury have been conducted the past year with very little employment of banks. With the exception of the four employed under the act of 1836, and those all at unimportant points, no banks have been employed, either as general depositories or as fiscal agents. They have been used only occasionally and temporarily for keeping the public funds, where other safe depositories could not be found. Instead, therefore, of the practice of the Treasury the past year being an argument against the Independent Treasury, it is the strongest possible argument in favor of that measure; and instead of its proving that the Administration have no confidence in the measure, and have virtually abandoned it, it demonstrates its practicability and safety.

So much for the practices of the Treasury. And now for the declarations of the President and Secretary, showing that they have abandoned the Independent Treasury plan. The President says that "an appropriate and occasional use would still be made of the banks by the Treasury, as is done by others, whenever convenience would require it. But neither party should be forced into a species of vassalage—a constant, necessary and dependent connection." Is this abandoning the Independent Treasury? Who ever supposed or contended that an occasional use would not be made of banks, under any system, for particular services? This is altogether a different thing from the Treasury's being made entirely dependent on the banks. But the Secretary of the Treasury says, in his report, that "banking institutions have never been regarded by the undersigned as a class of agents generally unsafe when looking to eventual losses." And this is an abandonment of the Independent Treasury! The Secretary does not say that he considers banks more safe than other depositories. His language implies the contrary. He only says that he does not consider them generally unsafe in relation to eventual payment; implying that he regards them as exposed to occasional interruption or suspension of payment, as has been experienced.

But what do these detached expressions of the President and Secretary amount to when taken in connection with the fact, that in the same documents in which they are found they have both reaffirmed their confidence in the Independent Treasury, and again recommended its adoption?

Sir, I think that I have shown that this serious charge against the Administration put forth with so much boldness, of attempting to practice a deception on the public in relation to the Independent Treasury measure, has not the slightest circumstance to sustain it; not even the authority of the Opposition journals.

There is one more charge against the Administration and its friends, only, that I propose to notice. It is, that the Independent Treasury plan is used as a mere rallying cry of party, and is to be carried through as a party triumph. "Why, then," says the Senator, "is it again recommended and urged upon us? Is it as a rallying cry of party? Is it to drive through a party triumph, fatal as I firmly believe such a triumph would be, in the end, to those who achieve it? Are there, then, Mr. President, no circumstances of national exigency appealing to the dormant, yet I hope not yet extinguished spirit of patriotism, in which we can rise superior to this fatal bondage of party, and act for our country?"

It seems, then, sir, that there is an intention to carry this fatal measure through after all; but it is to be carried through, not for the good of the country, not from a conviction of its importance and utility, but as the "triumph of party." Why, sir, we had previously been told that there was no intention to adopt this measure; that, although recommended "in name," it was virtually abandoned; it was abandoned in practice, and abandoned in argument; the President and Secretary of the Treasury were not in earnest in recommending this measure; they did not wish it to pass, but desired to employ the bank according to their own discretion, and for their own purposes. How these conflicting charges are to be reconciled I cannot see; it may be clear to the author of them, as, since he has taken his new position, he appears to view objects through a different medium from what he formerly did.

But, sir, the same objection applies to the first charge of a coalition between the Executive and Mr. Biddle to reestablish a national bank without the action of Congress. Here are three distinct accusations, all of a serious import, and each one incompatible with the other two. They all cannot be true, but they all may be false. I have proved two of them to be so, and I believe it quite easy to show that the other is like unto them. They all come from the same prolific source. The design of reestablishing a national bank, in connection with the Treasury, and to be a Treasury bank, is entirely inconsistent with the revival of the deposit-bank system. Both of these deep plots cannot stand together. If we are to be cursed with a national Treasury Bank, we cannot at the same time be afflicted with the deposit-bank scheme. When so many deep and dark plots are on foot to prostrate the rights and liberties of the people at the shrine of executive power, it is some consolation that but one of these conspiracies can succeed. Yes, sir, it is fortunate for the country that two evils of such magnitude cannot exist at the same time. But perhaps it is meant that we are to have them in succession; first, the national Treasury Bank established by executive power, and then the deposit-bank system, without law, and subject to executive discretion. After these is to come the Sub-Treasury scheme, as a "party triumph." Threatened as the country is with a succession of such alarming dangers, no wonder that even "neutrals" have armed themselves, and boldly come forward to the rescue.

In regard, Mr. President to this last accusation that the Independent Treasury plan, after being entirely abandoned, as well as twice superseded by the two other schemes, is still to be carried through as a party measure, I have a few words to say. This language, sir, is not new from the honorable Senator; we have often heard it before, and I believe on every occasion on which he has addressed the Senate on this subject. He, sir, is elevated above party spirit and the ordinary passions to which, in the frailty of human nature, others are exposed. He has no selfish personal objects, but acts only from pure, patriotic, and elevated purposes. These high pretensions, sir, it is not my purpose to dispute. In regard to them I only say, let the country judge. Let the country judge between him and his little band of armed neutrals, who have seceded from their old associates and the friends with whom I act in sustaining this great measure.

But how is it, that one claiming such pure, disinterested, and patriotic motives himself, should be so uncharitable to those who may differ from him? Is there any known principle in morals or politics by which the great mass who act together are to be presumed to be dishonest, and the small number who differ from them to be honest? On what authority does the Senator arraign our motives? On what grounds does he presume to say, that in sustaining this great measure, we are actuated by no purer motives, no higher considerations, than to achieve a mere temporary party triumph—that this measure is to be carried by the rallying cry of party.

In the offensive sense in which the gentleman uses the term, I can assure him that this is no party measure; it was neither brought forward at first as such, nor has it been persevered in as such. No one ought to know the truth of this better than the gentleman himself. Where is he now, at the head of the little Conservative band of armed neutrals, who, on account of this very measure, have seceded and withdrawn from the party with which they had long acted? That this measure would temporarily weaken the Administration, no well-informed man doubted. That it was too strong a measure for the weak nerves of some of our friends, was foreseen. That there were many professing to be Democrats, who were so connected with banks, as to regard this measure as in conflict with their interests, was apparent at first. There may have been some whose political views were honestly opposed to it; and possibly there may have been a few whose political aspirations lead them to assume a position hostile to it, and to the party that sustained it, or, at least, a position of "armed neutrality."

In one sense, however, sir, it is a party measure, and the rallying cry of party. It is a party measure in the same sense as the revolution in England of 1688 was a party measure. Sir, that was a party measure, carried through by a party, the Whigs of that day, not like their namesakes of the present day, although, perhaps, resembling them in some points, and especially in the principle of confining the political power to the wealthy classes. It was a party which overthrew the tyranny of the Stuarts, and gave liberty a chance to rally. The Independent Treasury, sir, is a party measure in the same sense as was our glorious Revolution. That was emphatically a party movement, sustained and carried through by the rallying cry of party, which was but another name for the rallying cry of independence and liberty. The great civil revolution of 1800 was also a party measure, which overthrew ancient Federalism, the first combination of all the aristocratic elements into a dynasty of political power, and restored the Constitution at its last gasp. All great reforms in the political institutions or condition of the people in this country, and all others, have been party measures, and have been sustained, prosecuted, and consummated by party efforts, party zeal, and the rallying cry of party. But they have been parties based upon principle, animated by an apprehension of danger, stimulated by the love of liberty, united and struggling for a great and common object.

In this sense, sir, the Independent Treasury is a party movement, a great reform measure; and should we be fortunate enough to carry it through and establish its principles, it will, in my humble judgment, in future times, bear some degree of comparison with the great measures to which I have referred. Those who regard it in no higher aspect than a mere financial arrangement, a question of temporary expediency, cannot appreciate the motives of those who consider it as the first important step in the reform of our wretched paper-money system on the one hand, and of our political institutions on the other. Its paramount objects are, first, the real independence of the Government of all corporations, and its finances, which are the life blood of every Government; and, secondly, the entire separation and exclusion of the organized moneyed power from our political institutions. The danger from either of these sources, I am aware, is not appreciated by some, but in the apprehension of others, it is real and imminent. It is not an imaginary danger. The evil exists, and has already taken deep root in our soil; it ought to be, it must be arrested. The organized moneyed power has already, by an insensible process, become an important, yet an incongruous and alien element in our political system. Our system of civil polity, both State and Federal, is in its theory purely popular, free from any other ingredient or any modification of the great principle of popular sovereignty. Its establishment, as well as its ordinary action, is a result of the popular will. If any hostile element becomes incorporated with it, its purity is destroyed, the harmony of its action is lost, and jarring collisions must follow. When the organized moneyed power becomes so incorporated with the Government as to constitute an essential elementary principle of political power, the system will be changed. It becomes at once a mixed system, consisting of two elements, the popular will and the associated moneyed power.

This last element is essentially anti-Republican, or even monarchical; for what is the principle of monarchy, but that of independent, irresponsible power, neither derived from, nor responsible to, the popular will. The organized moneyed power, when connected with the Government, is equally independent of the will of the people, and removed from all responsibility to it. But I cannot now go into this question, and have alluded to it only to show what sort of party views have influenced the action of the friends of this great reform measure.

But, sir, whilst it is asserted that the President has abandoned the Sub-Treasury in practice and in argument, we have a commentary upon his declaration that "recent events" have strengthened his confidence in the measure. "What the President can find," says the Senator, "in recent events, to sustain the renewed recommendation of the Sub-Treasury scheme, it utterly surpasses my powers of comprehension to imagine." It is then asked, in a tone of triumph, if the banks have not resumed specie payments; if they have not restored the currency, and proved that they are sound and safe depositories for the public revenue? It is true, sir, that the banks have, in a large section of the Union, recovered from their prostrate condition, and done so in a short period. But it is equally true, that this has been accomplished, not only without the interference or aid of the Government, but whilst the Independent Treasury has been in practical operation, whilst the revenues have generally been managed without the agency of banks, either as depositories or fiscal agents. Have not these "recent events" disproved what was so earnestly maintained on the other side of the Senate, that the banks could not recover if the Government should divorce itself from them in its fiscal concerns? In this respect, therefore, "recent events" have proved that gentlemen on the other side of the question were wrong, and that its friends were right. Although the bill did not become a law, still, the separation of the Treasury from banks has practically prevailed, with the exceptions referred to, growing out of payments by the Bank of the United States. "Recent events," therefore, have proved that the separation has not, as was constantly asserted last session, injured the banks even in their prostrate condition. The alarm, then, that this financial system would injure the banks, and destroy credit, is proved, by the experience of the past year, to be wholly unfounded. And if we compare the rapid recovery of the credit and currency of the banks now, with the protracted struggle which they passed through at the close of the last war, it would seem a fair and just conclusion that the disconnection of the revenue from them facilitated and accelerated their restoration.

But this is not all. "Recent events" have proved that the concerns of the Treasury can be conducted without any bank agency whatsoever. This has actually been done the past year, with the exceptions named, without any substitutes being provided by law, either as depositories or fiscal agents. If the concerns of the Treasury have been safely managed on the principles of the separation, without the substitutes, or any of the safeguards which the bill provided, does it not demonstrate, that had it become a law, its operation would have been found convenient, safe, and highly beneficial? The experience, therefore, of the past year, has proved that bank credit and currency has not suffered, but probably been benefited, by the disconnection of the Treasury with banks; and it has also proved that the concerns of the Treasury can be conducted without their agency. These are two very important points which "recent events" have established.

But, sir, it is triumphantly asked whether, in his allusion to "recent events," the President refers to the defalcations of his sub-treasurers? And who are these defaulters whom the Senator denominates as sub-treasurers? They are the late collector of New York, the late district attorney of the same city, and a disbursing officer of the Army. These are the Senator's sub-treasurers; but, unfortunately for his purpose, they were sub-treasurers under his favorite deposit-bank system; and their defalcations occurred under that system; and yet the gentlemen sneeringly characterize these officers as sub-treasurers. Sir, not one of them was a sub-treasurer, according to the provisions of the bill which passed the Senate at the last session. One was a collector of the customs, but would not have been a depository of the revenue had that bill become a law; one was a disbursing officer in the Army; and the other a district attorney, who was neither a receiving or disbursing officer. What, then, have the defalcations of these officers to do with the Sub-Treasury? I will tell you, sir, what they have to do with it. They show, or particularly that of the collector, the urgent necessity of some of the legal provisions and safeguards contained in the Independent Treasury bill; they prove the defects of existing laws, and the imperious necessity for additional guards, checks, and securities, in respect to all public agents who either receive, keep, or disburse the public funds; they demonstrate the importance and necessity of a great moral principle contained in that bill, which made the conversion of the public funds a crime, a felony. This principle would have thrown around your Treasury a moral obligation of immense force. If there is any one consideration which will operate with more force than any or all others, on men in responsible and honorable public stations, it is the apprehension of the loss of character, to be followed by disgrace and infamy. This powerful restraint has been wanting. The policy of your laws, instead of making it a crime to use the public money, has encouraged its use by the agents having the custody of it. And, in regard to defaulters, they are not subject to a criminal prosecution, and incur no other responsibility than a liability to a civil suit, for the money which they have plundered from the Treasury.

But we are told, sir, that such is the weakness of human nature, that it will not do to intrust the public treasure to men in public office. "Far better would it be, in my humble judgment, to heed 'the prayer which divine wisdom has taught to 'human weakness, and 'to lead not' public officers ' (who are but men) into 'temptation,' by committing to their custody large sums of money." The weakness and depravity of human nature may be a sound principle in theology, but in politics it is the principle of despotism; the basis on which all Governments rest that tread in the dust the rights and liberties of the people. This is not the first time we have heard this language from the same quarter. It has been repeated in every discussion of the financial question before the Senate the last two sessions. The weakness of human nature! Public officers who are but men cannot be trusted; they ought not even be exposed to temptation. To whom shall public trusts be confided, if not to men? Shall they be intrusted to corporations, which are above the weakness of human nature, and removed from temptation? What slavish doctrine is this to be heard in the Senate of the United States? Sir, I have listened to this language with astonishment in this hall, coming, as it has, from a quarter whence I should have least expected sentiments so derogatory to freemen, so discouraging to popular liberty from a representative of that enlightened Commonwealth, which, on former occasions, speaking through her distinguished and enlightened sons, was the first to proclaim and defend those great truths, of the moral and intellectual capabilities of man, for the high purposes of self-government. Is this the language, sir, we hear from a professed disciple of Jefferson, claiming to be brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; a disciple, I will not say, without any of the principles of his master, but certainly wanting in some of the most essential and fundamental principles which distinguished that illustrious man.

Sir, did Jefferson talk about the weakness and frailty of man? Did he distrust the people? Let him speak for himself: "Some," says this great reformer, "suppose that man cannot be trusted to govern himself. Have we, then, found angels in 'the form of kings to govern him? Let history answer this question." Mr. Jefferson said that selfish, weak, and timid aristocrats alone distrusted and feared the people, whilst the honest Republican, who was content with a common share of the benefits of social institutions, had confidence in the mass, as he was willing to enjoy his own rights in common with them, believing that the only just and effectual way to secure his individual rights, was to guard and protect the rights and liberties of all. He did not believe that men were too frail to be intrusted with power, or the public treasure. If he had any error, it was in going to the opposite extreme, and entertaining too exalted an opinion of the moral and intellectual capacities of mankind.

This doctrine, that from the weakness of human nature, men cannot be safely trusted with the custody and direction of the public revenue, is not an argument against the Sub-Treasury bill only, but it is equally an argument against all free Governments. Yes, sir, against all Governments which profess to consult the rights and interests of the people. It is consistent only with a Government purely despotic, where the rulers form a distinct class from the rest of the nation, and are permitted to oppress and plunder them at their pleasure.

The unreasonable distrust of the Executive, who is a mere popular magistrate, elected by the people, responsible to them, and liable at all times to be impeached by their Representatives, is a part of the same doctrine, founded on the "weakness" of human nature. Whether it was this sentiment of distrust of mankind which had induced the leaders of Conservatism to assume the position of "armed neutrals," I cannot say. But certain it is, they appear of late to have lost all confidence in men, as public agents, and to put their trust only in corporations. The other chief of the armed neutrality, the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] whom I do not now see in his place, has also become alarmed at the "weakness" of human nature. The dangerous influence of the public funds and executive power on men in office, seems to have disturbed the conservative composure of his natural disposition. He has not only expressed his fears of this influence, in eloquent strains of his own, but has added to them the more soft and touching language of poetry. This influence, he says, comes over us like "The sweet South, breathing on a bed of violets."

Alarming, sir, truly alarming. Who can hope to stand before such an influence as this? The sordid love of money, and the selfish love of office, refined down to the odoriferous breath of the sweet

South, arising from a bed of flowers! I am not aware, sir, who is the author of this poetry; but whoever he may be, I hardly think he designed it for an anti-Sub-Treasury speech; yet it really affords the strongest argument against that measure which its opponents have urged.

But, Mr. President, if the arguments of the gentlemen, derived from the weakness of human nature, were well founded, I appeal to them for their remedy. If they dare not trust sub-treasurers—as they choose to call all receiving officers and all who may have the custody or disbursement of the public funds—because they are men, pray, sir, what will they do? What is their scheme for collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue? If persons are not safe fiscal agents, what will they substitute? Will they substitute corporations, not only for depositories, but for collecting and disbursing agents? All our revenues pass through the hands of three sets of officers—the receiving, keeping, and disbursing officers. The receipts of the revenue are at numerous points, on your extensive commercial sea-board, on the lakes, and your sixty land offices in the extensive region of the West. Your disbursements are made in almost every part of our outstretched territory, and to the Indian tribes beyond your settlements, and on board of your public ships in foreign countries. We have disbursing officers for the army, the navy, for the fortifications and public works, with the Indian tribes, and on board public ships.

If public officers cannot safely be trusted, because, under a lax and defective system of laws, some have proved defaulters, we must employ corporations for all these various services, at home and abroad. Certainly there are no more grounds to distrust public officers as depositories than as receivers and disbursers of the revenue. To accomplish this object, it will become necessary to put these corporations on wheels, as they now fortunately do not possess the power of locomotion. And you must construct railroads, so as to enable them to move with celerity where the exigencies of the public service may require. The troops are to be paid in Florida; you must put some respectable bank on wheels, and send it off to attend to that service. Annuities are to be paid to the Indians, and some western bank must be dispatched beyond the settlements for that service.

But, sir, if all this was practicable, the gentlemen could not get over the difficulty, springing from the weakness of human nature. That is a very serious difficulty to get over, sir, and, as I have already said, is fatal to all free government, and to human liberty. But what is a corporation? A mere abstraction, an ideal, imaginary being, existing in law, but not in fact. For all we see or know of its existence or actions, is of an association of individuals. Its actions, although in a legal sense the acts of the corporation, are in reality the acts of the directors and officers who are empowered to control the corporation. They, in fact, are the corporation. All that is gained, then, in employing corporations as financial agents, is to substitute one set of officers for another—the officers of a corporation for those of the Government. It is to intrust your funds to officers whom we do not appoint, and over whom we have no control, instead of officers of our own creation, subject to our own laws, accountable at all times to the Government, liable to be removed, and subject to such regulations, restrictions, and pains and penalties, as Congress may prescribe. Are not the officers of banks subject to the same weakness, and exposed to the same temptations, as officers of the United States? Have there not been as many defalcations and frauds by corporation officers as by those of this Government? It is true that in every instance such frauds might not expose the Treasury of the United States to a loss, if it had funds deposited in a bank controlled by such officers; but it is, however, true that all the losses the United States have sustained by banks have been in consequence of the fraudulent and dishonest conduct of their officers. But it seems to be claimed that it is wrong for the Government to expose public officers to the temptation of having the custody and control of a large amount of money. Would not this argument apply with equal force to the banks, and if just, be fatal to the whole banking system?

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Virginia remarked that he should be happy to see his friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] Secretary of the Treasury; but that gentleman, very wisely, in my opinion, promptly declined the proffered honor. This led the Senator from Virginia to remark that he was not surprised at it, considering the "rotteness of the whole concern." Of the soundness or rottenness of the Administration, the gentleman, in his new position at the head of the "armed neutrality," now become a reinforcement to the Opposition, may not perhaps be the most impartial or competent judge. It does not appear to be a position favorable for the discovery of truth, as old friends and old objects evidently appear to the Senator's political vision very different from what they did when he was on this side of the House. He can now discover a dark spot upon the sun, and see faults of vast magnitude and proportions, which he did not discern at all when in his old position. Whether there was a fog on the other side of the Hall, or whether it is willful blindness on the part of those who cannot see objects except in the light they desire to see them, I will not undertake to determine; but, from some cause or other, the position is very unfavorable to the discovery of truth.

But whether the Administration is a "rotten concern" or not, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania may have good reasons for his decision, after what he has witnessed here and in the other end of the Capitol, of a disposition to assail, upon the most frivolous grounds, the head of the Treasury Department. It is difficult to satisfy gentlemen in anything, and it seems utterly hopeless to attempt to please them in the concerns of the Treasury. The Secretary is either hostile to the banks, or indifferent towards them, or has too much affection for them; he is either discrediting their bills, or improperly aiding in circulating them. He cannot shape his course exactly so as to please gentlemen, and this is remarkable when they show so much anxiety to be pleased. Under these unfortunate circumstances, and as the Senator from Pennsylvania has declined the honor, it has occurred to me that, in a certain contingency, an arrangement might be made in regard to the Treasury which would be perfectly satisfactory to all the gentlemen on the other side of the House. The event to which I refer is the election in 1840; for should the combined forces of the Opposition be successful, the honorable Senator from Virginia, who has long given his attention to financial subjects, should be placed at the head of the Treasury. It is true, sir, the event on which this important result to the financial interests of the country depends, is not only contingent, but its occurrence is rather doubtful. And the prospect of its taking place is not brightening, but daily becoming darker. The elections the past year, and other indications of public sentiment, do not seem to favor the opinion that such a result is very probable. Still, however, it is possible. At the last session, in the most kind and friendly spirit, I cautioned and admonished my excellent friend over the way, (looking towards Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,) not to suffer himself to be deceived by appearances. I told him that the indications of public opinion, the result of a panic or other temporary causes, could not be safely relied upon, and that it would be no more than a reasonable foresight to forbear making any distinct arrangements for taking possession of the White House in 1841. Subsequent events have proved the seasonableness and wisdom of this advice, which I have no doubt was received in the same friendly spirit in which it was proffered. The prospect for the success of any Opposition candidate is not quite so good now as it was then; and what is more discouraging for my distinguished friend, there appears now to be some reason to doubt whether he will get on to the course. With all his skill and experience as a tactician, the military chieftain, and the expounder of the Constitution, appear to have got the start of him in the presidential race.

But, sir, notwithstanding all these discouraging circumstances, it is still possible the Opposition may succeed. Their spirit is unsubdued, their thirst for power unabated, and their perseverance worthy of a better cause. But to my mind one thing is certain, if they do succeed, it will be entirely owing to the powerful reinforcement they have received from the gallant band of armed neutrals. That party, it is true, cannot boast of their numerical strength; but what they lack in numbers they make up in zeal and courage. Like all other deserters, they are distinguished for the bitterness of their feelings. Some of their chief leaders appear to hate the President so badly, as almost to excite a suspicion that they had once been his friends. To make up for past errors, they are now most spirited and active in the war carried on against the Administration and its friends. They have thrown themselves into the breach, and seem resolved to lead the "forlorn hope," and to merit the highest honors, even if they do not share the richest rewards of victory.

The precise numbers of this formidable reinforcement have not been ascertained. I think, when they rallied under their own flag, they mustered three hundred in the city of New York; and at the recent election in Maine, they made a spirited movement, and having a very popular candidate, came out in all their strength. The result was glorious. If I mistake not, and I appeal to my friend from Maine [Mr. WILLIAMS] to set me right if I am in error, they polled two hundred and eighty-two votes, all told. On this splendid result of a noble struggle, a wag is said to have remarked, that had it not been for the unfortunate circumstance of there being eighty-three thousand scattering votes cast for Messrs. Fairfield and Kent, the candidate of the armed neutrality would have been elected in spite of fate!

In my own State, at the last election, they polled about fourteen hundred votes, out of fifty thousand. Most of these, it is now believed, have returned to their first love, and the residue, following the example of their chiefs, have gone, bag and baggage, over to the camp of the enemy. In New York, where one of their chiefs resides, this party must be more numerous, and no doubt they contributed largely towards the late glorious victory achieved by the combined forces; and I really hope that injustice and ingratitude will not prevail, but that their disinterested services will be duly appreciated and suitably rewarded. In the Old Dominion, where the most distinguished chief of the armed neutrals belongs, their forces must be formidable in numbers, and respectable in character. There may be some in other States, of which I have no information.

Now, Mr. President, the importance and the valuable services of this reinforcement, will not, I hope, be estimated according to their numbers, but according to their zeal, their activity, and the great sacrifices they have made of feeling, interest, and long-cherished friendships, from a pure love of principle. On this subject, I have a word to say to my worthy friends of the Opposition proper, and, I doubt not, they will take a hint from me kindly. I say to you then, gentlemen, receive these allies graciously, and treat them not only justly, but generously and kindly. Do not estimate their merits according to the poor standard of their numbers, but according to their desires to serve you. Overlook, I beseech you, their past errors; you will remember that they were then in a false position, and surrounded by your enemies; and let all their votes against you be "expunged" from your memories. Be not only just to them, but generous; and should you be successful, (of which, however, there is very little prospect,) I hope to be excused for reminding you in their behalf of your settled principle, which I trust will not be forgotten in the disposition of the spoils; it is this—that the highest honors should be conferred on the last deserters.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that should the allied forces of the Opposition succeed in 1840, the claims of the honorable Senator from Virginia will be so strong that they cannot be resisted. He will be placed at the head of the Treasury. Then, sir, all our financial difficulties will be at an end; there will be no more war on the banks or tampering with the currency; he will pursue that happy medium, avoiding, on the one hand, hostility to the banks, and on the other, too great affection for them. Then the condition of the Treasury will be presented as clearly as the noon-day sun; no mystification, no obscurity, but everything plain and intelligible.

Still, sir, there may be some doubt as to the principles on which the future Chancellor of the Exchequer will administer the finances. Like most other great men who have figured largely, and for a length of time, his sentiments appear to have undergone very important fluctuations and changes. Perhaps, in this respect, there is no material difference between him and many of his contemporaries, except in one important particular. Whilst they have been going one way, he has been going the other; whilst they have been advancing, he has been receding.

Now, sir, the country would like to know whether the Treasury will be administered according to the views of the Senator at any one distinct period, or according to his views at several distinct periods, united and blended together; and if the former, what period is to be selected? This is a very important matter. If his opinions in 1834 were to form the basis of his administration, he should certainly have my humble support. A better head of the Treasury I could not desire. His financial principles at that time were sound, enlightened, and patriotic, as explained on this floor in a speech equally distinguished for fervid eloquence and just and patriotic sentiments. I have an extract from that speech before me, which I have no doubt the Senator's new friends will be gratified to hear read, although I am sorry at this late hour to detain the Senate:

Extract from Mr. Rives's speech of 1834.

"Of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises, in its accomplishment, the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended, by the framers of the Constitution, to be—a hard-money Government. We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of a paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of those evils supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank." * * *

"Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert, in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as practicable, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return is, to let the Bank of the United States go down."

"The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realize a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity of the country."

Sir, these are noble, elevated, and patriotic sentiments; sound and enlightened, resting on the firm basis of the Constitution and the eternal principles of right and justice. These sentiments are worthy the occasion that called them forth, and worthy that ancient and "unterrified" Commonwealth from whose representative y came. At that time the gentleman was the bold advocate of a reform in our financial system, and for precisely the same reform we now desire—a reform which, in a social, commercial, and political point of view," he declared to be more desirable than all others. When the channels of circulation were filled with gold and silver, he was for collecting the public revenue in specie only, and for bringing the Government back to what it was intended to be by its framers, a simple "hard-money Government." Well, sir, the channels of circulation are now full; there are, at this time, nearly one hundred millions of specie in the country, more than three times what there was when his speech was delivered. Now, then, is the time; now is the acceptable time; the contingency has occurred; the question is before Congress and the country, and I call on the Senator to redeem his pledge, to help to carry out this great and glorious reform.

But, sir, I fear I shall appeal to him in vain; he has long since abandoned these noble sentiments, for reasons no doubt satisfactory to himself, and has even attempted to disavow them or explain them away. In some publication since, he has attempted to destroy the entire sense and meaning of the language I have quoted, by a forced construction, making the whole sense depend on the qualifying clause as to the channels of circulation being filled with gold and silver. Sir, no one ever did advocate a return to the hard-money policy of the Constitution, and the collection of the revenue in specie, until there was gold and silver enough in the country for the purpose. No one, sir, proposes to carry out this hard-money policy until the channels of circulation are filled. This was the object of the specie provision in the bill of last session. But is the Senator now in favor of collecting the revenues in specie, at any time and under any circumstances? Do his present objections to that policy rest on the ground that the channels of circulation are not full, or do they apply to the principle of the policy itself? Let his course for the last three years answer these questions. Whatever his reasons may be, no one can doubt that he has abandoned his hard-money policy of 1834.

The next we learn of his financial notions was in his course in regard to the deposit act of 1836. He advocated and voted for that bill, which first legalized the connection between the Government and the State banks, but professed to do it with great reluctance, and only as a choice of evils. Immediately after its passage, a controversy commenced among the Opposition presses respecting the paternity of that law. Some claimed that it justly belonged to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] and others that a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. WEBSTER] was its author and parent. But at the commencement of the next session, the Senator from Virginia; and his friend from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE], seemed to claim that they, if not the authors of it, were chiefly responsible for it. A measure which they had supported with great reluctance, and under a sort of duress, had become their favorite measure. If a word was said directly or incidentally against it, one or both of the gentlemen immediately took the floor as its champion. If not their natural child, it has certainly become their offspring by adoption.

Mr. President, those of us on this side of the House, who voted for that measure, also acted under a conviction of necessity and a choice of evils. We consider it a measure, that could only be justified on the ground of necessity, growing out of the peculiar and alarming state of our finances; but we did not then, nor since, regard it as involving any compromise of political principle, or as interfering in the slightest degree with our political relations. We, sir, did not regard it as a point for a new departure, or for commencing a new political reckoning. How it may have been viewed by the Senator from Virginia, and his friend from New York, is not for me to say.

At the next session, in 1837, we reached the third stage in the Senator's financial views, as disclosed in what was called his currency bill, and his management of that bill before the Senate. The bill in itself was well enough; it only reenacted the joint resolution of 1816, with a provision designed to restrain and regulate the issues of the State banks. At that time this had, to a limited extent, been the policy of the Administration; I had not much confidence in it, but was willing to give it a fair trial. I voted for the bill, and am by no means sure now, that if we cannot establish the Independent Treasury, it would be wise to adopt that bill, which, in its practical operation, in one or two years from this time, I think in 1840, would entirely exclude all bank paper from your revenue; for there is not now, and will not then be, any banks that do not issue notes less than twenty dollars. This, however, I do not suppose was the gentleman's object. At that period the idea of restricting and regulating the currency, by the regulations and influence of the revenue, was a prominent and distinct feature in the Senator's financial policy. He designed to restrain and control the currency of the States by the Federal revenue; and thus to effect, indirectly, what he admitted we have no power to do directly.

In the undue importance attached to this measure, and the management of the bill when before the Senate, some gentlemen supposed at the time that they discovered political designs; an opinion that subsequent events appear by no means to have weakened.

I now, sir, come to the extra session, when the Senator's financial views appear to have undergone no essential change. He proposed his currency bill as a substitute for the bill reported by the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT], without any change, except a provision designed to stimulate the banks to resume specie payments. At the last session an important change appears to have taken place in the financial policy of our future head of the Treasury. The principle of controlling the State bank currency, simply by the management and influence of the Federal revenues, was abandoned, and we were presented with a most gigantic and splendid scheme of a league of State banks, to be connected with the Treasury, and under the direction of the Secretary. Of all the projects for conducting the finances, this, in my judgment, was the most dangerous and alarming. The plan was, to recharter and take into the service of the United States twenty-five of the largest and most respectable of the State corporations; to give them the entire monopoly of the revenue; to authorize them to supply a Federal currency to be received for the public dues; and to circulate throughout the Union, and to clothe them with power to regulate and control the entire currency of the country, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. This was a combined engine of a national bank and a Treasury bank, of the worst and most dangerous character. The combined power of these twenty-five large banks, with the revenue and credit of the Government, acting under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, with authority to coerce and regulate the other State banks, would have been a centralization of the moneyed power, and a union of that power with the Government, in a form of all others the most dangerous.

It is scarcely possible for the imagination to conceive of an engine more formidable or more dangerous than this. It would have had the possession and control of the public revenue, of public credit, and, to a great extent, of the general currency and credit of the country. What is a centralized authority over the entire currency and credit of the Union but a power over commerce, manufactures, over imports and exports, over the public revenue, and the entire business of the country? And what is a control of the business of the country but a power over the politics of the country? But it is not my purpose to examine this splendid scheme of centralized moneyed power united with the Government. I expressed my views of it at the time, and I have now only alluded to it as one of the many wise financial schemes of the future Secretary of the Treasury, in case the combined forces of the Opposition should succeed—an event which, when viewed in connection with a scheme like this, or a national bank, I am rejoiced to say, is not very probable. It is the author of this scheme who is so constantly filled with apprehension at the increase of executive power, and the corrupting and dangerous influence of the public revenues.

Mr. President, I have come down to the present time; and what is to be the great financial scheme of the honorable Senator, at the present session, it is perhaps too early to determine. So far as an opinion can be derived from the speech on which I have had occasion to comment, nearly one third of which is devoted to the general question, the Senator seems now to be in favor of the deposit system, solely on the ground of its being the most safe and convenient, and without regard to its incidental power, to which he once attached so much importance, of restraining and regulating the general paper currency. In urging its superiority over the Independent Treasury plan, he relies on these two considerations alone.

In regard to the question whether the Independent Treasury or the State bank-deposit system is most safe for the public revenue, it has been fully discussed heretofore, and I am not disposed now to go into it. Nothing, perhaps, can be added on either side to what has been already said; and I will only remark that the arguments which have heretofore been urged on our side have not in the least degree been weakened by any defalcations or other events which have occurred since this subject was before the Senate at the last session; on the contrary, they have received additional strength and force.

I have now, sir, concluded what I had to say. In examining the financial opinions and views of the honorable Senator from Virginia, I have endeavored to present them fairly, and if I have fallen into error, it is not intentional. Whether he is disposed to do justice to the Administration or not, I am desirous to do justice to him. In the notice taken of his opinions and public acts, I really hope I have been as candid and impartial as he has in examining the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. As in the contingency supposed, the Senator is to be placed at the head of the Treasury, I have deemed it important that the country should know what his financial principles and policy have been at different periods, that he should stand before the country as he has been, and as he now is, in his new position, at the head of the "armed neutrality," now allied with the Opposition forces.

I regret to have detained the Senate so long, in a debate of this description, and thank gentlemen, on both sides of the House, for their attention.

MILITARY ROAD IN ARKANSAS.

REMARKS OF HON. A. YELL, OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 25, 1839,

On the bill reported by Mr. McKAY, of North Carolina, to amend the act of 1836, to authorize the Secretary of War to continue the garrison at Fort Gibson, and to open a Military Road on the Western frontier, so as to pass within the State of Arkansas, whenever the public service may require it.

After a few remarks had been submitted by Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, in reference to the geographical limitations and features of the bill,

Mr. YELL rose and said, that he was sure that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] did not fully understand the provisions of the bill, or he would not oppose it. The object of the bill was to authorize the Secretary of War to do the very thing which that gentleman [Mr. MERCER] and himself believed the Secretary, under the act of the 14th of May, 1836, was authorized to carry into effect. The Secretary of War, however, had given a different construction to the act to which the bill before the House was amendatory; and he and his friend from Virginia had united in giving to the original bill a cordial support. The original act of May 14, 1836, directs that the road shall be opened along the western boundary of the States of Arkansas and Missouri—he did not know that he quoted the precise words of the act, but he gave the substance—and pass within the Indian country, if the assent of the Indian tribes occupying that region could be obtained. The assent of the Indians had been obtained. The Secretary of War is therefore of opinion that he will be compelled to make the road wholly in the Indian territory. The constructions given to the act, by the gentleman from Virginia and myself, are precisely adverse. I infer from the act of 1836, that the road is to run within the limits of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, and can pass only within the Indian country, upon the conditions mentioned in the act, by the consent of the Indians. Otherwise the act of 1836 would have been nugatory or contingent, depending on the assent of the Indians to give it vitality. Such (Mr. Y. said) he was sure was not the intention of Congress; nor is a different conclusion a plausible inference under the letter of the law itself. Such, however, has been the decision of the Secretary of War, and we have been compelled to submit to it, because we could do no better. This bill, therefore, can by no possibility do any harm. It may be made so explicit as to direct the Secretary in future to carry out the evident intention of the act of 1836. Should the Secretary be right, however, in his construction of the act of 1836, then this bill will authorize him to depart from the strict construction; and if the public service can or will be promoted by bringing the road or any part of it within the State of Arkansas, he can do so without the violation of any law or principle. The necessity of the case, makes this bill necessary, and of the utmost importance to the citizens of Arkansas. The act of 1836 requires that the road should cross the Arkansas river, when the new post is established, now Fort Smith, which is established immediately on the western boundary. In running north, along the western boundary of Arkansas, to the new post on the Illinois, and from thence to Fort Leavenworth, the road, if made altogether in the Indian country, must lean in a western direction, leaving the State line at one or more points, some fifteen or twenty miles west, to avoid the mountains crossing the line and running from west to east, which will increase the distance some twenty miles or more in the space of fifty miles, when they again strike the State line, and continue along or near it until they reach Fort Leavenworth. By passing within the State, the road, after leaving Fort Smith, can keep near the State line and on good ground and at a small distance, until they bear east of the boundary line more than three miles, and a large portion of the rest will be on the line or in the Indian country still. This arrangement will shorten the distance, save a large sum of money in opening the road, and when opened it will be equally as good, if not better. Upon the score of economy, therefore, it is desirable that the road should be made as is now suggested; and it is moreover due to the people of Arkansas that it should be thus constructed, because it was the intention of Congress, by the act of 1836, to bring the whole within the State, and they have been deprived of it by the construction of the Secretary of War.

Of so much of the bill as relates to the repeal of the act of 1836, which requires the Secretary of War to abandon Fort Gibson, I have but little to say. In justice, however, to the committee who reported the bill, and in justice to the Secretary of War, I have no hesitation in saying that Fort Gibson holds the keys to the whole Indian country. As a post to protect the Indians from aggression among themselves, and keep in check the united Indians west of the Arkansas, (the Pawnees, Pickaways, and Camanches,) whom we are bound in duty, and by our treaty stipulations to protect, Fort Gibson, from its position, is eminently calculated to afford all the protection that can be required, by our interest and the interests of the Indians themselves. Independently of any other consideration, the post is of general national importance, and should not be abandoned till our Indian relations are rendered, by time and the progress of civilization, far more pacific than they now are. The objection that has been urged against the continuance of that post, that the new garrison established the last session on the Arkansas river, (Fort Smith,) of itself affords sufficient protection, is considered by all familiar with the situation of the country, inconsistent with the facts of the case, inconclusive, unsatisfactory, and unfounded in fact. It was based on selfish considerations. The position of Fort Gibson, above all others, is the most important and commanding for the defense of the citizens of Arkansas. It is immediately on the Arkansas river, where troops can ascend directly to the Indian country. It is a post where the Indians must pass in times of invasion to reach the citizens of Arkansas; and to the Government it is a post that can be approached with steamboats during the boating season, with arms, men, and supplies. That work will now progress, and should be finished in a manner to give protection to the citizens in that portion of the State. If this bill should pass, the Secretary of War will be authorized to occupy Fort Gibson, which I believe is important, not only to the Indians, but to the peace and security of the western frontier.

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

SPEECH OF HON. JACOB FRY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 16, 1839,

On the Resolution providing for the appointment of a Select Committee on the subject of the Swartwout and other Defalcations.

Mr. FRY said: Some ten days after his arrival at this place, to attend the present session of Congress, he found in the post office of the House of Representatives a newspaper directed to him, which, upon opening, turned out to be the "Emancipator," a paper published in New York, and devoted to the cause of Abolition. In that paper he found copious extracts from a speech delivered by a member of this House before a meeting of his constituents at Vicksburg, Mississippi. In that speech, the gentleman was made to have said "that the Administration party in this House were without any leader of any capacity."

Mr. PRENTISS here rose, and called on Mr. FRY for the paper, or to restate what he (Mr. P.) was represented as having said.

Mr. FRY said he had thrown the paper away, and had not seen it since, and could therefore not produce it; but, according to his recollection, the words used were precisely those which he had mentioned.

If this be the fact, as represented by the gentleman from Mississippi to his constituents, that we are without "any leader of any capacity," then, I take it, it becomes every friend of the Administration in this House to set up for himself; and, in that view of the matter, I hope the House will bear with me while I address them under this new order of things.

Mr. Speaker, the times are fruitful. Less than a year ago, when now and then the sound of a Whig victory rushed in upon us here, it was remarkable to witness in this House the good feeling, the joyous anticipations, the bright prospects, that appeared to be opening to our Whig friends. Sir, they were so full of victory, and so elated with success, that a good honest Democrat, could hardly live with them. My worthy friend from Kentucky [Mr. SOUTHWELL] came to me one day, soon after the Baltimore election for a member to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. McKIM, and says, friend Fry, really in the course of another year, there will not be left of you Locofocos enough to constitute a respectable corporal's guard. My respected friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING], who, at the last two sessions of Congress, sat near me, and who knew I was a German, and frequently saw me reading German newspapers, would occasionally tell me he also knew a little German, (which he always took care to repeat when speaking of our political prospects,) and that was, "ganzes voloren" "ganzes voloren"—"all lost," "all lost." Well, sir, I bore it with a Christian's fortitude, awaiting the realities of a coming futurity to enable me to return my compliments.

Sir, we had not proceeded far in that coming futurity before my expectations were realized. Even since the termination of the last session of Congress, what has transpired? The Whig victory in Maine, (supplying the place of the lamented Cilley,) which gave the first impulse to these exultations, turned out but to be the precursor to their total defeat in that State; the Whig victory in Baltimore, which (according to an account I read in some Whig paper) had such a wonderful effect upon the money market at Pittsburg, turned out to be but a little in advance of the regeneration of the gallant State of Maryland. And the great speech of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BOND], which it was said was circulated by hundreds of thousands all over this country, and which was to tear up by the root this whole Administration—this speech, too, has done its full share in redeeming the State of Ohio from the shackles of Federalism. Sir, without meaning the least disrespect towards my friend from Ohio, I have to say, from what I have learned, that in 1836 he was elected to Congress by an overwhelming majority, and in 1838, not long after he was delivered of his celebrated speech, with all necessary exertion on the part of his friends, and with additional advantage of a public dinner, he barely squeezed in (scraping both hips, as farmers sometimes say) to a seat in the next Congress. Well, sir, the times having changed since the termination of the last session of Congress, methinks appearances (here at least) have changed also; the countenances that, in and about this Hall, less than a year ago, beamed with joy and so often flushed with victory, have become a little more pale and haggard; there is an evident fluttering and floundering here, which manifestly shows that our Whig friends feel, mournfully feel, that they and their cause are rapidly sinking. Sir, the result of the last fall elections was eminently calculated to produce this feeling, and, but for the result of the elections in New York, "the last and only hope" of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], as I see expressed in a letter of his, written some time during the fall in answer to some invitation—I say, but for the result in that State, our Whig friends here would still more sensibly feel the dreadful forebodings of utter political annihilation.

But, sir, let me say to my friend from Virginia, and our Whig friends generally, if they calculate upon the State of New York going against Mr. Van Buren, they calculate without their host. Sir, in a "fair shake," there is a Republican majority in that noble State, and there is the spirit among our friends there, that will "never tire nor stop to rest," until they get what is due them. Sir, they have but to advance in the same ratio to the next election, that they did between the last two, and, in less than another year, modern Whiggery there will be but a name.

But, sir, independent of all that, if even the elements of opposition to Mr. Van Buren existed there to any extent, they cannot there, as well as in many other places, be combined. Sir, permit me here to say that north of this city, Anti-Masonry and Abolition constitute too material a part of the Opposition to be overlooked; and the Anti-Masons and Abolitionists will not be overlooked. And, sir, Anti-Masonry and Abolition will demand the nomination of General Harrison; their demand must, and will be, acceded to, and Whiggery—proud, high-minded, and exalted Whiggery—will have to succumb—to knock under.

Sir, in my humble opinion, the great mass of the Whigs of New York will not do it. It is impossible; they cannot do it; and then what becomes of your opposition to Mr. Van Buren in the State of New York? Sir, let us wheel, and look a moment to the South—the gallant, the noble, the generous South—to which we always have looked, and, I fear not, we always may look, for the strictest and best Republicans in the country. Sir, let us look there, and see what the Opposition may do against Mr. Van Buren. Sir, the South have found, and have testified, that the principles of the present Administration are founded in genuine Democratic republicanism; and that these principles are their principles. They have found that, in the measures of this Administration, they are protected, as they have a right to be, against foreign interference with their domestic institutions. And, sir, speculate at this time as you please about southern policy and southern prospects, and about the hypocrisy of the friends of this Administration towards the South, you will find that when the presidential election comes on, the South will not be willing to yield a certainty for an uncertainty.

These self-evident truths are no doubt uppermost in the minds of our Whig friends; and as old "Time" comes stealing upon us, their prospects become more desperate, and they themselves become more desperate; hence, we see again, at this short session, while all the public business is slumbering on our table for want of action, these gentlemen are again at the old trade of abuse; and the cry of corruption, intrigue, defalcation, fraud, and iniquity, and investigation, echoes and reverberates through this Hall. Sir, since I have been a member of this House I have heard much of this cry of corruption and abuses in this Administration. But what has it all amounted to? What have gentlemen ever exhibited to this country of existing corruption in the Administration? What benefit have the people received from these investigations, got up, time after time, upon this Opposition cry of corruption? In truth and in fact, the people have heard so much, and realized so little, that it would almost be difficult to make them believe it if any did exist.

Two years ago, my friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] raised the cry of corruption! corruption! in every department, from the highest to the lowest—from the soles of their feet to the crowns of their heads—all was one common mass of corruption! and he made large promises to the country, that if this House would but give him a committee of investigation, he would exhibit to the people of this country the iniquities of this Administration in their proper light. Well, sir, this House gave him his committee, and then he did not want it. Well, but he had his committee, and had to go to work, and what did he make out of it? What was the corruption that he exhibited as existing in the Executive Departments of this Government? None. Sir, he could show nothing. And in order to divert the attention of the people from the fact that he could show nothing, it became, as it seemed to me, necessary to get up a row here with poor Reuben M. Whitney.

Sir, I am, as much as any member of this House, in favor of investigation, when there is any reason to believe necessity requires it; but to the present mode of raising investigating committees, I do decidedly take exception. Here, if any of our Opposition friends wish to raise a pretext for abusing the Administration, they just get up a call for investigation, and then, before any committee is appointed, or any action on the matter can be had, it becomes the subject for weeks, day in and day out, of abuse to the Administration. Why, sir, who has ever denied to the Opposition a committee of investigation when they asked for it? Nobody. Well, then, why not take a committee and go into the examination at once, and if they can show to the country that the Administration is corrupt, then it would be time enough to abuse it. Why not, in the present case, have taken the committee at once, and proceeded to ascertain the facts, and then, if there was cause, abuse the Administration? Certainly, all parties called for this investigation; nobody resisted it; and the people will inquire, why was it necessary that the half of the session should be wasted in raising this committee? Why, sir, I will tell them: it would be traveling entirely out of the ordinary course of things for the Opposition to get a committee of investigation without first abusing the Administration; and, in order that they might have a pretext, in this case, to condemn the Administration before they try it, they ask the House to adopt an entire new plan of raising the committee; and upon this proposition they pour out their "vials of wrath" upon the Administration, accuse and condemn it from beginning to end, in advance of any investigation; and then these are the gentlemen who are afterwards to sit as judges in the matter.

Well, sir, so be it. I wish now to call the attention of the House to one thing. I wish to know what this committee is to find out more than we know already. The facts connected with this defalcation of Mr. Swartwout, so as to explain the transactions, and how it was consummated, I think we have in the document laid upon our tables from the President of the United States.

And, sir, I propose now to go into an investigation of that matter from the documents in possession of the House, and see what ground there is for the immense amount of censure and abuse heaped upon the Secretary of the Treasury concerning this defalcation. Why, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury has, through the whole of this debate, been the victim of the most unrelenting, violent, vindictive, and unjustifiable abuse I ever witnessed. Sir, he has been held up as worse than Swartwout himself. My friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] says this investigation should have been raised with a view to his (Mr. Woodbury's) impeachment; and, sir, everything is done that can be done to excite and raise up the prejudices of the people against the Secretary of the Treasury in advance of the investigation. But, sir, as I said, I propose to examine this matter from the documents, and give to the people of the country an honest and candid view of the case; and in doing this, I will say to Whigs and Anti-Masons, to Conservatives and to all parties, in the language of an inspired writer, "Come and let us reason together."

Now, sir, I will read from document No. 13, p. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury says:

"During his (Swartwout's) continuance in office, the statements of his accounts, in a condensed form, were made weekly to this Department, punctually; showing a balance in his hands varying from a nominal sum to $100,000, according to circumstances and the season of the year."

Now, sir, if a collector sends in weekly statements of his accounts with punctuality, with nothing upon the face of them to excite suspicion, how is the Secretary of the Treasury to know of anything wrong existing? What reason could he have for suspecting Mr. Swartwout was committing depredations upon the public money, when his accounts were properly rendered? Why, sir, it was impossible for him to know anything of it. Well, sir, you may then ask, how did Swartwout get hold of all this money without the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury? Why, sir, I will refer you to the same document to show how he got hold of it, and in what way he managed it so as to elude the vigilance of the Treasury Department. The Solicitor of the Treasury and the First Comptroller, in their examinations, made at the request of the Department, after this fraud was discovered, say, (p. 24:)

"According to the statements of Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, the use of the public money began in 1830, the practice being to transfer, at the commencement of the week, to the Treasurer of the United States no more than the amount received previous to Saturday morning, and thus to replace successively from the subsequent receipts the sums withdrawn, so that the deficiency might not appear."

Further, (page 48,) Mr. Phillips says:

"By reference to the weekly returns, it will be seen that frequently large amounts were retained under the head 'amount due to the United States to be carried to the next return,' which, in many instances, would not be forwarded until Tuesday, in order that the collections of Saturday and Monday might place him in funds to make the transfer from his account to that of the Treasurer of the United States."

And at page 20 of the same document, it is further explained by Mr. Ogden, who says, in his examination:

"That the weekly transfers to the Treasurer made by Swartwout were usually made on Monday, but did not include the money received later than Saturday morning at ten o'clock, by which means the receipts on bonds due Saturday and Sunday were embraced in the succeeding week, and thus that amount, frequently from $150,000 to $200,000, was entirely under his control."

He adds:

"In this manner he retained the moneys, and was able to keep his transfer to the Treasury 'apparently correct.'"

Now, sir, there cannot be a doubt that this was the mode by which he possessed himself of the money belonging to the Government, and the manner in which he was able to keep his transfers to the Treasury "apparently correct," and thus entirely elude the vigilance of the Secretary of the Treasury. The next inquiry will be, how did the Secretary of the Treasury first ascertain that Swartwout was using the public money? Why, sir, from the same document (pages 2 and 3) we learn that the last return, being for the last three days of Mr. Swartwout's term, showed over $200,000 in his hands; this the Secretary of the Treasury, deeming larger than necessary, immediately directs Mr. Swartwout forthwith to deposit, the one half to the credit of the Treasurer. Mr. Swartwout declines to do so, and states that certain custom-house expenses remained to be paid; that suits had been commenced against him for a return of duties to a large amount, which, with numerous protests filed against him, would be sufficient to swallow the whole balance; that he was individually liable in those cases, and could not pay over this balance until they were legally decided upon; but so soon as they were so decided, any balance which then remained would be promptly paid over.

The Secretary of the Treasury, however, immediately instituted further inquiry, through the Solicitor of the Treasury and the First Comptroller, which "resulted in the impression that the facts and the law relative to those suits and protests might justify a short delay."

Well, sir, does this exhibit anything like a want of proper attention on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to the interests of the Government? Does this show any failure on his part to watch over the public money, and see that it was secured to its rightful owner? No, sir. But to proceed further in ascertaining what led to the detection of this defalcation. The Secretary of the Treasury says that—

"Subsequent disclosures made in November excited the suspicions of the Department, not only as to that balance of $200,000, but a much larger indebtedness, and the Solicitor of the Treasury and the First Comptroller were forthwith sent to New York to ascertain how the matter stood, and to institute a thorough investigation."

This was accordingly done, and the defalcation found to be over $1,000,000; whereupon suits were forthwith instituted against the principal and both his sureties. The Solicitor of the Treasury says in his letter (page 21) of the 10th of November:

"That the urgent demand of the present collector [Mr. Hoyt] for the abstracts and vouchers of Mr. Swartwout's last term, which were incomplete for the want of his signature, and difficulty of obtaining them, first led to the suspicions communicated by him to the Department."

Well, sir, here, then, is explained to you the manner in which the Secretary of the Treasury first gets to know of this defalcation of the collector at New York. I shall be told this speculation of the public money has been going on since 1830; and if the Secretary of the Treasury knew nothing of it, did not any of the other officers in the custom-house at New York know of it? Yes, sir, they did know of it. Mr. Ogden, the cashier, and Mr. Phillips, his assistant, knew of it.

Mr. Ogden, in his examination before the Comptroller and Solicitor, states:

"That he commenced abstracting the money in 1830; that, as the amount of the defalcation increased, he frequently spoke to Mr. S. on the subject; that about four years ago, the amount had got so large that he told Mr. S. unless measures were taken to reduce it, he could not consent to remain any longer in office with him. Mr. S. answered he had no doubt the operations in which he was engaged would enable him to 'pay off the deficiency,' and continued to give assurances to the last that he would soon pay it, and set all matters right."

Mr. Ogden further states, (page 47:)

"That he and Mr. Phillips had frequent conversations with Mr. S. on this subject; that they urged him to raise money elsewhere to pay up this balance; that, at Swartwout's request, they had an interview with him at his house, and that he then assured them his speculations would soon enable him to pay all up."

Now, sir, although it is certain that Mr. Ogden, the cashier, and Mr. Phillips were aware of Mr. S.'s using the money belonging to the Government, yet it is quite reasonable to suppose that they, being in the office with him, holding their appointments, perhaps, at his will, would feel a delicacy in exposing him immediately; and that he put them off from time to time by fair promises that he would raise the money, make all right; and that, by his art and cunning, and oft-repeated promises and assurances, he got the advantage of their feelings, which allowed him to carry on his work of plunder as to avoid detection from the Treasury Department.

Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the largest item in this defalcation. I mean the bond account, which constitutes more than one half of the whole amount. And let gentlemen charge the loss of that part of it to our legislation, and not to the mismanagement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, at the extra session of Congress, in October last, Congress passed a law extending the time for the payment of the merchants' bonds there, for money due the Government for duties, nine months. Mr. Fleming, the Auditor, says there were about ten thousand of these bonds, exceeding $5,000,000 in amount; that the deficit in that account commenced in 1837; and that no suspicion existed with him that any portion of them had been paid, and the money abstracted. Now, sir, I have nothing to say to gentlemen whose votes extended, for nine months, the time of payment on these bonds. But, sir, there can be no doubt but that extension of credit upon these bonds gave Swartwout the opportunity to double the amount of his depredations, while the Auditor supposed their payment was suspended. At page 26, we find mentioned that an item, under the name of "cash retained for refunding merchants," amounting to $80,769, was retained by the collector, under the act of Congress for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire in New York. So that, by the acts of Congress, and not by the negligence of the Secretary of the Treasury, was he enabled to carry on his system of plunder to its final consummation. Sir, I opposed these extensions at the time, because, as I then stated on this floor, I would make the merchants pay their taxes when they were due, the same as the farmer and mechanic are made to pay theirs. The money thus paid by merchants is all levied upon the consumer and paid by the consumer; and there is no more reason for indulgence in that system of collecting taxes than in any other. Let the Government adopt an entire system of cash duties, and it will not only be relieved from much and frequent embarrassment, but will avoid many serious losses; and what will be of equal, if not greater, importance to the country, it will put a check upon excessive importations.

Sir, the history of this stupendous defalcation is not to be overlooked; its origin can very easily be traced to the effects of a bloated circulation of paper money, against which the untiring efforts and united exertions of the Democratic party have always been directed. Sir, the policy of the Democratic party has ever been, not to depress or destroy paper money, but we always have seen and felt the crying necessity for some limit to its circulation, so as to secure the people of the country against those revulsions in trade, in commerce, and in all the fiscal concerns of the Government and the country generally, which are the never-failing effect of such a circulating medium.

Mr. Swartwout was a speculator. Mr. Ogden, the cashier, in his examination, (p. 20,) stated:

"That Mr. S. had been a large speculator in stocks; that he had known his operations to have amounted to some hundred shares a day; that he had been largely a loser by the failure of the Josephs; that he knew he had loaned them $25,000 a day or two before their failure, and that he had made immense purchases of land in Texas," &c.

For aught that appears, Mr. Swartwout came into that office an honest man; but, living in a city where speculations in stocks of every kind, in lands of no value, in paper cities, and all that kind of humbug, were carried on to an extent incredible—why, he, too, thought he might be speculator, and, for that purpose, might use the public money, and perhaps return it again.

Sir, I have thus shown that Mr. Swartwout was engaged in speculations. I have shown in what manner he was enabled to abstract the money, and keep his accounts apparently correct with the Treasury, and the means employed, so as to prevent detection by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that the acts of Congress enabled him, as I before stated, to double his depredations, (for his deficit is stated to have been on the 31st of December, 1836, but $336,718;) and then I want the House to point out, I wish gentlemen to lay a finger upon, any part of the transaction for which the Secretary of the Treasury should be held responsible.

Sir, it is known here that there is a much larger number of Opposition men in office, in the several Departments of the Government, than the people have any idea of. But what is to be done with them? If you turn one out, why then the cry of proscription, proscription for opinion's sake, is raised, and we are called persecutors and the spoils party; and this cry is reiterated by every Opposition paper in the country. Well, sir, if you leave them in, in many instances, the first opportunity they get to lay hold of some of the public money, they fill their pockets full, and then burst, and come out public defaulters, and then the cry of corruption and mismanagement is immediately raised against the Executive; so that the Executive, do as he please, cannot avoid censure.

Sir, I do not concern myself much about it, who is in office, or who is not; but, did it depend upon my will, I should make one effectual general sweep from Dan to Beersheba. Not because I do not believe there may be Opposition men in office who may be valuable in their stations; not for opinion's sake; no, sir; but in self-defense. If the Administration is to be censured for every Opposition man who runs away with the public money, then I hold no Opposition man should be continued in office. I have no doubt there are Opposition men enough who would purposely run away with the public money if they thought they could injure or break down the Administration by it; then, sir, why should they be continued in office?

Sir, this defalcation in New York, it seems, is to be the great center of action about which the Opposition will gather all their force, and the great lever by which they expect to move heaven and earth. Sir, let me ask, is this Government to collect all its money without losing any? Let me look at home for a moment, sir. My district is composed of a single county; in that county, some $40,000 or $50,000 is annually collected and disbursed under the supervision of three commissioners. Now, sir, our people are as honest and industrious, and as able to pay their debts, as those of any other district represented on this floor; yet notwithstanding all that, and notwithstanding the utmost vigilance on the part of our county commissioners, money is frequently lost, either by defaulting collectors or a defaulting treasurer; and I have no doubt the same thing happens in other counties. Well, sir, if, then, in a single county in Pennsylvania we have now and then a default in the collection of our revenue, and if there it is impossible to get along without occasional losses, how much more impossible for this Government, with some twelve or fifteen thousand collectors of public money, stretched over this vast country! I say, how much more impossible is it for this Government to get along without frequent losses. Sir, it is entirely out of the question; the Government may take every precaution, may use the utmost vigilance, and still yearly, and every year, there will be losses.

Mr. Speaker, although this money is lost to the Government, it is not lost in such a way as to embarrass the present operations of the Treasury, because it is money that never came into the Treasury; it was abstracted before it got there; and, consequently, no appropriation, nor any other expense, was based upon it. If it had been in the Treasury, and formed a part of the estimated expenditures, its amount would necessarily have to be replaced. As it is, it need not; and it is the same with the Government as with an individual—it is never so hard to lose money which you never had, as to lose it out of your pocket. I allude to this, however, more particularly, in order to call the attention of our Conservative friends, who say they only differ from us so far as that the public money, after collection, should be placed in banks, and not with officers appointed specially to take charge of it. Now, sir, in this case the public money was taken before it got to the bank; and how is your pet-bank system to reach a case of this kind? Sir, it will not reach such cases; and I think I have a right, then, to call upon our Conservative friends to join with us and pass the Sub-Treasury bill, and make it a penitentiary offense for men to use the public money, and then we shall be able to do the country some service, and effectually prevent these defalcations in our public officers.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen who are panting for this investigation had at once taken a committee and gone to work, they might probably have, by this time, been able to report; but, for some cause or other, they are not willing to take the committee constituted in the usual manner; and for the first time since I have been a member here, a committee is to be chosen by ballot. Well, sir, why that? Why, a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr.

ROBERTSON,] gets up here and makes a most violent attack upon the Speaker for improper conduct in the appointment of the land committee, raised a few days since, and gave as a reason that his colleague, [Mr. BANKS,] who was Speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates for twenty-one years, always gave a majority of a committee favorable to the proposition submitted to them. Why, sir, is the Speaker of this House, before he appoints a committee, to go about among members, and ascertain their private opinions upon subjects? Sir, I should think not. And who complains of this land committee, except the gentleman from Virginia? No one, that I have heard. If the Speaker has done injustice to any of the States in the appointment of that committee, let the members from such States rise and declare it; it is not competent for the gentleman from Virginia to except for all. Sir, I will not speak for more than my own State; but in that I venture I have not a colleague here who will not say that the interests and feelings of Pennsylvania will be faithfully represented by my distinguished friend and colleague [Mr. POTTER] on that committee. Another gentleman, over the way, seems to have an anxiety to relieve the Speaker from the responsibility of appointing this committee. I have no doubt of the gentleman's kind intentions toward the Speaker; but it will be time abundant to relieve the Speaker from responsibility when he asks for it.

But, sir, there may be something at the bottom of this attack upon the Speaker which does not at once appear. There is an election to take place next summer in Tennessee, and the Speaker is to be a candidate for office. Now, sir, the Republican party in Tennessee may be about to right itself again, and the Speaker may be a formidable candidate in the apprehensions of gentlemen; and hence it may be thought necessary indirectly to hunt him down, by making an attack upon him for misconduct in the appointment of the land committee, then to follow it up by taking out of his hands the appointment of this committee of investigation, and then circulate it wide and far in Tennessee that the House had lost its confidence in the Speaker, and had, therefore, to elect their important committees by ballot. Sir, the official conduct of the Speaker in this House is too far beyond the reach of reproach to need any defense by me.

Mr. Speaker, some days ago, during this debate, my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] in speaking of an executive's committee and a people's committee, said, in very emphasized terms, "we will have a people's committee." Well, sir, the manner of my friend's expression caused me to take some thought of what he said; and I came to the conclusion, then, that there had already been a counting of noses between the Whigs and Conservatives, and that they had come to the conclusion that they could outvote us, and elect a committee by ballot. Well, sir, one thing, then, is certain, and that is, the same power that can change the manner of raising a committee can elect the members of that committee; and I have since had no doubt, if they elect, they will form a ticket of nearly all Opposition men, composed of Whigs and Conservatives. Should they do that, I have only to say, "the Lord help Mr. Woodbury!" Such another beating as he will get from that committee no man ever had; and I can only tell his friends and himself to prepare for it.

Sir, the Opposition must make something out of this defalcation; it is their last hope; it does not only involve their political prosperity, but their political existence; it is a case of life or death with them. The country has outlived their bank panics, and their bank pressures have fallen before the energies of the nation; and now, unless they can effect something out of this Swartwout business, their doom is sealed. The late elections show it; the feelings of the people show it; their own acts show it; and now here they have resolved to make one other desperate effort, a death struggle, to hunt down this Administration, by holding up to the view of the people this Swartwout defalcation, and all the defalcations that have taken place since the Government has had existence. Sir, it is easily foretold to what lengths men will go when thus situated. In such case, necessity will be a virtue, and misrepresentation no sin. But, sir, even in this last desperate dying struggle for power, they will be unable to alarm the country; the people will say—and they will say, in a voice that will not pass unheeded—separate your Government from the banks; let each one manage their own affairs; pass us a Sub-Treasury bill, so as to provide more effectually against depredations upon the Treasury by public officers; and when the next great contest comes on, our Opposition friends will be left to join with my friend from Massachusetts in the repetition of his German quotation, “ganzes verloren,” “ganzes verloren,”—“all lost,” “all lost.”

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

REMARKS OF HON. J. L. MARTIN, OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1839,

On the Resolution providing for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Defalcations of Samuel Swartwout.

Mr. MARTIN said he felt it to be his duty, as his course would differ upon this question from that of most of those with whom he acted generally upon this floor, to state his reasons for the vote which he was about to give. He was in favor of appointing the committee by the House, and he greatly preferred that it should be by the visa voce vote of the members; but, if that mode could not be adopted, he would then go for the election by ballot. He was not induced to this course from a want of the fullest confidence in the Presiding Officer; very far from it. He had full confidence that by that officer the committee would be honestly and fairly appointed; and that the investigation to be made by such committee would be as thorough as that which would be made by a committee appointed by this House. He had seen nothing in the course of the Speaker to bring anything like a doubt to his mind upon that subject—certainly not in the appointment of committees of a similar character heretofore, with which he had been acquainted. Other considerations influenced his course than such as are confined to this House, or any of its members. Party feelings were high, and party strifes fierce, in almost every part of the Union. Crimination and recrimination is the order of the day, not only upon this floor, but elsewhere. That, upon charges without proof, he might not be disposed to resort to this unusual mode of appointing a committee, although he might be disposed to go for the investigation asked. This case (he said) presented a different state of things altogether. We are not left to suspicion or conjecture upon this subject nor to charges of gentlemen here. We see that the treasure of the nation has been abstracted by one of its officers to the large amount of some million and a quarter of dollars; that this process of abstraction has been going on for the space of seven years and more. The investigation here proposed must necessarily involve the conduct, not only of the defaulting officer himself, but other high functionaries of this Government, whose duty it was to ascertain and detect such abuses. The question was thus rendered one of grave importance, and one to which the eyes of the country would be directed. He felt, therefore, that it was due to the importance of the subject that this House, on all sides of it, should be satisfied with the investigation proposed to be made, and that the country, too, should have such a report from the investigators as would leave not the shadow of a shade of doubt or suspicion even of its correctness, or that the whole transaction was not fully disclosed and presented to them. Can this desirable result be fully attained by an appointment by the Presiding Officer, especially after the objections which have been made upon this floor, in the apparently earnest protests of gentlemen which have gone forth? However correct the result might be upon such appointment, yet, sir, doubt might be entertained, and clamor would certainly be raised against it.

If, then, (said Mr. M.) the committee was appointed by the votes of the representatives of the people, there will be no ground for objection or doubt whatever. Gentlemen would be deprived of the pretext for calling it a whitewashing committee, a stocked pack, together with various other ad captandum vulgar epithets which are so liberally used here, in regard to those which have been heretofore constituted in the usual way.

Mr. M. said, in the examination which he had made into the subject of this defalcation, he must confess he had been struck with astonishment at the great length of time through which these abstractions had continued, and at the very large amount which had been purloined without detection. It had impressed him with the fear that there was something wrong, either in the administration of the Treasury Department, or in its organization. He could not see how it was possible that a well-organized department, administered with a proper vigilance, could be thus imposed upon. He did not wish to be understood as doubting the honesty and integrity of the head of the Treasury Department, for he did not entertain any such feeling; nor did he intend to utter a suspicion of dishonesty as to any subordinate of his; but he could not say, however, that he did not entertain doubt of the proper vigilance in those whose duty it was to supervise the returns and accounts of the collector.

Mr. M. would not go into the examination of how the failure to detect this fraud had happened, or who was to blame for it; that would be the legitimate business of the committee; and upon full proof on both sides, as well in behalf of the Government as of that of the individuals implicated, that committee will be able to give us a much more correct result than we can possibly come to here. When the facts are reported to this House, we shall find but little difficulty in providing a remedy hereafter in like cases. He said he was not for shielding any man, nor did he believe, or even suspect, that the Administration party was. All, he had no doubt, were for the investigation of this outrage, and for the prevention of its recurrence. For himself, he said, he had always gone for investigation when honorable members upon this floor took the responsibility of making charges against any of the public officers of the Government; that in such cases he went upon the ground that, if the charges were true, it was proper that they should be brought to light, and the delinquents punished; if untrue, that the responsibility of making the charge might rest upon the individual making it. This he thought a safe rule of action; it certainly would be, if, upon the coming in of the report, the subject could be so viewed and treated by this House. This, however, was not generally the case; and certainly it was not in regard to the committees of 1836-'37, of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had spoken some days ago. The result, in each of those instances, had been that the House had lost sight of the report of the committee in the trial of the members of it, and upon charges preferred by those who had been disappointed in their expectations in the investigation; and, too, at whose instance the inquiry had been set on foot by the appointment of the committee; and in that way they had succeeded in warding off the weight of responsibility which should have been placed upon them by the House and the country. He said he went for inquiry, and also for a strict responsibility from every quarter upon which responsibility should properly rest; and he said it was with a view as well to strict investigation and satisfaction to this House and the country, as to such responsibility, that he would give his vote upon this question in favor of the appointment by the House of this committee.

Mr. M. said he knew nothing, personally, of the course of the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was chairman. He had nothing to say for or against that committee. Of the other committee, of which his friend, also from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND] was chairman, he had the misfortune to be a member. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was also a member of the same committee, and of course knew all its proceedings. That gentleman, he said, a few days ago, when addressing the House upon the question now under consideration, referred to this committee, and the one of which he [Mr. WISE] was chairman, and to their proceedings, as he has upon many occasions heretofore, in terms certainly not very respectful to the committees, and still less to the Speaker who appointed them. In this instance, doubtless, he intended a rap upon the knuckles of the Speaker; but it is done much over those of the committee. He charges them to have been a “stocked pack,” “sex-tres committees.” In these remarks, (Mr. M. said,) he knew the gentleman alluded to the political divisions of the members upon those committees, and with no intention of personal disrespect; and in the same sense the remarks heretofore were made by that gentleman, as he had no doubt, and certainly they were, so far as he (Mr. M.) was individually concerned, for that gentleman had so stated upon the floor, with regard to himself. In referring to the proceedings had by those committees, the gentleman remarks: “Every throw of the dice was still sex-tres,” &c.

Mr. M. said he was sorry the gentleman had not made the distinction between the committees, which he must have known existed in their course of action, if he has properly characterized those of the committee of which the gentleman himself was chairman; for he cannot but know that the journal of the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] was chairman, will not bear him out in the charge that “every throw of the dice was sex-tres.” That gentleman well knows that every question proposed to be put by himself, or a gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PERRY], (who, with himself, managed the whole examination,) to any of the witnesses called before us, if within the reasonable construction of the resolution under which we acted, not to say a strained construction of it, was voted for by the chairman of that committee and himself, (Mr. M.) which of course gave the majority in its favor. And he defied a solitary instance to the contrary to be produced from that journal. He said the rule which he adopted for his own government, when he went upon that committee, was, to err on the side of inquiry, if he erred at all; and that, in looking over the journal of that committee, as he had done recently, if he found anything to regret in the part which he bore upon that committee, it was found in permitting improper questions to be put to witnesses, by the aid of his vote; none, certainly, on the other side. He said, under this statement of facts, which the journal of the committee would show, he would appeal to any gentleman to say if that committee was obnoxious to the charges made by that gentleman.

Mr. M. said, if further proof could be necessary or desired by any gentleman, he knew he could safely refer to his friend from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND], who was then present, to sustain him in everything he had said upon this subject; that that gentleman and himself generally voted together upon the various questions submitted for the decision of that committee; and in many of the instances in which he and his friend [Mr. GARLAND] felt it their duty to oppose the propositions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], and those submitted by Mr. PERRY, they were accompanied in their votes by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON], who was, according to the gentleman's own showing, one of the “tres.” He submitted it to that gentleman to say whether he was acting fairly in his remarks, by thus including in his denunciations this committee. Was it fair to do such gross injustice, even for the purpose of effecting other objects? If he wished to rap the Speaker over the knuckles, was it fair to do so at the expense of those against whom he had no ground of charge? He said he asked nothing of that gentleman by way of favor; he demanded justice only, and that he expected to have accorded to him. He said he trusted he had heard for the last time those sweeping denunciations of that gentleman against all investigating committees appointed by the Speaker; and that, if any deserved such denunciations, the gentleman would hereafter make the proper distinction. He said he was desirous not to be misunderstood in the remarks which he had made; that as he had not spoken of the course of the other four members upon the committee whose conduct he had justified, it might be supposed that he thought their conduct reprehensible. He did not so intend to be understood, for he held no such opinion. In the review of the journal which he had taken, he found that two of them, at least, had gone with him generally in most of the votes which he had no ground to distrust the correctness of; and he doubted much whether the impartial judgment of the country, if ever brought to bear upon the proceedings of that committee, would not find more to blame in his votes than those of some of the other four members. He said he had failed to take that ground in the argument, because it was unnecessary to do so; that without it he had shown a most triumphant justification.

He said he had heard a remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that not only surprised, but mortified him. That gentleman had said that he now looked for better times than heretofore under the administration of General Jackson; that this expectation was justified in the fact that the people had ceased to fire guns on the 8th of January. Great God! (said Mr. M.) has it come to this, that honorable gentlemen upon this floor can consider it an evidence of the approach of better times, that the people cease to celebrate the victories of the nation's armies! He considered it the most conclusive evidence that the spirit of patriotism was departing from the region in which the feelings which induced such rejoicings are not felt upon the arrival of that glorious day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD here asked leave to explain, which was accorded. Mr. U. said the gentleman from Alabama had misunderstood his remarks; that he meant only to say that, since General Jackson had gone out of power, those who rejoiced at his achievements heretofore, had ceased to rejoice, he having no office to bestow upon them. That he (Mr. U.) rejoiced as much at the victories of our country as any gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. MARTIN resumed. He said he was glad that he had misunderstood the gentleman; for he could not suppose that one who had borne so honorable a part in the defense of the country, during the last war, as the gentleman from Kentucky, could ever meet the dawn of that glorious day, the 8th of January, without the warmest glow of exultation and patriotic pride; and that, when this feeling shall cease in our land, for one, he should despair of the Republic.

Mr. M. said he deprecated the range which this debate had taken. Gentlemen had discussed this question, involving simply the mode by which the committee should be appointed, as if the report of a committee presenting all of the facts of the transaction were before the House for consideration, and they were making efforts to convict some officer of high crimes and misdemeanors. This, he said, he considered highly improper. How could gentlemen know who would be placed upon that committee? And was any gentleman willing to be placed in the situation of a judge, after having prejudged the case? Although he was exceedingly desirous to have the case investigated fully and strictly, yet he desired that it should be fairly and impartially done, and in a manner, too, to inspire this House and the country with confidence in the result. The debate (said Mr. M.) was improper in another point of view; the time in which the investigation must be made is short, and this length of discussion is wasting it most unnecessarily. If gentlemen feel what they profess, they must see that their end will be best attained by taking the vote without further delay. He said he trusted that that course would be taken by the House; and that the committee will, without delay, enter upon their labors.

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

SPEECH OF HON. ISAAC TOUCEY, OF CONNECTICUT,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 16, 1839,

On the Resolution providing for the appointment of a Committee to investigate the Defalcations of Samuel Swartwout.

Mr. TOUCEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just resumed his seat on the distinguished success with which he has redeemed his promise to introduce refreshing novelty into this debate by sticking to the question; especially in that part of his speech which related to the practice of purchasing books for the use of members.

The subject principally involved in the resolution now before the House is the defalcation of the late collector of the port of New York. It has indeed been so modified as to embrace the defaults of others, of General Gratiot and of William M. Price, the one an opponent, the other a friend of the present Administration. But these are comparatively unimportant. It has been said that the Government, ultimately, will lose nothing by either of them. Perhaps so. Certainly the amount will be comparatively small. The principal subject of the investigation, therefore, is, what it was originally intended to be, the immense and extraordinary defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, the late collector of the port of New York, who has embezzled more than a million of the public money. This is the subject, the defalcation of this man, now, and for years, the political opponent of the present Chief Magistrate; one who opposed his election to the Presidency in 1836; one who now is, and long has been, identified with the Opposition as a zealous political partisan. And the question is, whether the appointment of a committee to investigate this matter shall, by the extraordinary action of this body, be taken away from its Presiding Officer, and transferred to the friends of this defaulter. Political friends, I mean, for none vindicate him. Sir, the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] urged also by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] on the other side of the question, applies with very great force—that an offender should not be put into the hands of his friends if the object be to bring the truth to light, or the offender to justice. “Shall the culprit arraigned at the bar have the privilege of putting his own friends upon the bench, or in the jury-box?” Shall the Opposition here reverse the long practice of this House, which has been sanctioned by all parties for so many years, to take the investigation of the misdeeds of one of their own friends into their own hands? Shall this plunderer of the public money have the boon of such a scrutiny? This is the question; this is the contest; this is the struggle which we have witnessed for so many days.

Sir, I do not discover, in this state of things, a sufficient reason for departing from the usual course. We have organized the House by the choice of our own Speaker, and by the appointment through him of the usual committees; we have confided to them the most important affairs of this nation—subjects of transcendent interest—the great questions and measures which agitate the country; and in doing so, we have only conformed to the established usage of this House, and of similar legislative bodies. Shall we now, in a matter which, though important, is much less important, disrobe the Speaker of the proper powers of his official station, in which he has acquitted himself with distinguished ability and impartiality, to put the investigation of the frauds and embezzlements of a great peculator into the hands of his political friends? Sir, I see no sufficient reason for this most extraordinary course. The arguments of the gentlemen from Mississippi and Pennsylvania are, to my mind, conclusive against it.

The gentleman from Virginia, who sits before me, [Mr. GARLAND,] has offered an amendment, that the committee shall be appointed by ballot. Now, sir, I know that that gentleman is opposed to the secret ballot. I know him to be an advocate of the viva voce vote. The practice of his State requires it. His own judgment dictates it. I would then ask, how he can insist on this amendment, which is the same thing precisely as to declare in terms that this committee shall be appointed by secret ballot. Sir, I am against the amendment. I am against the secret ballot in a representative body. It is opposed to the principle of our Government—to the genius of the Constitution. It is utterly unworthy of this House that the official action of the Representative should be secret. The close ballot for the people may be right for the ultimate sovereignty is in them. They are not accountable for their action to any other body. But we, as public agents, as representatives of the people, exercising sovereign powers in their name and right, are directly and immediately accountable to them for every act done by virtue of the delegated authority; and, therefore, our action should be open, public, known without being sought after. All the arguments which have been, or can be, urged against it, would, if followed out in their legitimate consequences, require us to seal up our Journal, abolish the right to demand the yeas and nays, close our doors against reporters and against the public, and sit perpetually in secret conclave. Publicity is the basis of responsibility; not to the members of this body, but to the country—to the people who sent us here. There is no argument against the one, which does not go equally to the destruction of the other. Our action should be open, known to our constituents, known to the whole country, not for the purpose of creating any undue dependence anywhere, but to secure and enforce the just responsibility of the public servant, the just right of the constituent body, and the just power of public sentiment.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has inquired why such defaults have not occurred under former Administrations? Sir, I have listened to this debate; I have observed the tone of defiance and the extravagance of declamation which gentlemen have indulged in. If any one, casually present here, were to judge from the speeches on that side of the House, he would suppose that such a thing as a defalcation of a public officer was unknown in this Government until President Jackson came into power. What would be his surprise, his astonishment, to be informed, after such reckless boldness of accusation, that the Government had never been more fortunate, or more free from these losses, than since the accession of that honest and heroic man to the Presidency; and that the late and present Administrations, for the prudence, the skill, the energy and success, with which they have conducted the finances, might justly challenge a comparison with all former times?

Sir, I call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that, when the late President came into office, in 1829, the past losses of the Treasury exceeded seventeen millions of dollars, while the actual loss during the eight years of his Administration was less than a million; not one fourth part of the average of all former Administrations. The whole amount of the losses of the Treasury, from the year 1789, when the Constitution was adopted and the Government established, to the 4th of March, 1837, when General Jackson retired from office, exceeded eighteen millions of dollars. During the same time, the aggregate of revenue collected was a thousand millions. Of that sum, more than one fourth part, more than two hundred and fifty millions of dollars was collected during the Administration of General Jackson. If his Administration had been no more successful than those which preceded it, if the losses of the Treasury had been as great under him as they were under his predecessors, they would have amounted to FOUR MILLIONS AND A HALF. But, sir, they were LESS THAN A MILLION; and if you add all the losses which have since occurred under the Administration of Mr. Van Buren, they WILL STILL NOT EQUAL THE AVERAGE, NOR HALF THAT SUM.

On the 4th of March, 1837, the Government had lost, since the formation of the Constitution, more than six millions by banks; six millions and a half by merchants' bonds for duties; near a million and a half by collectors and receivers. (including marshals and attorneys;) and about four millions and a quarter by disbursing officers. All these losses grew out of the system, which has long been in force with little variation, and which we are endeavoring to reform. I include five millions of losses by depreciated and worthless bank paper. Without that, the amount would be thirteen millions. And now, sir, by the rule of equality, the late Administration should have lost four millions and a half, or, in any view, three millions and a quarter, to bring it down to the level of se which went before it; but its actual losses were less than a million! And yet, sir, the cry of corruption has been perpetually rung in our ears, from the beginning to the end of session after session, until the gentlemen themselves, who have rung the changes, seem to think that the country have no faith in it, and regard it as senseless clamor. Sir, I ask for the light of truth upon this subject. Let the truth be spread before the country, and the public mind will judge justly. I go for investigation now, and at all times. I undertake to say, that the present Secretary of the Treasury, so far as this subject is concerned, has administered the finances with as great success as any of his predecessors. I will not now go more into detail. It would be out of place. The general results are sufficient for my purpose, and they are conclusive in the view which is now taken. If, sir, in the administration of this Department, under all the difficulties and embarrassments with which it has recently been surrounded, the public money has been not only as safe, but safer, if the losses have been less, if the public interests have been better secured, if the general results have been altogether more favorable, as I have already shown, the vague charge of inefficiency, inattention, incapacity, or corruption, will avail nothing; the weapons of the assailant, however thickly showered, or however well directed, must fall harmless. The justice of the American people will sustain the faithful public servant. When, not long ago, a gentleman from Virginia was challenged by my friend from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] to show wherein the Secretary of the Treasury had been guilty of gross violation of official duty, what did he do? After he had proclaimed before the House, publicly, repeatedly, in the most triumphant manner, that the Secretary had been guilty of gross violation of official duty, and that he could convict him before any jury of twelve men by the documents sent here by the Department under the Secretary's own hand, when challenged to show when and wherein, and to make it the basis of action in this body in the accustomed form, the gentleman at once retreated from his position, and proposed a resolution for a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to go upon an exploring expedition, a voyage of discovery, in a wild search for causes of accusation!

Mr. WISE rose to explain. Most assuredly the gentleman from Connecticut does me great injustice, if he says I retracted any challenge. I did say, give me a jury of twelve men and I will convict the Secretary of the Treasury of gross violation of his official duty by the documents under his own hand, and I now repeat it. But I went on and specified when and wherein, and am now publishing the documents in my speech in the National Intelligencer. And, further, I introduced my resolution for a committee of investigation, and the friends of Mr. Woodbury skulked from it.

Mr. TOUCEY. The gentleman does not correct my statement. He affirms it in every particular. He said that upon the documents under the hand of the Secretary, he could convict him of gross dereliction of official duty. He was challenged to specify the act done, or left undone, which he charged as a gross violation of duty, and which he could prove under the hand of the Secretary, and to make it the basis of a resolution for the action of this House; and, instead of this, he retreats from his position, faces about, marches off, and proposes a resolution for a committee to go in search of grounds of accusation! The gentleman had boldly assumed the position that he KNEW of gross violation of official duty by the Secretary; that he could point to the accusatory matter; that he could prove it, and convict the Secretary by official documents in the possession of the House under the signature of the Secretary himself; and, when pressed, sir, he retreats from his position, calls for a committee, and proposes to clothe them with the utmost powers of the House, to send for persons and papers to hunt up grounds of accusation entirely unknown to him! I say, sir, the gentleman has retreated. He is admirable at the onset; he is equally so at a retreat! One specific charge, however, was made, that a certain individual had been renominated and reappointed to office while a known defaulter. The document, in my judgment, shows no such thing. He was not a defaulter at the time of his reappointment. He became so afterward.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] imputes all these defaults to defects in our system. He has on a former occasion proposed an Independent Treasury according to certain peculiar opinions of his own. I believe his proposition is still pending, unless it was rejected by the committee. He would make the Constitution better than it now is, and transfer the appointing power to the Halls of Congress. I venture to affirm that his proposition would hardly obtain the sanction of any other member than himself, certainly not of one of his colleagues, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who presented to the House a very extraordinary resolution the other day. If, sir, in the exercise of our rightful legislative powers we are involved in so many difficulties, and encounter so many impediments, what would be our condition if, by a change in the Constitution, a large mass of executive patronage were thrown into this body.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] thinks his "bill to secure the freedom of elections" the grand panacea for all the evils that exist in this Government. I will say nothing of that bill now, nor stop to inquire whether the want of freedom in the people, in the exercise of their highest rights, has occasioned these defalcations. There is a cause for them; one, most powerful; one, which has crept into the Government in direct violation of the true spirit of the Constitution; one which has been advocated by the Opposition; which the Administration has labored to exterminate; one, more powerful than any and all others combined—the use of the public money for private purposes. This is the root of the evil. This is the chief source of most of the losses of the Treasury, and of a thousand other evils which flow directly from it. It is a fountain of perpetual mischief.

The Constitution has guarded against this abuse in the most decisive manner. It makes the public money a sacred deposit, consecrated exclusively to the great constitutional purposes for which it was raised. For this reason the Constitution requires that there shall be a PUBLIC TREASURY; the PUBLIC MONEY shall be kept there; that an account shall be taken and published from time to time; that no MONEY shall be drawn from the TREASURY without an APPROPRIATION BY LAW. It is in violation of every one of these wise and salutary provisions, that the public money, or any portion of it, should ever, for a single moment, be converted to private use, though the person intrusted with it might be able, from his own private means, to refund the very last farthing.

And yet, sir, what has been the legislation of Congress and the want of legislation upon this subject? You have sanctioned, you have legalized, the pernicious and dangerous practice to an unlimited extent. You have thrown open the doors of the Treasury, you have thrown down the barriers of the Constitution, you have dissipated the public money through all the channels of trade and business and every species of speculation, and when the Treasury is annihilated by law, and the public treasure does not exist, by your own enactment, except on paper as a mere matter of account, you ask, amazed and astonished at what you have done, where is the people's money? Where is the public treasure wrung from the hand of labor for the great purposes of this Government? In the first place, sir, you put the whole public money into the hands of the stockholders of a bank, upon the distinct, well-understood arrangement, that they were to use it, at their own mere will and pleasure, for their own mere private profit. In the next place, when the first National Bank charter expired, you again quartered a company of bankers within the precincts of the Treasury, and authorized them to trade and speculate upon its contents, for their own private profit. When at last these were expelled, it was only to replace them by a more numerous squadron of State banks, with the same power over the public money. Finally, you have put large sums of money into the hands of individual agents, and required of them the performance of responsible duties, without compensation, except what they might derive from its profitable use. You have thus again and again, by a long course of legislation, persevered in against all opposition, sanctioned the pernicious and dangerous principle, or rather violation of all principle, that the contents of the Treasury might be used, dissipated, for mere private purposes, and that you would look only to the responsibility of those intrusted with it, for its ultimate restoration.

The use of the public money for private purposes; this is the distinguishing characteristic of the old system; of the national-bank system, and of the State bank deposit system; for though different in some respects, in this grand and fatal characteristic they are one and the same. This abuse, this use of the public money for private purposes, thus encouraged and sanctioned, involves the public treasure at all times in the most imminent danger, giving rise to nearly all the losses that occur. In the great majority of cases, it is the direct and immediate cause of the loss. It is corrupt and corrupting, unconstitutional, and demoralizing; we have endeavored to eradicate it.

There are other defects in our legislation, all growing out of this one evil principle, which has crept in, and all clustering about it as its direct and obvious consequences. In all our laws upon this subject, we are struck with the total absence of any provision for inspection or examination, with a view to see that the public money is kept on hand by the officers of the Government intrusted with its keeping. We are equally struck with the total practical exemption of all officers from all blame, or even inquiry, who promptly settle their accounts. There is still another defect equally striking, and still more extraordinary and alarming. While the private property of every individual in the land is protected against invasion by the severest retributions of the criminal code, and the consequent infamy of deliberate and felonious violation, the great mass of the public money is left open to the frauds, the larcenies, and embezzlement of every hand through which it must pass, without a scrap of penal or even prohibitory law upon the subject!

Mr. BOND asked if there was no law for examining the books of public officers.

Mr. TOUCEY. I say there is no law requiring examinations, with a view to see that the public money is kept on hand by the officers intrusted with it.

Mr. BOND interposed again, and said that the act of 1789 expressly provided for an examination of the books of collectors, and that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to have it done; and if done, these defalcations would never take place.

Mr. TOUCEY. That does not contravene my position. I do not deny, I have not denied that there is authority to examine books. You may examine till doomsday; it will do little good without the other provision. What I say is, there is no provision made requiring inspections or examinations, with a view to see that the money is kept on hand. That is the defect. It countenances the inference that the money need not be kept on hand, provided the officer, when called upon, promptly settles his account. This is the defect, a negative characteristic of your seductive system, growing out of the leading and controlling principle which I have denounced. But, worse than that, there is no law whatever prohibiting the use of the public money for private purposes; none against frauds; none against embezzlements; none inflicting penalties; none threatening the penitentiary for these robberies of the public Treasury!

Sir, I will go further. It is the doctrine of the Opposition; it is their favorite policy that the public money should be used for private purposes. They say it ought to be used; that the public good requires it; that it ought not to be locked up from use, even while in the Treasury. This is the strong argument for a national bank, and for giving the State banks the custody of the public money. They say that the public money, after it has been collected and paid into the Treasury, and before it is disbursed, in pursuance of appropriations made by law, ought not to be hoarded safely in the Treasury, but in some way used for the benefit of trade, for the good of the community, for individual accommodation. We deny it. The great parties of the country are in hostility upon this point. We hold the practice and the policy to be radically wrong, essentially corrupt. We hold the PUBLIC MONEY to be CONSECRATED BY THE CONSTITUTION, and by every sound principle of public policy to PUBLIC, CONSTITUTIONAL USES ONLY. The reverse is maintained by the Opposition. The contrary practice and policy which we condemn, are advocated and vindicated by them; and because we differ with them, they denounce us as the enemies of commerce and trade, and the subverters of the credit system.

Now, sir, I ask, is it not an obvious and necessary consequence, of this principle which has been sanctioned of using the public money for private purposes, of these defects in our legislation which I have pointed out as having their source in this principle, and of this favorite policy of the Opposition so strongly advocated and so zealously maintained, that the public officer should persuade himself, deceive himself, if you please, into the belief, that this use of the public money for private purposes, upon the whole, is a very good thing? that, after all, it is right enough, at least, if he only promptly settle his account when called upon to do so? and that the same thing cannot very well be commendable in one set of public agents, and deserve the penitentiary in another? It is not in the nature of man to make fine-spun distinctions against himself, against his own interests—to condemn and disgrace himself in his own judgment for what others are deemed benefactors. I appeal to the experience, the observation, of all who hear me, whether men who would shudder at crime and dishonor do not persuade themselves that they may use the public money; and when they have done so, and some unexpected reverse, the unfortunate issue of some flattering speculation, involves them in difficulty and in ruin, and forces them into the attitude of defaulters towards this Government, are they not ready for any sacrifice to redeem themselves and maintain a character for integrity in the community where they live? Sir, it is the vice of your system; they are the victims of your legislation. In almost all cases they owe their fall to the false principle which you have introduced and sanctioned. We have endeavored to cut it up by the roots—to expel it altogether. We have waged war against it. We will never make an end of the war till there is an end of the principle. We would interdict the application of the public money to private uses. We would bring the oath of the public officer to the aid of law. We would denounce it as an infamous offense, and bring the terrors of the penitentiary to bear upon it. We would bring the honesty and the honor of every public officer, at the very outset, in the most unequivocal manner, to confront and arrest him before the first false step. We would institute the most rigorous and frequent examinations, that there may be no hope to escape detection, no false, flattering anticipation of impunity. We would superadd all the security to be derived from the most ample official bonds. This is what we would do. This is what we have attempted to do. But what has been the course of the Opposition? They have resisted us every step, here and elsewhere. They have met us at every point. They have struggled to maintain and perpetuate the old, corrupt, defective, broken down, unconstitutional systems. They have clung to the bank and State connection. They have resisted all reform. They have labored to defeat the new guards and securities, which we attempted to throw round the public moneys in times of great difficulty and embarrassment, when the whole public treasure, by the operation of laws which they assisted to enact, was thrown, suddenly, by a convulsion, into the hands of public officers. They have refused any law. They have refused to propose any measure of their own, or to modify any measure proposed by us; and twice, when we have offered them a law, recommended, by the Executive, and passed by the Senate, designed to reform existing evils, and to surround the public moneys with new guards and securities, demanded by the exigencies of the times, they have promptly laid it upon the table; and these defects in our legislation, which are the causes of almost all the defalcations that have occurred, are still permitted to exist, and to swallow up yearly thousands and tens of thousands of the public money.

I hope, sir, the House will come to the vote. I am anxious, whatever the result may be, that the vote be taken. I wish to probe these defaults to the bottom. I know of no one who opposes investigation. But I am not willing that, contrary to the usage of this and of all other legislative bodies organized as this is, the power of appointment should be taken from the proper organ of the House, and committed to the friends of the individual whose misconduct is to be examined. If it be done, let it be done openly, not by secret ballot. I wish to know, and the country will wish to know, who is responsible for what is done. But whatever course shall be taken, our purposes will be defeated, unless we take it quickly. Let the investigation go on; let the facts be examined thoroughly; let them be presented fully; if for no other purpose, at least to enlighten us in the discharge of our legislative duty, and let no obstacle be thrown in the way.

PUBLIC LANDS.

REMARKS OF HON. J. C. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN SENATE, January 15, 1839,

On the engrossment of the bill for graduating the price of Public Lands.

Mr. CALHOUN said: I have no desire, Mr. President, to retard, in the smallest degree, the final action of the Senate on this bill; and in order to avoid unnecessary consumption of time, I intend to state, as concisely as possible, my views of the proper policy to be pursued in reference to the public lands lying within the limits of the new States, and my reasons for voting against the engrossment of this bill.

I shall begin with premising that I am under strong conviction, both from observation and reflection, that we have arrived at the period when an entire revolution of our land system, as far as it is applicable to those States, is unavoidable. They have, in fact, outgrown the system. Since its first adoption, they have come into existence, have passed through a state of infancy, and have now arrived at manhood. The system which was wise and just at first, is neither wise nor just, applied to them in their changed condition.

We have heard much, Mr. President, in the present discussion, about the growth of the new States; but, if I may judge from the various measures proposed on the present occasion, we have neither realized its rapidity, nor the unavoidable changes in our land system which must follow in its train. Their wonderful growth is, indeed, one of those realities almost beyond the grasp of imagination. When I go back twenty-seven years, to the period when I first became a member of the other House, and compare what the new States then were to what they now are, I am lost in wonder and amazement. Their growth is without example. There is nothing like it in history. At that time there was but a single new State, (Ohio.) I exclude Kentucky, Tennessee, and Maine, all of which have been admitted since the adoption of the Constitution, and limit my remarks to those which have since sprung up on the public domain.

Ohio had then but one Representative in the other House, Jeremiah Morrow, an honest and sensible man, who was at that time at the head of the Committee on the Public Lands, and had the confidence of the House so completely that his voice was the law on all subjects connected with them, so little interest did they, at that time, excite. There were then thirty-two Senators in all, of which Ohio had, of course, two; that is, the one sixteenth of the whole. In the electoral college she had three votes, which made her right about the one fiftieth in that body—a weight scarcely felt or estimated in the political movements of the day.

Such, at that time, was the infant and feeble condition of the new States. Since then, in a period but little exceeding that allotted to a single generation to pass over the stage of life, how wonderful the change! Instead of one, as then, there are now nine new States; and in the place of two Senators in thirty-two, we now have eighteen in fifty-two; making, instead of one sixteenth, more than a third of the whole; and already three Territories, Florida, Wisconsin, and Iowa, are struggling for admission. When admitted, which must be shortly, there will then be twelve new States, with twenty-four Senators in fifty-six, which will increase their relative weight in this body to three sevenths of the whole.

But as wonderful as has been the increase in this body, it will be still more so, after the next census, in the other. It will be taken next year, and a new apportionment of the members will be made under the Constitution; when, instead of a single member, being less than one in a hundred, as was the case twenty-seven years ago, the representation of the new States will then stand to the old, at least, as forty to sixty, or two fifths of the whole, as calculated by a friend familiar with the subject, and in whose accuracy I have entire confidence. The new States having, as they will then, three sevenths in this, and two fifths in the other House, will, of course, have a relative weight in the electoral college, or the same thing in a choice of a President, compounded of the two, that is, five twelfths of the whole. So much for the past.

Now, if we turn to the future, we shall find the cause of this amazing growth so far from being exhausted or weakened, is acting with increased force, and urging forward the growth of those States with accelerated, instead of a decreasing, velocity; so much so, that the past changes in the last twenty-seven years will appear as nothing compared with what will take place in the next twenty-seven, unless some unforeseen occurrence should intervene to retard their progress. If my memory serves me, our population, twenty-seven years ago, was about seven millions; and our annual increase then, that is, the excess of births over deaths, including emigration, about two hundred thousand, estimating our growth at three per cent. compound. Since then, our population has increased not less than nine millions, making the present probably about sixteen; which, on the same data, will make our annual increase at this time but little short of half a million; the greater part of which will find their homes in the new States.

I will not enter into a minute calculation as to the effects of this great increase on the relative weight of the new and old States at the next succeeding census, in 1850. It is sufficient to say, that it will give a decided majority to the former, both in the House of Representatives and in the electoral college, and of course, in the Government; and thus, in the short space of one generation and a half, the center of political power, as between the old and new States, will have passed from the former to the latter.

Now, with these unquestionable results before us, I ask, not whether it would be wise to continue the old system; no, sir! a far bolder question—will it be practicable? And if not practicable, would it be wise to struggle to continue it till overthrown by the force of unavoidable and irresistible causes? I ask, what would be the effects of such a struggle? Would it not be to excite, in the first instance, animosity and discord between the old and new States, and, in the end, to overthrow the entire land system, with the certain loss, ultimately, of the public domain? I shall not, on this occasion, attempt a formal discussion of these points. I propose, in order to illustrate, simply to show how vain and dangerous would be the attempt to hold on to the present system, under these great and growing changes, by tracing its operation under a single aspect, its bearing on the presidential question.

To have a clear conception of this, we must bear in mind that after the next census the new States will have five twelfths of the electoral college; and, of course, compared to either of the other sections, a controlling voice in the election of a President. He who keeps this in mind, and understands the workings of the human heart and of our system, must see that in the presidential contest, (for such it must ever be,) the great point, hereafter, will be to secure their favor; and that this can be best done by favoring their peculiar views and policy in reference to the public lands. Now, one of two things must follow: either all the candidates will enter into this competition, in which case the struggle will be who shall go furthest, and its consequence to give the vote to him who may bid highest. It is easy to see how this would end. The public domain, the noble inheritance of the people of this Union, would be squandered, or rather gambled away, in the contest; and would thus be made, at the same time, the means of plunder and corruption, and of elevating to power the most profligate and audacious.

But if, instead of all the candidates seeking the favor of the new States, a part should court their interests, and the others that of the old States, the train of events would, indeed, be varied, but the ultimate result would be the same. On this supposition each of the candidates would resort to means best calculated to secure the section on whose support he might rely. Those looking to the new States would push to the extreme the favorite policy of those States in reference to the public lands; while the others would take the opposite extreme in favor of the old States. Now, when we reflect that the new and the old States must necessarily, from their different position and relation to the public lands, entertain very different views of the policy that ought to be pursued in relation to them, in almost every point—so much so, that the one shall consider that but as the demands of justice which the other shall regard as nothing short of open plunder, as we have witnessed in this discussion—we may form some conception of the violence of the conflict which must ensue in the case supposed. We have had, even in this early stage, and on this very question, some indications of what we may expect. The most violent animosity and hatred would follow, and every man, be his motives ever so pure and patriotic, would be regarded the friend or the enemy of the new or the old States, as his opinions favored the policy of the one or the other. The final termination of the conflict would not be doubtful. Whatever turns of fortune might occur in its progress, the new States must, in the end, prevail. Their relative increase is far more rapid than the old; so much so, that after 1850—that is, after the third presidential election from the next—they would be left, as I have shown, the undisputed possession of the field. In the mean time, while the struggle is going on, the animosity would daily increase on both sides. The longer it continued the more bitter it would become, and the more certainly and completely would the present system be overthrown, if, indeed, the Union itself should be strong enough to withstand the shock. Such must inevitably be the fate of the present system, should we have the folly, I might say the madness, to attempt to continue it as it is, so far as the new States are concerned, regardless of the great changes which have already taken place, and the still more mighty in progress.

Having now pointed out the danger, I turn next to the deeply important question of remedy, which demands the most prompt and solemn consideration, both of the Government and the community. The question is, what means shall we adopt to avert the mischief which I have shown to be so rapidly approaching, and which must inevitably soon arrive, if not prevented by some speedy and efficient measure? Already one has been proposed, originally brought forward to relieve a distended Treasury of its burden, but which its author (the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. CLAY) has renewed on the present occasion, doubtless with the view, in part, at least, to meet the growing disorders of the system. His proposition is to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States, with the double view, I suppose, to a more equal participation in the advantages of the public domain by the members of the Union, and to preserve the present system by a more vigilant guardianship of the States. I do not now intend to discuss the merits of this measure. My object is simply to state, in general terms, my opinion in relation to it, without entering into the reasons on which it is grounded.

There appears, then, to me, to be great and decisive objections to the measure. The right to adopt it may, in the first place, be fairly questioned. We hold the public domain as a common property or fund, belonging to the States of the Union in their confederated, and not in their individual character. They were acquired either by purchase out of common funds belonging to the Union, or by cession from the States to the Union, to be held as a fund in common; and I am at a loss to conceive what right we have to make that which belongs to the whole Union as a common fund, the separate fund of each State. It seems to me that it cannot be done without a manifest breach of trust and a violation of the Constitution. This is no new opinion, formed for the occasion. It was, on the contrary, formed when its author first introduced the measure, and when he and myself thought alike as to the necessity of relieving the Treasury of its surplus, in order to avoid the difficulties and the dangers which have since followed. Believing, then, that it would be effectual for that purpose, and more easily adopted than any other, I examined it with an inclination to embrace it as a temporary measure of relief against a pressing evil; but it was impossible for me to bring my mind to assent to the right of adopting it.

But suppose this difficulty surmounted, there are others which I regard as insurmountable. Among them the fiscal objection is very formidable. The revenue from the lands cannot be spared at present, and if distributed, as proposed by the measure, would necessarily throw the whole expenses of the Government on a single source—the duties on imports—and which must be followed by their increase. This would neither be fair, nor equal; and to which I, representing in part a portion of the Union on which the increased burden would mainly fall, cannot assent.

But as formidable as is this, there are others far more so. It would not meet, or avert the approaching danger. It would still leave the public lands in the new States under the operation of the present system, and the subject of violent conflict between them and the old States, with all the calamitous consequences to which I have adverted. Instead of preventing the danger, it would, in fact, hasten and aggravate it. It may be laid down as a maxim, that no measure can avert it which is not adopted with the approbation and consent of the new States; for the simple reason that they must soon become the predominant power; when that which was established against their consent would be certainly overthrown. Such would be the case with the measure under consideration. If adopted, it must not only be without the consent of those States, but with their strenuous opposition, of which we have had the most conclusive evidence on the present occasion. When moved by its author, as an amendment to this bill, it was violently opposed at the threshold from that quarter, and received but a single vote from the new States. It is not necessary to inquire whether this opposition on their part is reasonable, or not; whether it is the result of mere prejudice, or of deliberate conviction that it is hostile to their interests. The fact itself, that there is an almost universal and determined resistance to the measure on their part, right or wrong, is, of itself, sufficient proof that it cannot be relied on to avert the threatening danger. On the contrary, its necessary effect must be to accelerate and aggravate it. Its adoption would, at once, bring the old and new States into violent conflict, in which the former would be arrayed, almost to a man, in determined effort to overthrow the arrangement, or some more hostile measure. Add to this that the presidential contest would not fail to run into the controversy, and thus redouble the excitement and animosity, with all the fatal consequences which I have shown must follow from blending the two.

Assuming, then, that the scheme is both objectionable and inefficient, the question again occurs, what ought to be done? My mind is made up, after the most serious and deliberate reflection, that there is, and can be, but one remedy; to cede—no, that is not the proper, the constitutional word—to dispose of the public lands to the States within the limits of which they respectively lie, on such terms and under such conditions as shall, at the same time, be just and liberal to the new States and safe to the old. We must, in a word, part with the ownership and administration of the lands lying within the States, leaving those in the Territories, and beyond, under the operation of the present system. The evil lies in ownership and administration, and without parting with them no permanent or effectual remedy can be applied.

But what shall be the terms—what portion of the proceeds of the sales of those lands shall be left to the States, to remunerate them for the expense, trouble, and responsibility of their administration, and what portion shall be paid over to the Government annually as a compensation for the land? I am not prepared to answer the question. Its decision must depend on a careful and minute examination of all the facts and circumstances of the case. But I am decidedly of the opinion that the portion to be left to the new States ought not only to be ample to cover the trouble, expense, and responsibility of management, but very considerably beyond, so as to unite their interests with ours, in order to give stability to the arrangement and insure care and fidelity in the management. Resting my estimate of the compensation on these principles, I have supposed that the new States might pay over annually one half of the gross proceeds of sales to the Government, and have an ample sum left for their compensation. But this is a mere estimate, without sufficient data, and is, of course, liable to be increased or diminished after a careful calculation founded on facts.

With these suggestions as to the terms, I next proceed to the conditions on which the lands ought to be disposed of. I propose to suggest only the most prominent, without pretending to a full enumeration.

In order to give stability to the arrangement, it will be indispensable that the whole transaction should assume the form of a compact; and for this purpose, that Congress should pass an act containing the terms and conditions of the transfer; and that each of the new States should pass one, on their part, to be irrevocable, assenting to the same, before it is made. The act of Congress should, of course, determine what part of the proceeds is to be paid annually to the Government, and the time and manner of payment; and also to provide for keeping regular books of accounts, to be open to the inspection of the Government, so that the exact state of the account between it and the States, may, at all times, be ascertained by the former.

The act of Congress should also contain all the prospective provisions which may become necessary in the future administration of the lands under the arrangement; and should then provide that the land laws, as modified by the act, and as far as they are applicable to the new state of things, shall remain unchanged, without the consent of Congress. A provision of this kind would be not less essential to the States, than to the Government. Without it there could be no stability nor uniformity. Without it the States would, in a short time, enter into a competition to turn the current of immigration, each towards itself, which would commence by a reduction of price, and end by a loss of the lands. But with the provision proposed, the system would retain its uniformity, and become more stable than at present.

To enforce the faithful execution of the compact, the act should also contain a provision that, in the event of the violation of the conditions of cession, all grants thereafter made by the State should be null and void. This would place the compact under the protection of the courts of the Union, and make it the interest of the State and its citizens to observe it. In this connection, the liberal allowance proposed to be made to the States, in order to unite their interests with ours, would be important. The revenue which they would derive from the land would be applied to roads, canals, or other improvements, that would create a powerful interest in favor of the arrangement; which, with the conditions proposed, and their sense of justice, would insure, I trust, on their part, a faithful execution of the compact.

Such, as it appears to me, should be the leading conditions; but, doubtless, there are many others which would be suggested by full and careful examination of the subject.

This, Mr. President, is the general outline of the measure which I propose as a remedy; and which brings up the important question, would it accomplish the object intended; that is, would it arrest the growing conflict between the new and the old States? Would it prevent the public domain from being converted into a fund to make Presidents, and to be squandered away in the struggle? And, finally, would it substantially, and more effectually than any other measure, secure to the Union the benefit of the public lands lying within the new States? It is the conviction that it is better calculated to secure these important results, than any other measure that can be devised, which has induced me to present it for consideration; and it is on that issue, exclusively, I intend to rest its fate. All I ask is a calm and impartial investigation, confidently believing it will bear the test, and willing to abide the result. Without attempting to enter on such an investigation now—for which I have not the necessary information, and, if I had, it would not suit the occasion—I propose to limit myself to a few very brief remarks in support of my conviction.

That a measure, such as I have suggested, if it should be adopted with the hearty consent of the new States, would arrest the growing conflict between them and the old, and take the public lands out of the vortex of the presidential contest, must be obvious on a little reflection. It would remove the cause of conflict, the only effectual mode of preventing the threatened danger. Transfer the lands, and the administration of them, on just and liberal terms, to the States, and close our land offices within their limits, and you will, at once, place the States beyond the reach of the action of the Government, and influence of executive control, and would thereby leave both the new and old, as far as the land question is concerned, free from all improper bias in the election of the Chief Magistrate. The only point of conflict that could possibly remain between them in reference to the lands, would be as to the conditions of the cession; but it may be easily shown, that if the terms should be liberal and satisfactory in the first instance, to the new States, as I have proposed, that they would neither have the disposition nor the interest to disturb the compact; or if they should, the hazard of losing the lands in consequence would be far less than it would be should the present system be continued. But there may be some who may admit this to be true, and yet object that the advantages which I anticipate from the measure would be purchased, on the part of the old States, at too great a sacrifice. It would be premature to undertake to answer this objection before it is ascertained what portion of the proceeds should be left to the States, and what paid over to the Government; and this cannot be done till after a laborious investigation, as has been stated. All I maintain at present is, that the portion allotted to the States should be not only just and liberal, but such as would interest them in preserving the arrangement. Thus far it would be obviously the interest of both parties, as has been shown. In the mean time, I have suggested an equal division of the proceeds, under the belief that it would be satisfactory to the new States, and probably not far from the division which a rigid investigation would establish.

But of one thing I feel assured, that, when the subject is fully examined, it will be ascertained that an apportionment of the proceeds may be fixed on which will give to the Government a sum per acre as large, or not much less, on all the lands which might thereafter be disposed of, as it has received for what has been disposed of since the present price was fixed; and which would leave, at the same time, to the States a liberal and satisfactory allowance. If this should prove to be the fact, the interest of all parties, even in a pecuniary point of view, would be reconciled. But that would be taking too narrow a view of this important subject. To determine correctly the true interests of the parties in this arrangement, we must raise our eyes above pecuniary considerations, to the far more interesting view—the political bearing of the measure. Thus viewed, the gain to both, and to the whole Union, would be incalculable. The new States would gain the ownership and administration of their whole domain—a gain not more essential to their own independence than to the convenience of their citizens, who would thereby have their claims, connected with the public lands, adjusted by their own Legislature, instead of being dragged to a great distance from home to await the tardy and uncertain action of Congress. But their greatest gain would be, that they would be elevated to an equality with the other States in all respects, and exempted from the controlling influence of the Government arising from a widely-expanded system of land offices.

To the Union the gain would be not less important. Congress would be relieved from an immense and increasing mass of business, which now consumes at least one third of its time, and be left free to turn its attention to other subjects of deep interest, which it is now compelled to neglect. The sessions would be greatly shortened—a matter of importance, not only in a pecuniary, but still more in a political point of view. But these, though important, are but minor advantages. There are others immeasurably greater. It would close our land offices in the new States, and, with them, the door to the vast patronage and influence which they place in the hands of the Executive. Who can estimate this advantage? Who is there, that has a particle of patriotism or love of republican institutions, who would not rejoice at the reduction of such immense patronage, made not only without injury, but with advantage, to the public? When we add to this that it would remove all causes of conflict between the old and new States; that it would withdraw from the presidential contest the public lands, that prolific source of corruption in the hands of the profligate; and, finally, that it would save our vast and noble domain itself from being squandered in the struggle, it is hardly in the power of calculation to estimate the advantages that would result.

Having now suggested what I believe to be the proper policy to be pursued in relation to the public lands within the new States, and hastily traced the advantages of the measure I have suggested for consideration, the next question is, have we the right to dispose of the lands in the manner proposed? I would not have supposed that there could have been a doubt on this point, had not the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] raised it on this, as well as on a former occasion. The Constitution gives to Congress, expressly, the right to dispose of the public lands; and why may they not dispose of them to the States as well as to individuals? I can see no reason, and never have heard one assigned. We are in the daily habit of making grants to the States for public purposes; and if we may grant, may we not also sell or dispose of them, as I have proposed? The lands belong to the States, in their confederate character, as has been stated; and Congress is the trustee to dispose of them for the common benefit. They are bound, in the fulfillment of the trust, to dispose of them to the best advantage; and if the disposition proposed be the best for all concerned, Congress has not only the right to make it, but would be bound by the trust so to do.

Entertaining these views, it may be asked why I have not brought forward the measure this session? My answer is, there is not time, at the present short session, to digest and carry through a measure of so much importance, and involving so many and such conflicting interests. But I pledge myself, if present at the next session, to introduce it at an early day, and to use my best efforts to press it to a decision. If I can prevent it, no other measure relating to the public lands shall take precedence of it.

I have now presented my views as to the policy which ought to be adopted in reference to the public lands within the new States; and it now remains, in conclusion, to assign my reason for voting against the engrossment of this bill.

Believing that nothing short of a radical change of policy, such as that proposed, can arrest the evils apprehended from the present system, I am of the opinion, that until some permanent remedy can be applied, the proper course is to vote against all partial and temporary expedients like the present; and I shall, in conformity to that opinion, give my vote against this bill. I believe it to be the course, not only the best calculated to insure, in the end, the application of a permanent and efficient remedy, but also to prevent, in the intermediate period, the mischiefs naturally resulting from the present system. But in addition to these general reasons, there are others against this particular measure, sufficient to induce me to vote against it. Passing others by, I shall only notice one.

This bill is pressed on the Senate, on the ground, among other reasons, that it is a financial measure. It is stated that the Treasury is deficit, and that one of the effects of the reduction of the price of the public lands would be a present increase of the revenue from that source. I am not prepared to say whether such would be the fact, not having examined the point sufficiently to form an opinion; but if it should be so, it would to me constitute an objection, instead of a recommendation. It is admitted that the increase of the revenue would be temporary, and be followed in a short time by a corresponding reduction. Now, if I am not mistaken, the income of this and the ensuing year will, without further addition to the revenue, be sufficient to meet the expenditures, with due economy, and timely and judicious retrenchment. The pinch will be in the two subsequent years—1841 and 1842—when six tenths of the entire reduction under the compromise act will take place. The difficulty will be in passing through those two years, and this bill, considered as a measure of revenue, instead of passing now, ought to be postponed until then. Its passage at this time would but increase the difficulty two years hence. Whatever it might add to the income of this and the next year, would serve but to increase their expenditures to the same extent. Experience has taught us that our expenditures increase with our income, and that if there be money in the Treasury, it will be spent, regardless of consequences. The result would be that, instead of aiding the Government to meet the fiscal crisis of 1841 and 1842, by increasing its income then, it would compel it to meet it under the great disadvantage of increased expenditures with diminished means. Under this belief, if there were no other objections, I would feel myself compelled to vote against the bill.

SWARTWOUT'S DEFALCATION.

DEFERRED HOUSE DEBATE.

January 19, 1839.

The SPEAKER having stated that the business first in order was the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, (who on the preceding day had been elected to fill one of the vacancies in the committee,) that he be also excused from serving on said committee—

Mr. TAYLOR rose and said that he felt it incumbent upon him to state the reasons why he had preferred this request, and he thought he should be able to assign such reasons as would be satisfactory to the House.

It is possible (Mr. T. continued) that I may be subjected to the charge made yesterday, of a design to delay and procrastinate the organization of the committee. If I know myself—if I know my own heart—such a design is furthest from my thoughts. It enters not into the reasons which have induced me to ask to be excused. I have felt anxious to have a committee appointed. It is due to the Administration, it is due to the country. I desire that the committee may be organized as early as practicable, and I have so expressed myself from the commencement of these proceedings. I hope, therefore, I shall not be charged with designedly delaying its organization. A majority of the committee has been selected from the opponents of the Administration, who appear to have a majority in this House upon this question. They have selected the committee to suit their own peculiar views, and have placed upon it six men upon their side of high legal attainments. And as they seem disposed to place upon it three Administration men, I ask whether it is not due to themselves, to the Administration, to the country, and to the cause of justice, that these should be, also, gentlemen of high legal attainments?

The duties of this committee will be not only onerous, but complicated; and if I rightly apprehend the nature of those duties, a general knowledge of law, and experience in the investigation of matters involving legal principles and proceedings, will be best calculated to aid in this investigation. An acquaintance, also, with the internal regulations of the Treasury Department, the details of its business, the duties of the different officers, &c., as well as some acquaintance with the internal regulations of the custom-house, would perhaps be of essential aid in the investigation of this case with facility. Now, I presume it is well understood that my profession and habits have been in a different channel. I make no pretensions to any particular acquaintance with the general principles of law, and particularly as applicable to the examination and cross-examination of witnesses; neither has my position on any committee of this House necessarily led me to much intercourse with the Departments, and the details of business there. My position on the Committee on Invalid Pensions may have been from the impression that my professional experience might render me more useful there than on some other committee. In the selection of committees, reference is usually had to the peculiar qualifications for the appropriate duties of the different committees; and it would hardly be expected of the Speaker that he would place on the Judiciary Committee farmers, mechanics, &c., men who have not those legal acquirements necessary to the investigation of the appropriate business of that committee, however well qualified they might be for the general discharge of their duties in this House. And if the standing committees were appointed by the House, the same rule would doubtless prevail. In matters of this kind I have no pride to gratify, and hesitate not to say that I have not those legal qualifications that I apprehend, from the nature of this investigation, will be best calculated to aid in the discharge of the duties of the committee.

I will now for a moment allude to the position assumed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in relation to this matter. That gentleman is, I suppose, to be considered as the head of the committee. He has pledged himself to the House and to the nation to convict the Secretary of the Treasury of corruption.

Mr. WISE asked leave to explain. I pledged myself (he said) that if you would give me a committee to inquire into the grounds of impeachment, and make it an efficient committee, I would show that the Secretary of the Treasury had so grossly violated his duty as to render himself liable to impeachment. But this committee proposes to inquire simply into the causes of the defalcations, the names of the defaulters, the extent to which the public moneys have been taken. This is another inquiry entirely, and my resolution lies there on the Speaker's table.

Mr. TAYLOR resumed. Well, sir, I stand corrected. I will take, then, the general position which the gentleman occupies towards the Administration, and particularly towards the Secretary of the Treasury. The relative position which he now occupies towards the Secretary of the Treasury is, that if he had a committee he would furnish matter for impeachment. Having, then, upon the committee now raised, a majority of those who it may be supposed will meet his views, and cooperate with him, I would ask the gentleman, and the party with whom he acts, if it is not due to the Secretary, to the Administration, and to a fair and impartial investigation, that there should be three, constituting the minority of the committee, whose peculiar professional education and experience in conducting matters of this sort would insure justice in the premises? I impute no improper motive to the gentleman. I speak of the natural impulses of the human heart; and I say, with the opinions which he has more than once expressed; with the convictions which he admitted yesterday; and with the natural prejudice of party feeling added, he is liable, in spite of himself, to be partial in conducting this investigation. It is in the human heart to be so. Standing there as he does, I again ask whether there ought not to be on this committee three friends of the Administration of those professional qualifications and experience best calculated to insure a fair and impartial investigation?

The gentleman from Virginia said yesterday that the course pursued on this floor, by asking to be excused, indicated to him a determination either to avoid or delay the organization of the committee, or to compel them to accept some picked men of the party, who, by their skill and qualifications, might delay or embarrass the operations of the committee. After all this, I must say, if I have been elected by the votes of the Opposition members of this House, for reasons indicated in those remarks, self-respect would compel me to decline the honor of serving.

In conclusion, I will say that I am at present chairman of a committee, the duties of which are important; and I have also other important duties to perform, connected with my situation as a member of this House; and but for these reasons which I have offered, I should not have appealed to the House to extend to me that courtesy which has been granted to others.

Mr. GRAY said he had not heretofore taken any part in this debate, nor was it his desire to do so. He was, however, disposed to join in the request which his colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] had made to be excused from serving on this committee, as it seemed to him that his reasons were conclusive. He has said that the duties which the committee will have to perform are of a nature peculiar to the legal profession. He has said, and said truly, that the gentlemen elected from the anti-Administration party are all lawyers of distinguished abilities. He has also said that his profession is not that of a lawyer, and that he has not, by profession or practice, been led to the investigation of rights and wrongs to such an extent as would fit him to be placed in competition with gentlemen whose education and practice had fitted them for this peculiar service in a greater degree than any other duty which they might have to perform in Congress. I do not pretend that the rules of evidence, studied by lawyers, are to be strictly observed in eliciting facts; but I do say that a knowledge of those rules, and the practice of years under them, give to those who have the theory and practice, upon this or any other investigating committee whose duty is to investigate the conduct of officers whose duties are prescribed by law, a decided advantage. The greatest adroitness exercised by lawyers is frequently exhibited in the examination of dishonest witnesses. I am not about to say that the committee, taken from the ranks of the enemies of the Administration, are so dishonest as to require watching, but these are times when party feelings run high, our prejudices are strong, we honestly come to different conclusions without prejudice; but when party prejudice beclouds our judgment, then are we more apt to differ, and then it is the duty of the committee to reason with each other. They may differ upon the construction of a statute prescribing a duty, the performance of which it may be their business to inquire into. Ought they, then, to select my colleague to reason upon a question of law? In the duties that devolve upon us here, I would, in almost ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, submit to his superior judgment. I would not ask a lawyer a question of physics, or think a physician a fit person to determine law matters. I have a question to submit to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in regard to his remarks in a former stage of this debate. If I misunderstood him, I hope he will set me right. I understood him at the onset of the debate, when the resolution for a committee was under consideration, to say that he could, on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, convict the Secretary of a gross violation of duty, and of negligence, before any twelve impartial men of his own party.

Mr. WISE explained. I said, and I now repeat, and have published what I said, and the evidence upon which I founded it, that upon document 297, showing the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury with the receivers and collectors of the public money, and the report of the commissioners appointed to examine those officers, the Secretary of the Treasury had been guilty of a gross violation of duty and of law, and that, in my opinion, there was evidence enough to convict him of a corrupt intent.

Mr. GRAY resumed. I understood the gentleman right, then; and in the remarks I am about to make, I beg to be understood as differing from him entirely. I attribute to him no improper motive, and repeat what I have before said, that our prejudices often mislead our judgments. I use his statements to show that it is due to him that three persons, the choice of the friends of the Administration, should be placed upon the committee, with the six first chosen who are opposed to the Administration, at least so far as this question is concerned.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, rose to a point of order, as to the relevancy of this discussion.

The SPEAKER declared that Mr. GRAY was in order.

Mr. GRAY resumed. My object in referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was to show that it was important for him that he should consult the wishes of the friends of the Administration in the choice of the three Administration men to be placed upon the committee. I submit it to him, and his political and personal friends, whether it may not furnish him with an argument with which to repel the imputations that may hereafter (in case the doings of the committee should reflect upon the Secretary of the Treasury) be cast upon him of prejudging the case. His opinion formed and expressed against the Secretary of the Treasury is strong. It may be said of him hereafter that he carried with him into the committee-room opinions founded upon a record of the Secretary's own showing; and will it not then be said that he was prejudiced and had prejudged the case? I repeat my assertion, it is due to the gentleman from Virginia, to his personal and political friends, that the Administration party should select their own men, that he may hereafter, if charged with having prejudged the case, be able to reply that he was confronted by three men of the Administration party chosen at the suggestion of the party.

Mr. WISE asked leave to say a word. The gentleman (said Mr. W.) does not argue this matter fairly. In the first place, I have to submit it to his candor and sense of fair dealing, whether it is proper and fair, at the very outset of this investigation, to attribute to me the character of prosecutor, instead of the character of inquirer? I will, at the same time, admit all that a sense of justice requires me to admit. Does the gentleman ask me if I have charged the Secretary with gross neglect of duty? I say, yes; it would be impossible to contradict it, for I have published it. Does the gentleman ask me if I have an intuitive, holy horror of the party that would tolerate these things? I answer, yes. I, sir, for the very reason the gentleman has assigned, would take the best and most efficient men of the party; but I would pick men whom I believe to be independent and conscientious; gentlemen who would not resort to useless cross-examinations, special pleading, and county court pettifoggery, to hinder and obstruct a fair investigation, and thus prevent us from making a report before the end of the session. Give us such men, and I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRAY] is, himself, one of that number. I will take him. I had respect for the intelligence, the honor, and the integrity of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR,] and therefore voted for him, the highest compliment I could pay to his intelligence and character.

Mr. GRAY resumed. The House will perceive that I am not dealing with the motives of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] nor do I wish to pursue an unfair course of argument. As matters now stand, such imputations will be made, and the course I suggest is to save the gentleman from such imputations, or furnish him with a reply to them when they are made. It is due to the Administration, and is as important to the gentleman from Virginia as the Administration, for the reasons I have stated, that three such men as the Administration may select from among the most sound and distinguished lawyers of the party should be put upon the committee.

Mr. SIBLEY rose, and suggested that there were in the New York delegation eminent lawyers, and that his colleague [Mr. GRAY] is one among the number. Mr. S. therefore inquired of his colleague, if he [Mr. GRAY] was elected, if he would serve on the committee?

Mr. GRAY resumed, and replied to his colleague [Mr. SIBLEY] that inasmuch as he could not respond to the compliment, he must decline answering the question, and proceed. The gentleman from Virginia seems to suppose that if such lawyers as the friends of the Administration should select should be put upon the committee, the time of the committee would be uselessly wasted by them in examining and cross-examining witnesses and pettifoggery, so as to render it impossible to come to any result before the session closes. Now does he not perceive that he arrogates to himself and his party that they would not do this? We, at most, only ask to elect one lawyer to two they have already elected. Does he not assume that one selected by us would take up twice as much time as one selected by them, and thus arrogate to himself and his party more integrity and intelligence than he is willing should be ascribed to others, in the ratio of two to one? It is no new idea that his party arrogate to themselves all the intelligence and honesty. We are not particular as to the individual we choose, as three out of a dozen, or a greater number, would suit us. We can give you twelve names, out of which you may select three. [Loud cries of "give us the names; we will take you at your word."] I am only desirous that each party should enter upon this investigation on fair terms, and not have what the gentleman from Virginia had so frequently called a stocked-pack committee. The argument for the appointment of the committee by the House was, that we might avoid what the gentleman himself had called unfairness in the Speaker in appointing the committee. The Speaker, according to custom, had appointed a majority of Administration men upon all-important committees, and had observed the will of those opposed to the Administration in regard to the minority appointments; and yet his committees were denounced as stocked-pack and sex-tres committees.

And what have the majority of the House now done, each man of them? Have they not done worse than the very thing they denounced in harsh terms when it was done by the Speaker? The difference—it is manifest, and consists in this: the Speaker regarded the will of the minority, so far as I have learned, in appointing the minority of select committees, appointed by him; the Opposition have disregarded entirely the will of the minority. That which is worse than a vice yesterday, is a virtue to-day. Now, if the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to use his term, sex-tres, I will not abuse it; I will apply it to the election of this committee. Is not this a sex-tres committee, in the worst sense? I do not wish to do injustice to any man in attributing to him a position, and hope, if I do so, I may be corrected at once. I repeat, is not this a "stocked pack," a "sex-tres" committee? And under what circumstances was it not argued by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that, if an election by the House could be had, a due regard would be had to all parties? And when the balloting came on, a dozen of the Administration party, whom I see around me, voted for three of the very men from the Opposition that are elected—men designated by their friends—men, too, for whom some of the Conservatives and Whigs even did not vote. And if as many Whigs had voted for the persons designated by us, the committee would have been organized two days ago. Upon what ground of fairness, then, are we charged with a desire to prolong or delay this investigation? Had we been met in any spirit of fairness, the committee would have been easily chosen. The sin does not lie at our door, but at the door of the Opposition. And now, again, in reference to my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] I desire not to be misunderstood. As a member of this House, taking all his duties into consideration, I think him among the first and ablest men in it. His constituents know that he is honest and capable, or they would not have thrice honored him with a seat on this floor. It is because he is an able man that he was elected to serve on this committee, that the Opposition might, when charged with unfairness, say, we elected one of your ablest men—there was some cunning in it. Be assured that he would not have been elected, had he been as highly qualified for serving upon this committee as he is for the discharge of any other duty that might, in the course of legislation, devolve upon him. It was treating him with unfairness. Would any one here employ a physician to try an ejection? Why, then, force him to serve on this committee, where constructions are to be given to statutes, and perhaps unwilling witnesses to be cross-examined? We have a feeling in this matter, a sense of justice, of self-respect, and of duty, which must prevent us from yielding to the election which has taken place. The self-respect of my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] prompts him to the course he has taken. And, under all the circumstances, should he not be excused by the House, and should he surrender his seat here in preference to his self-respect, which he is bound, by duty to his constituents and himself, to preserve, old Onondaga would hail and welcome him home, and set down his conduct on the occasion to a new account of credit.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said he wished the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRAY] would make the proposition he had spoken of, and thus save all further debate; otherwise the House might never be able to find out what he and his friends wanted. In selecting men to represent the Administration party on this committee, (Mr. P. continued,) we have chosen from among those who have been the most prominent actors here, and who have, on all occasions, put themselves forward to fight the battles of the Administration on this floor. If there is yet a corps in reserve, of which we know nothing, bring them forward, and let us make our selection.

This morning, (Mr. P. said,) in an ill-omened paper which lay upon his desk, he had seen that which indicated that there was no probability of organizing a committee. He would read a small portion of the croaking of the official raven. Mr. P. then read the following extract from the Globe:

"The three Democratic members elected, viz: 'Messrs. ELMORE, CUSHMAN, and HUBLEY, declined serving on the committee. When we left the House to close our paper, the Opposition majority, now notoriously obtained by the perfect amalgamation of the Conservative with the National Bank party, selected three other Democrats, to be made prisoners in the hands of the committee—having their arms locked by an enemy on each side, like the Daniel Boone's men, sent out to treat with the Indians beleaguering his fort. The hardy backwoodsmen soon found that the object of the savages was to make them prisoners, and acted accordingly. We have no doubt the Democrats will follow out successfully the part played by Boone's men on that occasion, and leave the Opposition to experience the fate of the perfidious enemy on that occasion, if their purposes should correspond, as the secret machinations in the appointment of the committee would seem to indicate."

Now, here was a proposition thrown out by the organ of the party, that no Democrat should serve, because, forsooth, they cannot get a majority upon the committee. After having professed themselves willing to act, they now come forward, and what do they say? Yesterday (said Mr. P.) personal considerations were urged, but to-day we hear nothing of that kind; but it is openly avowed that the reason why they will not serve is, that they will not act unless represented by three of their most astute lawyers. Was not the gallant gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. CUSHMAN,] who had taken upon himself the defense of the Secretary of the Treasury before the House, sufficiently acute to undertake a similar task before the committee? He is the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and ex-district attorney of New Hampshire. Is not he qualified to serve? And, if not, where are we to look for the men? Has not the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR,] with all his modesty, spoken ably and eloquently in defense of the Administration upon this very question, and upon the great Sub-Treasury scheme at the last session? And yet he says that he is not competent to serve. The very ingenuity with which he has made his argument, and the facility of speech with which he has urged his motion to be excused, show that if he is not a lawyer by study, he is, at least, a lawyer by nature. But I say that, by his very profession, he is better fitted to serve than another man. We are about to examine into the diseases of the Commonwealth; we want to probe them; we want to apply the purge and the knife; and, as I understand the gentleman is a distinguished disciple of Æsculapius, he is, of course, the very man for our purpose.

It is said there are six against three. If a man is free from all feeling of guilt, he has nothing to fear. The House has solemnly decided, and I thank God that such has been its decision, that they will not trust a committee appointed in the usual way. No; it was to be a committee sincerely favorable to investigation. Three have resigned, and three more have been recommended to do the same thing, although I do not insinuate that they have acted on that recommendation. But the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] is, that he does not understand the subject. Why, sir, the subject is one of common honesty, and I know he understands that. The subject is the exposure of corruption, and, according to the gentleman's argument, we ought to put none on the committee but professed rascals. If he "who drives fat oxen must himself be fat," if the committee ought to be composed of rogues, then I admit that the gentleman ought to be excused. But I ask the House whether he should be excused on the ground upon which he places it, that is: want of capacity and ability? The colleague of that gentleman [Mr. GRAY] has given us a sort of left-handed argument why he [Mr. TAYLOR] should be excused upon the ground of incompetency. Did any one ever assert that the latter gentleman was incompetent to be on any standing committee of this House? Would the gentleman say that his colleague was incompetent to do such duty? He was thought competent to be placed on a committee in relation to the banks, a much more difficult subject of investigation than this, in which the honest man is more needed than the lawyer. We wanted a committee of investigation, and we have got it; and we want honest men to watch over the interests of the Administration. We have tried to get them. Where is the corps of reserve of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRAY] has spoken? We did not know they had twenty men who were superior to the rest of their party. We thought there was a more democratic equality among them.

Mr. GRAY explained. He had not stated (he said) there were twenty men who were superior. He had said there were twelve, without having made any calculation as to the actual number. He presumed that there were more than that number who would be considered competent to serve. He had remarked that this was a service requiring qualifications of a peculiar character—that a lawyer was better fitted to examine witnesses than a physician. I spoke of them not as possessing the transcendent abilities of the Whig side of the House, because I knew, if I said so, that the statement would be disputed.

Mr. PRENTISS. Well, then, let us have the twelve fit men of whom the gentleman spoke.

Mr. GRAY. Before I could do that, it would be necessary to have some consultation with the friends of the party with whom I act. In saying what I did, I spoke merely my own opinion.

Mr. PRENTISS. It is not merely the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] who had asked to be excused. Three gentlemen yesterday made the same request.

Could there be a gentleman more fitted to serve than the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MARTIN?] I trust he will not decline, for he is a distinguished lawyer, though, as I have said, I do not regard that as the best qualification. I look upon it as secondary. We want honest, honorable, and upright men. And, in this point of view, I have full confidence in all the gentlemen selected, especially the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR.] I hope the House will not excuse him. I told you, the other day, that this matter would turn out like the web of Penelope, that we should unravel at night what we might weave in the day. This committee will have to deal with facts more than with law; and for its purposes I would rather have a farmer or a doctor than a lawyer. We gave you yesterday the ex-attorney of the State of New Hampshire. There, surely, you would have had the best of law; but he declined to serve. I believe another gentleman, who was also excused yesterday, [Mr. HUBLEY,] is a sound lawyer. What, then, do you want?

The other day, a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FAY,] quoted from a speech of mine, made in my own State, a passage in which I had said that the party in power had no leaders of distinguished ability in this House. This was a rash and unadvised assertion, and I now take it back. When I made it, I had not heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania; besides, I hear from the gentleman from New York that there are twenty members of the party who tower, by the head and shoulders, above the others. All I have to say is, bring them out; show us your gems, and we will set them in this committee, where they shall shine before men, and their light shall no longer be hidden by their own modesty or by our perversity.

UNITED STATES BANK BONDS.

DEFERRED SENATE DEBATE.

December 20, 1838.

The Resolutions of Inquiry, submitted yesterday by Mr. RIVES, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information relative to the sale of the bonds of the United States Bank, coming up for consideration,

Mr. RIVES went into a long detailed statement of the reasons for offering them. After which,

Mr. WRIGHT said: The Senate would not expect him to attempt to reply to so elaborate a speech as that to which they had just listened. He came to his seat with no expectation of such a debate. When the resolutions of the honorable Senator [Mr. RIVES] were offered yesterday, they excited in his mind no anticipation that an elaborate and set discussion would be entered upon at this stage of them. They were mere resolutions of inquiry. Their whole apparent object was to obtain facts, to learn the truth of the matters to which they related; and he could not have expected a debate upon the merits until the testimony had been obtained.

He should not, therefore, attempt to follow the gentleman in his extended remarks, or to reply to any part of his argument. It was his intention to occupy but a few moments of the time of the Senate, and to make but a few observations of an incidental character.

When the resolutions were offered, their object seemed to be fully and minutely expressed upon their face, and he was glad the honorable Senator had come forward with them. The inquiries were such as he desired might be made and fully answered, but he could not have anticipated that conclusions would be drawn and expressed here, before the facts were known, or that a call for testimony would be made to follow a judgment upon the issue.

He was as ignorant as the honorable Senator, [Mr. RIVES,] who had spoken with so much warmth, and in terms of such strong censure, as to the nature, or character, or extent, of the connection which had been formed between the public Treasury and the Pennsylvania bank, nor was the gentleman more desirous than himself that the truth as to that connection, whatever it might be, should be fully known; that all the facts should be exposed to the view of the whole country; that nothing should be hidden, or concealed, in relation to it. Hence he was pleased to see the resolutions, and should cheerfully vote for them.

It was true, he had learned through the public prints, that the Secretary of the Treasury had, during the vacation, sold one of the bonds held against the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, which, by a special law passed at the last session of Congress, he was expressly authorized to do. He had also heard through the same channel, and from the same authority, that the sale had been made to the bank itself; to the institution against which the bond was; but the information caused no surprise, no alarm, in his mind, because he supposed that the state of the Treasury and the amount of appropriations by Congress were such as to require the sale of at least one of the bonds to enable the Department to pay the public creditors. Neither had the circumstance that the sale had been made to Mr. Biddle's bank, to the institution which owed the debt, given him any apprehension, as he had been confiding enough to believe that the only offer, or the best offer, to purchase had come from that quarter, and that, for that simple reason, the Secretary had made the sale there. The law compelled the Secretary of the Treasury to get the best price he could command in the market for the bonds, in case he found it necessary to sell them, and prohibited him, in any event, from selling at a price below the par value of the bond. Mr. W. had been credulous enough to believe that the sale was made to the Pennsylvania bank because the law compelled the Secretary to sell to that institution, it making the only, or the most advantageous, offer for the bond placed in the market. It was possible he had been too confiding; but he had believed, when he first heard of the sale, that this was its explanation; and he had not now a doubt that such would prove to be the truth of the case, whenever the Secretary of the Treasury should have an opportunity to answer the inquiries of the Senator.

If the honorable gentleman did not entertain the same confidence in the executive officers of the Government as himself, he could regret the fact, but it gave him no right to complain, nor did he complain that it was so; though when the Senator had assumed to himself the character of an inquirer after the facts, and then had felt at liberty, before his inquiry was made, to draw inferences, and pronounce conclusions of a highly censorious and condemnatory character, which inferences and conclusions could, with justice, only be drawn from the facts to be inquired after, he did feel, and must express disappointment and regret. Had it been his case, whatever might have been his feelings towards the executive officers concerned, however much he might have distrusted their intelligence, or integrity, or official faithfulness, if he had proposed to inquire and to call upon them to answer, he would have allowed them the opportunity to answer, before he would either have censured or condemned; and he must say, that it would have afforded him sincere gratification, if the Senator from Virginia had found it consistent with his feelings and sense of duty to have pursued that more just and generous course.

At the opening of the honorable Senator's speech, Mr. W. was led to suppose that an opportunity for sincere congratulation was to be afforded to himself and the majority of the Senate. They had long looked upon the dangers and mischiefs attendant upon any connection between the Treasury of the nation and banks of any character, as among the most serious and alarming evils which had grown up under the administration of our republican system of Government, while the Senator had, heretofore, but too successfully defended that connection. His early remarks seemed to present it now to his mind, charged with such horrible and frightful consequences that Mr. W. could not but suppose that he, and those with whom he had acted, were again to have the powerful coöperation of the able Senator, in breaking up and eradicating forever that unnatural, improper, and vicious connection. In this, however, he had met hasty disappointment, as it seemed to be the connection with a single bank, and not a connection with banks generally, which had given the Senator his deep alarm, and drawn down upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President, his unmeasured censures. It was a connection with Mr. Biddle's bank, with the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, which had thus aroused the Senator's eloquence and indignation.

Even here, however, Mr. W. found cause for earnest congratulation. He well remembered that, upon repeated occasions within the last two years, when he, and other friends who entertained opinions in accordance with his own, had made their feeble attempts to arouse the honorable Senator himself, the Senate, and the country, to a sense of the dangers and corruptions of that giant institution, they had been calmly and confidently told by the Senator, and others who then acted with him, that they were practicing an imposition upon the country; that they were attempting to conjure up the ghost of a buried enemy—a phantom—a mere shadow to produce alarm and apprehension; that the Bank of the United States, in any form of existence, was effectually destroyed, was dead and buried, never again to be disinterred to alarm or injure the people; that our apprehensions were too late, and were unreal.

Notwithstanding these repeated and positive assurances, which, coming from the sources they did, he always desired to consider friendly and sincere, Mr. W. had never for a moment permitted himself to be misled or deceived by them. There never had been a moment when he had considered the dangers from that institution at an end, or materially lessened. The change of its form, from a National to a State institution, connected with the facts which accompanied and characterized that change, had given no relief to his apprehensions, and they were now, at this moment, as lively, and active, and strong as they had ever been.

Not so with the honorable Senator. There had been a time when he had considered these dangers as not sleeping merely, but buried forever; and that he had now again become sensible of their existence, of their magnitude, and of their impending character, was a matter of just congratulation to Mr. W. If they could not agree about the banks generally, the Senator's speech of this day had proved that about this particular banking institution they did and could agree. Here again they could meet and unite their labors for the general benefit of the whole country. Not a man in these seats could have failed to feel the dangers and mischiefs of this great banking institution, as the Senator had so eloquently, and forcibly, and vividly depicted them. To Mr. W. the effort had not raised new apprehensions, but confirmed all former impressions; and he would now promise the Senator, and all others, his most anxious coöperation in any efforts finally and forever to remove the particular dangers so clearly pointed out, and all dangers to our republican institutions of a like character, come from what description of banking institutions they might. He would repeat that he was entirely ignorant of the connection now formed between the Treasury and this dangerous institution. He was willing and desirous to let the Secretary of the Treasury answer that inquiry. He believed it was only a connection growing out of the sale of the bond to which he had before referred, and growing out of that sale in the manner he had pointed out; that it was necessity, arising from the law of Congress directing the sale, and not from the choice of the executive officers. If it was any other or different connection, he was further ready to say that it had been formed without his knowledge or consent, and should not meet his approbation. Here he had been and was still willing to rest his comments upon this matter.

Neither the honorable Senator nor the body he addressed would expect him, upon an occasion like this, to go into a general debate upon the Independent Treasury bill, or to follow the Senator through that large portion of his remarks. It had appeared to him that the gentleman had, as he himself admitted, indulged extensively in the wide field of debate allowed by the courtesy of the Senate, in this part of his speech; but as Mr. W. had arisen to remark upon the spirit and temper of the speech, rather than to answer its argument in any aspect, he should be justified in passing this portion without notice.

There was another feature of the address, however, which fell more appropriately than any other within the limits he had prescribed for himself, and which must receive attention. It was the extraordinary position assumed by the Senator, that the political opinions of the President, and the course and policy of his Administration, were to be interpreted and proved by a letter from Nicholas Biddle, voluntarily published in the newspapers of the country. Was it upon such evidence that the President of the United States was to be judged and condemned? Was his democracy and his attachment to republican principles to be tried by such a test? Had his publicly expressed opinions, and the public course of his whole life, authorized a judgment against him upon such evidence? Mr. W. had never yet seen the letter alluded to, but he had heard of it, and he now found the honorable Senator a perfect master of its contents. All this was well, as a matter with which he had nothing to do, and about which he felt no anxiety. All he wished to say was, that his friends were not to be bound by its terms, its language, or its spirit, until they were made parties to it by some higher proof than the letter itself. He had never yet judged them by such a standard, nor should he ever do so, until they had been permitted to hear and answer the charges thus predicated.

Even this letter, however, had not answered the purposes of the honorable Senator, and a different, and not less singular, description of testimony had been brought in to supply the deficiency in the argument he had attempted to make. What was that other proof? The comments of opposition newspapers upon Mr. Biddle's letter! The remarks and inferences of the Baltimore Chronicle upon that singular production! Mr. W. was not disposed to extend remark upon such a case, based upon such evidence, and coming from such a quarter. He would, therefore, only add, that such never had been, and such never should be, the standard by which he would judge his friends. Neither the President, nor the Secretary of the Treasury, should ever receive condemnation from him upon such authority. If they were to be convicted of a design to fasten upon the country a national bank of any character, he must learn the fact from better authority than the Baltimore Chronicle, or the comments of any other Opposition newspaper, before he should subscribe to the verdict.

A single other position of the Senator should receive a passing notice, and Mr. W. would come to a conclusion. A charge had been preferred against the President, of the gravest character, drawn from the face of his late message. It was said that he had made an arrogant and unconstitutional recommendation, calculated to sink Congress from its high estate to the feet of the Executive; that, in that recommendation, the disposition to render the executive superior and paramount to the legislative power of the Government was conclusively manifested. What was the specific charge, from which this grave inference was so confidently drawn? It was that the President had recommended that a committee of Congress, to be appointed by the body, should examine, at intervals, the books, accounts, and money in the hands of the officers charged with the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public moneys, as such committee had been authorized by the charter of the late Bank of the United States, when it was the depository of the public money, to examine its accounts. For what purpose did the President propose this examination? The Senator says, that the committee might make report thereof to the President; that a committee of Congress might be made the servants of the Executive, and might be brought to the foot of the throne to give an account of their doings, instead of making a report to the two Houses of Congress, of which they themselves would be a component part, and which, as independent representatives of the people, or the States, they could do without humiliation or disgrace.

Mr. W. would appeal to the Senator himself to say if this was a fair or candid statement of the recommendation of the President? Did it convey to the Senate, to this audience, to the country, a true idea of the message, and of the views and wishes of the President as communicated in it? He did not charge the Senator with intended unfairness or want of candor. With his intention he had nothing to do, but his inquiry went to the fact. Was the representation of the Senator fair and candid in fact? Let the message itself answer. This is its language:

"When the late Bank of the United States was incorporated, and made the depository of the public moneys, a right was reserved to Congress to inspect, at its pleasure, by a committee of that body, the books and the proceedings of the bank. In one of the States whose banking institutions are supposed to rank amongst the first in point of stability, they are subjected to constant examination by commissioners appointed for that purpose; and much of the success of its banking system is attributed to this watchful supervision. The same course has also, in view of its beneficial operation, been adopted by an adjoining State favorably known for the care it has always bestowed upon whatever relates to its financial concerns. I submit to your consideration whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys. The frequent performance of this duty might be made obligatory on the committee in respect to those officers who have large sums in their possession, and left discretionary in respect to others. They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for; and report, also, to Congress, at the commencement of each session, the result of their examinations and proceedings. It does appear to me that, with a subjection of this class of public officers to the general supervision of the Executive, to the examinations by a committee of Congress at periods of which they should have no previous notice, and to prosecution and punishment as for felony for every breach of trust, the safe-keeping of the public moneys, under the system proposed, might be placed on a surer foundation than it has ever occupied since the establishment of the Government."

Has the criticism of the gentleman presented this recommendation, or rather suggestion, fairly and candidly? For what purpose does the President suggest that this committee should report to him, and what does he suggest should be reported to him? "They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist," says the message, and for what? "With a view to a prompt removal from office." But what further are the committee to do? "And report, also, to Congress, at the commencement of each session," what? "The result of their examinations and proceedings." Is here an attempt to evade the Legislature, and draw power to the Executive? The power of removal from office rests with the President by the Constitution, and it is only to advise him when the exercise of that power is required for the safety of the public money that a report to him from the committee of examination is suggested. Is that an attempt to degrade the legislative power and bring it into subserviency to the executive? Does it manifest a disposition to bring down Congress from its high estate? Who would hold a committee of Congress blameless which should find a defalcation such as is contemplated in the message, and should not immediately report the defaulting officer to the President, "with a view to a prompt removal from office" of the delinquent? Would a single Senator who heard him hold a committee guiltless which should omit this plain public duty? Was it then a crime in the President to suggest the performance of it? Or was it an offense against Congress to mention, as proper, what all were compelled to admit would be an imperious obligation? He could not anticipate such a conclusion from such premises. Was it, then, fair or candid to have commented with such severity upon the suggestion, and not to have stated the object of the report proposed to be made to the President, or the fact that a full and perfect report to Congress was also recommended? He could not so consider it.

Had the remarks which had fallen from the Senator proceeded from one of the gentlemen declaredly in the opposition, his surprise would have been less. They did not always, in the warmth of debate, and acting under feelings of general political hostility, feel bound to give their opponents an opportunity to be heard before they bestowed censures, nor did they always find it suitable to their purposes to state the whole case upon which to found the inferences they might wish to draw. But from a Senator standing in the relation to the Administration which he had supposed the gentleman from Virginia did, he had expected fairness and candor, at least; that if a judgment of condemnation must be rendered, it would be after, and not before, an opportunity had been afforded to present the facts upon which it must rest; and that a statement of the whole case would be spread upon the record.

He had, however, doubtless mistaken the position of the Senator. He remembered that some person had, during the summer past, defined the condition of a certain political party of the country to be that of "an armed neutrality," in reference to the two great contending parties of the day. Of this party, he believed the Senator called himself a member, and from his speech of this day it was plain that he (Mr. W.) must have been mistaken as to the true definition of an "armed neutrality." He had supposed it indicated a relation purely defensive, but he must suppose, from the example the Senator had presented, that it was one wholly offensive; that it was exclusively belligerent, and authorized offensive war upon all parties. In this sense, all cause for his surprise and disappointment was removed.

But if there was anything of neutrality in the relation in which the Senator had placed himself to-day towards the party to which he belonged, it was surely an armed neutrality at the best.

To these remarks Mr. RIVES replied at some length, and Mr. WRIGHT rejoined in a very few words, and substantially as follows: He did not wish to protract this debate, and he found it so impossible to make himself understood by the honorable Senator [Mr. RIVES] that he should not attempt to answer him further. He would further assure the gentleman and the Senate, that he should not permit himself, in any degree, to partake of the heat and passion which had characterized the last remarks to which they had listened. He rose for a single purpose, to correct a single error. The Senator had represented Mr. W. as menacing him with executive displeasure; as attempting to terrify him by the dread of executive censures. He had done no such thing, nor had he, to his knowledge, said anything from which such an inference could be possibly drawn. The Senate were the witnesses of what he had said, and he appealed to them, individually and collectively, to say if the language he had used was possibly susceptible of any such interpretation. He would go further, and say that no intention to use language of that character had existed in his mind, and he could not think he had made expressions so foreign from his feelings and intentions. He was not authorized to speak of executive displeasure or to wield executive censures, nor had he attempted to do either.

A single other remark. If the inference which might follow from the last remark of the Senator was intended for him, he repelled and spurned it.

Mr. RIVES rose as Mr. WRIGHT was resuming his seat, and inquired to what remark of his Mr. WRIGHT alluded, saying he did not know what allusion was intended.

Mr. WRIGHT said he understood the Senator to have closed with the words, "I am no vassal of the President. Let the Senator from New York understand that."

Mr. RIVES, turning from Mr. WRIGHT, and addressing the Senate, said, I am not a vassal of the President, or any one else, and I wish that understood everywhere.

Mr. NILES remarked that the war, among neutrals, had become so warm, at least on one side, that it might be dangerous for him, being a quiet, peaceable man, to interfere, even for the purpose of moderating the fierceness of the conflict. He certainly felt obliged to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] for introducing these resolutions; he desired, as much as the Senator, a full investigation of the conduct of the officers of the Treasury in the management of the finances. The inquiries were all very proper; at any rate, he had no objection to any of them, or any others which the Senator may choose to make. If there has been any illegal or improper connection between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States, or any other banks, he would be one of the last to justify it. He would not, however, imitate the Senator's example of condemning the Secretary first, and then inquire into his conduct. This was not in accordance with his notions of justice and propriety, although, perhaps, it may be with those of this new school of politicians, belonging to the "armed neutrality."

Mr. N. said he should vote for the resolutions, and could assure the honorable Senator that he would have voted for them without the eloquent and very temperate speech by which they had been sustained. He thought well of the resolutions, and would not stop to inquire what the motives or object of the mover might be; it was to be presumed that they were purely patriotic, and having reference solely to the public interest. And he was sorry he could not say as much of the Senator's speech; but it did appear to him that that was not exactly in the right tone; it was a little too warm for a neutral, and especially as the occasion seems to have been sought by the Senator.

The substance of it also appeared to him to be somewhat objectionable. Resolutions are offered proposing certain inquiries touching the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury; and on the consideration of these resolutions the Senator makes a speech full of crimination, condemning the Secretary for the very acts about which the resolution asks for information. It seemed to him that it would have been quite as candid and fair to have obtained the information first; and then to have predicated the accusations upon it.

But what have we witnessed? A resolution of inquiry is introduced, which is immediately changed into a bill of indictment against the Administration and all its supporters. And what is the proof by which the charges preferred in this bill of indictment are attempted to be sustained? Why, it is the declarations and accusations of the avowed and sworn enemies of the Administration; the statements and charges of the most reckless and depraved of the Opposition presses, whose vocation it is to falsify and misrepresent every act and measure of the Government, right or wrong. And first and foremost of this formidable array of witnesses, is introduced a very important person, who has acted a conspicuous part in the seven-years' war, to which the Senator has alluded. This is no less a personage than Nicholas Biddle, one of the belligerent parties to this very war. Well, what does this witness say in support of the gentleman's bill of indictment? Why he says that the war between the Government and the bank has ceased; that peace, or at least a truce, has taken place; that he had a negotiation with the Government, and purchased in his bonds; and that the Government has treated him very fairly.

Now, sir, (said Mr. N.) although I have no fault to find with this testimony, yet, as the Senator boasted that this witness stood so high in reputation that he could not be impeached, he was disposed to offer a witness standing equally high to impeach him. The witness he had to offer was this same Nicholas Biddle, who, in his celebrated manifesto, issued on the 5th of April last, gave his testimony regarding this war. He said that it was a war carried on by the Government, against the "credit system;" that both parties were in the field face to face; that it was a life and death struggle; a war of extermination, in which there could be no compromise or accommodation, but that one or the other must fall. Now, according to this witness last April, there can have been no peace or truce between the Government and the bank, much less an alliance offensive and defensive, as the Senator intimates. If the assertions of Mr. Biddle, at one time, are in direct contradiction to his statements at another, according to the rules of testimony he was a discredited witness, and his testimony must go for nothing.

Of the other witness, on whom the Senator has relied to support his charges against the Administration, consisting of the Baltimore Chronicle and other Opposition presses, he was not disposed to speak. If the Senator looks to such sources for correct information concerning the acts of the executive officers, he was not disposed to follow him into that field. How long the Senator had been in the habit of judging of the measures of the Administration, from information derived from such sources, Mr. N. could not say; but he believed the time was not distant, when the Senator had as little confidence in the statements of these honest bank organs, as he had himself.

This, Mr. President, is the testimony on which such serious charges are made against the Administration, and sustained with so much earnestness and warmth. And not only have the past acts of the Executive and Secretary been condemned on intelligence derived from such sources, but the future and intended measures of the Administration are ascertained from the same honest channels of information. Looking at the Administration through such a medium, both to discover what it has done and what it intends to do, who can doubt that the Senator will form a most candid and impartial judgment of its measures and purposes.

Mr. N. said he did not propose to go into the various matters which had been introduced into this debate, or to notice the numerous charges and insinuations against the Administration which had been thrown out.

His principal object was to call attention to several positions which had been assumed. The first and most important was the declaration that the seven-years' war was at an end. That the Government had not only given up the contest, but had been obliged to succumb to the bank, and had made a dishonorable peace, and even entered into an alliance, defensive and offensive, with the bank. He (Mr. N.) congratulated the Senate and the country on this highly important fact, about which he supposed there could now be no doubt. It was announced the other day by Mr. Biddle himself; but coming in rather a questionable shape, and, connected with other marvelous statements of the doings of the bank, many doubted it. It is now, however, confirmed by the honorable Senator from Virginia; and by the mouth of two witnesses every fact shall be established. Surely, sir, it should be a subject of general rejoicing that this long controversy is closed; that this seven-years' war is terminated; that peace again reigns in our borders. For several years past, and particularly during the extra and the last session of Congress, we heard little else from the other side of this Hall, whether from the large or small division of the Opposition, but war speeches and panic speeches. The war of the Government upon the banks was held up to the country as the most alarming state of things; as having occasioned the prostration of credit, the derangement of the currency, the suspension of the banks, the ruin of commerce, and the entire business of the country. Even our civil institutions, and the liberties of the country, were to be overthrown by this cruel and relentless war which the Government was waging against the banks. The most eloquent appeals were made to the people to arouse from their lethargy, and interpose their mighty arm before it was too late, and save their dearest interests from destruction. The interest of the banks was the interest of the people; and a war upon the banks was a war upon the people—a war which affected every class and every interest; the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the capitalist and the laborer, all were suffering, languishing under the effects of this ruinous and destructive war upon the banks and the credit system.

This is the language, sir, which but a few months since was almost daily heard within these walls. Hostility to the banks and the credit system was the great and besetting sin of the Administration, which swallowed up all others. But what do we hear now from the same quarter? Why, sir, will it be believed when it goes forth to the country that a Senator, who was most zealous and constant in declaring and repeating the charges of hostility to the banks, is now the first to arraign and condemn, unheard, the same Administration for having terminated a war which was declared to be so destructive to the best interests of the country, of having succumbed to the monster, and made a dishonorable peace, and formed a dangerous alliance with him?

What, sir, are we to think of this? Were gentlemen then sincere? Did they really believe in the actual existence of a war, prosecuted by the Government against the banks and its ruinous consequences, which filled them with such fearful apprehensions; or were they attempting to hold up this bugbear to frighten the people, to alarm their imaginations, to exasperate their feelings, the more effectually to enlist them in the only war which had any real existence in fact—a war by the politicians, aided by the banks, upon the Administration and a majority of the people who sustained it?

Surely, sir, if the gentlemen believed in the existence of the bank war, of which they have had so much to say, and the evils of which they have portrayed in such glowing colors, they should be the first to rejoice at the return of peace; at a restoration of a good understanding between the Government and the banks.

These gentlemen of the armed neutrality appear to be very difficult to please. During the last two sessions the whole burden of their complaints was the hostility of the Administration to the banks; and now they arraign the same Administration, pursuing the same general policy, for being too friendly to the banks, and for forming an alliance with Mr. Biddle's bank. But whether these neutrality politicians are pleased with this new aspect of things or not, it must be gratifying to all who have confided in their speeches and declarations heretofore, to learn that this great source of danger and mischief to all their interests—the bank war—is at an end.

Mr. N. said there was another point which seemed to be concealed in this debate, which he also thought a subject of just congratulation. It was that the danger of a Treasury bank, which was so alarming at the last session, had entirely disappeared. The country had escaped that awful peril. We were then told that that "execrable measure," the Independent Treasury, would result in a Treasury bank springing from the revenues of the Government and the drafts and transfers of the Treasurer. The Sub-Treasury plan has been in practical operation during the past year, and does not appear to have resulted in a Treasury bank. Instead of that we are now told of an alliance between the Treasury and the Bank of the United States.

There was another subject of congratulation, which, if not conceded in the debate, was, he thought, fully established by what we have witnessed on this occasion. He alluded to the "half-way house." That was gone, demolished, and swept away with the bank war and the Treasury bank. Sir, it is gone: not a vestige of it remains; and its tenants made a timely retreat from it before its fall, and passed on to the end of the road in which they had started, and have now arrived at the marble palace, where they were, no doubt, kindly received by the old occupants, with the friendly salutation, "Gentlemen, we are happy to see you; will you please be seated, and make yourselves at home."

These changes were all important; he rejoiced at them, and did not doubt that the country would rejoice. We have got clear of the bank war, of the imminent danger of a Treasury bank, and of the half-way house, which was an obstacle on all sides; the coast now seemed to be pretty much clear. We have, however, it seems, an armed neutrality, a belligerent peace party, or neutrals who coöperate with one of the belligerents. Of the "armed neutrality," of which the Senator from Virginia seems to admit himself the head, he would say nothing, as he did not perhaps understand its true character. But he knew something of neutral politicians, whether armed or unarmed; he had watched the course of them for thirty years; and from the days of Aaron Burr to the present time, they had always been the same. The history of one was the history of all. He knew well what their neutrality was in its first, second, and third stages. All deserters from the Democratic party at first assume the character of neutrals, or no-party men; and whilst in this transition state, which was sometimes a longer and sometimes a shorter period, they carry on a war against their old friends and old principles, under their old flag. This, sir, has been the course of neutral and no-party politicians in this country. Whilst maintaining the character of armed neutrals, they fight under a piratical flag; and at the end of six months or one year, they throw to the winds the Democratic banner, and take their station in the ranks of their former enemies; when after having, for some brief months, declaimed eloquently against party and party spirit, they become the most intolerant, malignant, and persecuting partisans the country has ever witnessed. For the truth of this statement, he appealed to the political history of the country; he appealed to existing facts. Look round these Halls; look into the State Legislatures; cast your eye over the whole country; take a view of recent alarming scenes which are now enacting in one of the great States of this Union, and then say who are the most violent, unscrupulous, and reckless political partisans in the country; who push selfish party measures to the greatest extremes, breaking over the barriers of the Constitution and laws, and trampling right and justice under their feet? It will be found, sir, in almost every instance, that the bold, daring, and reckless politicians, are deserters from the popular cause, and at some short period have declaimed eloquently against the abuses of party. Mr. N. said he spoke of general principles, but made no application of them; he passed no judgment upon the motives and purposes of any one; he presumed all here to be actuated by high and honorable motives.

The Senator from Virginia concluded with an eloquent appeal to the friends of the Administration to throw aside their groveling, selfish, party purposes, to break asunder the trammels of party, and elevate their views to the great interests of their country. This appeal, sir, under other circumstances, might have been commendable; it might have been worthy of the Senator, and honorable to the noble Commonwealth he represents. But under what circumstances was it made? It was the conclusion of a speech uncalled for by the occasion, intemperate in its tone, and throughout characterized by unfounded and unsupported charges and criminations against the Administration and all its supporters.

If a professed friend (said Mr. N.) should meet me in the street, and after abusing me with hard words, beat me over the head with his cane, and then say to me, "Sir, let us now be friends; these strifes and contentions not only render us unhappy, but they are annoying to the whole community; let us elevate our feelings above these low and base passions." In such a case, I should be a little inclined to doubt the sincerity of the eloquent appeal made to my more elevated feelings.

Who has betrayed any warmth of party feeling in this debate, or during the present session, unless it be the Senator himself?

He speaks of the high and exalted considerations by which he is actuated, rising above the mists of party, and looking only to the great interests of the country. Of the Senator's motives, aims, and purposes, he had nothing to say; but he wished the gentleman to understand, that however pure, disinterested, or elevated they may be, they are not more so than those of the Senators to whom he addressed his appeal.

We are called on to abandon the ruinous Sub-Treasury scheme, and are told that it has been condemned by the country. Is the Senator quite sure he is not mistaken? Occupying the position he does, at the head of an armed neutrality, he may not have been the most impartial observer of passing events. Sir, a greater mistake was never made. No impartial observer can have mistaken the elections of the past year. They have spoken a language which cannot well be misunderstood. The financial question has been before the country; it has been discussed, examined, and is becoming understood. The people have looked at it, not in its details, but at the great principle of the entire disconnection of the finances of the Government from those of the banks, who desire to use the public money for their own benefit; and they are satisfied that it is founded in right and justice. That is enough for them; they wish to look no further. Whether it will injure the banks or not, is of no consequence with them; if satisfied the measure is right and just, they desire to see it carried out. The mass of the people are honest, and they love justice above all things. The only difficulty has been that the subject was not sufficiently understood. That difficulty is passing away. The people now understand this question; they have examined it, and decided upon it. It is no longer in the power of all the combined talents in these Halls, however great, to mystify this subject or hood-wink the people. They have considered it well, and the elections have announced their verdict; their voice has been heard from the mountains to the valleys, and from the lakes to the Atlantic. It is the voice of approbation. If this question could this day be fairly submitted to the direct action of the people, at least two thirds of the electors in the United States would be found in its favor. And yet we are called on to abandon the measure on the ground that it has been condemned by the people, and told that it is a mere party measure. To abandon it, sir, would be to betray our trusts, to betray the people, to disregard their known will, to trample upon their rights. Yet this is the way the Senator invokes us to elevate our minds above the low, selfish, and groveling purposes of party.

Mr. N. said he forbore to notice various other matters touched upon by the Senator, as his principal object in rising was, to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the new positions which are assumed. Sir, the alarming evils which have so long threatened the ruin of the country, have suddenly disappeared, and that without any change of policy on the part of the Administration; for to regard the negotiation of a bond to the Bank of the United States as constituting a change, would be trifling with the subject. The bank war, which had so long afflicted the country, bringing so many evils in its train, is at last terminated. The day of panics is gone, and we may now expect quiet and prosperity. The Sub-Treasury bill is in practical operation, and we have escaped that great and alarming peril, a Treasury bank. We have also got rid of the half-way house, and nothing now remains but the armed neutrality, and that ever fertile theme of declamation, executive influence. That, sir, still remains, and will remain as long as this Government endures. It has been, now is, and will continue to be, a subject about which many great, good, and just men will entertain apprehensions of danger to our institutions; and they will eloquently and earnestly warn the people against this danger. In his opinion, this was not the weak point in our political fortress; it was not the place where the first breach would be made. But whilst many honest and good men will point to this source of danger, and raise their warning voices against the increase of executive power, there will at all times be other men, who will declaim eloquently and earnestly against the abuses and the increase of executive power, executive patronage, and executive influence, for other and far different motives and purposes.

PUBLIC DEFALCATIONS:

SPEECH OF HON. A. DUNCAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 17, 1839,

On the Resolution providing for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout.

Mr. DUNCAN said he had been anxious to obtain the floor for some days, to participate in the discussion of this resolution, but he had not succeeded in his attempts to catch the Speaker's attention; and although he sometimes felt disappointed, at the moment, that he was not permitted to do something towards arresting the unbroken torrent of abuse which has been daily and hourly poured upon the heads of the Administration, from the first day of the session to this time, yet he felt pleased that his rights were deferred till now. The unbounded range which the debate has taken, and the unlimited privilege tolerated by the Chair to those who had entered the discussion, by which every subject of the political or human character, proper and improper to be talked of, here or elsewhere, has been drawn into the vortex of discussion, and all attempted to be made to bear upon this Administration, to its prejudice, and to the destruction of the confidence of the people in it, whose Administration it is, I say that I do not regret that I have been deferred until now, because the course and spread the debate has taken gives me a wider space to move in. I trust, sir, although I shall deviate in many of the remarks I shall make from the real question, I shall not be considered out of order, provided my remarks go to reply to the remarks of those who have preceded me in this discussion; for I hold, sir, that when remarks are made, in discussion, unfavorable in their character to the reputation of the Administration, or any individual, whether in a public or private station, even if the remarks be out of order, yet, sir, it is right that they should be answered, at all times, when justice and truth require it, without regard to the question or measure immediately under consideration.

Sir, in the remarks I am about to make, I shall feel bound to answer many charges against the Administration and the Republican party, made during this debate. I am aware that many of those charges were made in open violation of order and the rules that regulate debate in this House. And it may be said it is equally out of order to answer charges, propositions, or arguments, which are themselves out of order. This may be true in the general, but never ought to prevail at the expense of justice or reputation. I hope, then, sir, that I shall be permitted, without interruption, to respond to the charges to which I allude, and to indulge me in this hope will be an exercise of no more liberality than has been extended to those who have made them. That much I have a right to look for. That much I will expect.

As to the object of the resolution, I presume there is but one opinion. All will agree that Swartwout's defalcations, and the defalcations of many other officers in this Government, ought to be exposed; so ought all persons, public and private, who either connive at them, or by whose neglect they may have been permitted to occur. I, however, am not aware that any substantial benefit can grow out of the investigation now proposed to be made. The objects desired to be attained by the investigation, seem to me to be in possession of the House and the country; that is, that the Government has been defrauded out of near a million and a quarter of money, and that the Conservative-Whig scoundrel, Samuel Swartwout, has done it, and has placed himself far on the other side of your investigation. If an investigation can be made without additional expense and loss to the Government, or if any portion of the money can be found, or if there are others within our jurisdiction who have been engaged in this stupendous fraud, and who may be brought to punishment by the proposed investigation, I am willing and anxious for it; but I protest against the mode proposed of raising the committee who shall make this investigation. It is proposed to have this committee appointed by the House. I object to any innovation upon the usual mode: It is the province of the Speaker to appoint committees, unless otherwise ordered by the House. I have some objections to "otherwise ordering" the appointment of this committee. First, because it will be a reflection upon the Speaker, whose character and reputation is identified with the character, reputation, and honor of this body; and whose official course, while it continues as honorable, able, impartial, and dignified as it has been, merits the esteem of this House, and will have the confidence of the country. Second, because I believe that greater discrimination, and less party partiality, will be exercised in the choice of the committee if selected by the Speaker, than will be exercised by the House. Third, because there is less responsibility attached in the appointment by the House than by the Speaker. If by the House, the committee is responsible. If by the Speaker, we have the responsibility of the Speaker and the committee.

It has been intimated that, should the committee be appointed by the Speaker, it will be a "whitewashing" committee. Sir, I object to the appointment of the committee by the House, because the Whigs and their "friends and allies," the Conservatives, have the ascendancy in this House, and a majority of that committee will consist of Whigs and Conservatives. Swartwout was a Conservative-Whig. I am confident every effort will be used by the committee to whitewash the black frauds and corrupt iniquities of Swartwout, and blackwash the Administration. I object also to the appointment of the committee by the House, because a part of that committee may consist of members who have formed and expressed an opinion unfavorable to the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the defalcations of Swartwout, whom I consider wholly unfit for a place on that committee. It would be as disgraceful for this House to place such a member on that committee as it would be dishonorable for him to serve on it. But should the House determine that this investigation shall go on, and that the House shall appoint the committee, I hope that it will not be by ballot, as proposed, but that it will be appointed via voce, so that the country may understand and see who is responsible for the character of the committee. I hope in this business there will be no dodging. I hope every man will "toe the mark," and show his hand. We act for our country, and not for ourselves. Those we represent have a right to know what we do. I say, if this committee is to be appointed by the House, let it be done via voce. Come out, gentlemen, and show your hands. I hope we will see no skulking behind the "cotton bags."

Mr. Speaker, we have been tossed and rolled upon the waves of party and the billows of faction for some days, yes, some weeks. And so high has run the sea by party tempest, that we have been in danger of losing sight of that harbor in which the vessel of State was destined to ride by the framers of the Constitution. There is danger of losing sight of those principles which must be considered fundamental, and which must continue to be the basis of our Government so long as it is of a republican character.

There is no better method of perpetuating our free institutions than a frequent recurrence to first principles, and a strict adherence to the letter of the Constitution; nothing short of these can secure either perpetuity to the Government, or happiness to the people. I believe that ours is a Government of the people, and its principles recognize the right of the people to govern themselves, either by themselves, or by their representatives, legislative and executive. The principle of self-government embraces and implies the capacity for self-government; and the right and the capacity for self-government implies and involves the right to instruct those whom the people may select to represent them in the law-making power, as well as those who may be appointed to execute the laws. Indeed, we may say that public opinion is the law in this country. No law can be executed contrary to the popular will, although it may have all the legislative and judicial sanction necessary to its existence; yet obedience and submission to all laws, while they exist, are the moral and political duties of every citizen. But, sir, one of the highest duties we as Representatives owe, or can owe, to those we represent, is to sustain those measures which are the choice of the people; and the strongest evidence that we can have that a given measure is popular with the people, and that it is our duty to carry that measure out, so far as it depends upon our official powers, is that we have been elected to office with reference to that measure. When an Administration is elected by the people, upon political questions involving their interest, the vote which is given in that election is an expression of the people in favor of or against it, (as the case may be.) The men who are elected are but the instruments in the hands of the people to carry out the policy involved in those questions. The correctness of these propositions will not be openly denied by any, but they have been obliquely and covertly denied by the whole Opposition of this House. It is done indirectly, by making the broad and unqualified assertion, that the will of the people is not manifested in the official existence of this Administration, that the people have been blindly led into error by designing demagogues, and that the result of the elections is no evidence of what may be the wish or will of the people. Sir, this is carrying out a fundamental principle of the Federal party, so recognized and practiced upon by that party from the commencement of our Government to this time, viz: that there is too much want of integrity, intelligence, stability, and moral rectitude with the common people for self-government. Sir, I will, before I take my seat, say more on this subject. I will dismiss it at this time with the only declaration which the baseness of the charge will admit of; and on behalf of the American people, I fearlessly pronounce the charge a base slander upon their intelligence, and their moral and political integrity.

But, sir, have the principles laid down in this discussion by gentlemen of the Opposition corresponded with these fundamental principles? Have they not broken over every barrier that has been erected for the preservation of those rights and principles, which have cost so much? What terms of reproach have not been used in denouncing this Administration, and all its leading measures? Sir, I repeat, I have ever heard that a want of confidence in the intelligence, capacity, stability, and moral firmness in the common people for self-government, constitutes a leading feature in the principles of the aristocrats in other countries, and the Federalists in this; but I have never seen that principle so manifest, and so plainly developed, as it has been in this discussion. These denunciations are unwarrantable and indefensible in a political sense, and revolutionary in their nature and tendencies. If ever there was an Administration of the people since the formation of our Government, or if there ever will be to its final dissolution, it is this Administration. If there ever were, or ever will be, measures which were, or are to be, considered the measure of the people, the leading measures of this Administration are so. The chief officers of the Administration have been elected by the people with a full knowledge of their merits, their principles, and their capacities for the elevated stations in which they have been placed.

The leading measures of this Administration are the measures of the people; all the prominent recommendations contained in the President's Message involve the same principles which have received the decision and the sanction of the people, after mature discussion and enlightened deliberation; and now to denounce them in the unmeasured terms of reproach and defamation, as well the Administration as the measures themselves, is to deny, in direct terms, as well the capacity of the people to select their political representatives, as their capacity to judge of the fitness or unfitness of such measures as directly involve their highest and their deepest interests, and perfectly in character with the fact, that a want of confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the people constitutes a prominent and fundamental principle of the Federal or aristocratic party in this country.

The President recognizes the fact, that our political institutions are becoming more and more under the control of the people, and that the growth of intelligence is equal to the duties of their protection and preservation. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] denies this, and refers to the "mob" in Pennsylvania, as an evidence that such is not the fact, but that we are in a state of disorder. And, sir, I affirm that our political institutions, and all the pure principles thereupon depending, are in a high state of preservation and durability; and for the truth of my affirmation, I refer to the "mob" in Pennsylvania; and let me say, that I look upon the proceedings of the Democracy ("rabble" as they have here been called) of Pennsylvania, as a most valuable evidence that there is enough of the revolutionary spirit of '76 yet existing to repel any attempt at usurpation of power not recognized by the institutions of our country. The attempt at usurpation by the Bank Federalists of Pennsylvania, was an attempt to establish power, in violation of the Constitution, as well of the United States as of the State of Pennsylvania. It was an attempt at disorganization, a prostration of our free institutions, and an effort to trample in the dust the elective franchise. The workers of such iniquity will only be known hereafter in infamy, and ought to be marked by the frown and indignation of every patriot and friend to his country. It is to be hoped that the Constitution and our free institutions, whenever and wherever assailed, and attempted to be prostrated, as they were by the hired bank minions of Pennsylvania, may find, such a democracy for their protection as that which rallied to their standard at Harrisburg. Such being the case, we have nothing to fear from all the political demagogues, bank vassals, and stock-jobbing gamblers that may array themselves against the country and the Constitution.

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] complains that the President and Secretary recommend economy, and, because this recommendation is presented to the public in each executive document, the people are thereby deceived; and says that such frauds upon "the credulity of the people ought to be stopped;" that is to say, the President and heads of the Departments ought not to recommend economy in the administration of the Government. I have no doubt, sir, but what these executive recommendations of economy greatly annoy the Federal party, whose unremitting object seems to be to bankrupt this Government, if there is no other way to break down this Administration, and prostrate the Democratic party. Yes, sir, I have no doubt but that a recommendation from the President and Secretary to Congress, to be liberal, magnificent, and even extravagant, in public expenditures, would have been much more acceptable to the gentleman and some more of his party. Such a recommendation could have been used much more conveniently for Whig President making, than an economical recommendation, and would have been much more in character with the votes of the gentleman's party, which the Journals display.

Sir, it has ever been a cardinal point with the Democracy, and with every Democratic Administration, to confine the public expenditures to the absolute wants of the Government. Such a policy is not only indispensable to the purposes of economy, but indispensable to keep the Government within the limits necessary to secure and perpetuate liberty to the people.

There is nothing that can so much endanger the free institutions of a country and the freedom of its citizens as a rich and powerful Government. If the people be rich and happy, the Government must be poor. If the Government be rich and powerful, the people will be poor and weak, for the simple reasons that all rich Governments are made so by the wealth of the people, and whatever is taken from them to enrich the Government must make them proportionately poor; and in proportion to the wealth of the Government, so will it be powerful; and in proportion to its power, so will the people be weak. If the Government is the master, the people will be slaves; for both cannot be rich, both cannot be powerful, nor can both be masters. I hope there is no friend to his country of this Congress, or of any other Congress to come, in all time, who will hesitate to carry out the President's recommendation of economy in the expenditures of the Government. I say I hope this recommendation may be unanimously sustained; but I fear such will not be the case. We have a party here (the party opposed to the Administration) who seem to owe it as a duty to their principles and their party, to oppose every measure that is recommended by the Executive Department, or brought forward by its supporters. It is enough that the Administration recommends a measure to rally in one concert howl the whole pack of Oppositionists. The Executive and the Secretary of the Treasury recommend economy, present an estimate of the probable wants of the Government; but various works of a public nature (and many of them unconstitutional) are authorized by Congress, and appropriations directed to carry them on, to more than twice the amount of the estimates; and if the means of the Government happen to fall short, then we have a general Federal yelp of extravagance, extravagance, profligacy, and ruin, by the very party—yes, by the very men—who have been the means of involving the Government and bankrupting the Treasury by unconstitutional and extravagant appropriations; and these are the men who preach economy to the people with their lips, but practice extravagance in their hearts.

Mr. Speaker, I entered upon this discussion with great diffidence; not but what truth, facts, and argument are on our side, but because it is impossible to know where to find our enemy. They are as inaccessible as the Seminoles of Florida, who skulk beyond the swamps and within the dense hammocks, or the Circassians, who secure themselves in and upon the inaccessible Caucasus of Asia. Was it not for one feature in the principles and conduct of the modern Whigs, they would be impervious to defeat; they would be like brigands; they would eat, drink, and sleep with the apparent sociability of a friend with those who are the constant subjects of their plunder. I say if it were not for one feature in their political conduct; that is, never-ceasing hostility to the principles of Democracy; that is a paramount object, and before which everything else, moral, political, or religious, must give way. That is the link which unites them as close as the Siamese twins. Our enemies have no name, or, perhaps, they have so many names that little advantage could be derived from advertising them. The number of aliases necessary to designate them would swell the price of an advertisement above their value. I believe that all honest men regard a frequent change of one's name as an evidence of base dishonesty and fraud. If you hear of a man giving himself the name of A B at one of your neighboring towns, C D at another, and at another E F, you will surely come to the conclusion that he is a horse-thief, a robber, or something of the kind. So in a political sense, suspicious would justly be entertained of the political honesty and integrity of a party who are perpetually changing their names with the return of every general and important election. There is no man sufficiently watchful of his political rights, who will not look upon such a party with jealousy and great suspicion. Nor are the Federalists more prolific of names than they are in principles. They have a new code of principles for each election that is presented. Whenever it is necessary to rally upon a given election of general interest, they baptize themselves with a new name, and make such principles and maxims their watchwords as may answer the particular case. Can I have your attention, sir, while I trace up some of their inconsistencies practiced for political effect? In 1796, when Federalism had the ascendancy, and overshadowed every prospect in the country; in the Reign of Terror, when it was common to wear a black cockade, the term Whig was then considered an opprobrious term; it was synonymous with Democrat, and both only fit for the lower orders, or, in the Federal language of the times, was fit for the common people; while that of Federalist was alone fit for those who were a little uncommon; but now, for political effect, the same party have taken the term Whig to themselves. The adoption of this cognomen has answered them some purpose. It has answered the purpose of gulling a few of the unwary; but the object of its adoption begins to be understood; it is losing its charms. The Federalists will be compelled to take another name, to meet the next congressional and presidential elections. The term Locofoco is now given to the Democracy by the Federalists, as a taunt and a term of reproach. I shall not be astonished at all if the Federalists should steal the name from the Democracy, and baptize themselves with it, before the year 1840. We will then have a Bank-Federal-Locofoco party to contend with. In 1812-'14, when war was declared against England for the most violent and outrageous trespasses upon our commercial and other rights, in the open violation of the established laws, usages, and customs of nations, the Federal party, who were always a little more attached to the constitution, laws, and customs of England than to their own, and always deadly hostile to France, said tauntingly, "Why don't you declare war against France, and recover your French spoils? You are resting under national degradation; France has done you more injury than England." But war was prosecuted against England, and terminated with the memorable battle of the 8th of January, on the plains of New Orleans; a battle which not only concluded the war, but shed a blaze of patriotism, and a halo of glory over this country, and this nation, which no other victory ever did; and won laurels for those who gained it, that will bloom in memory, when they (ay, and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Underwood,] who rejoiced that there were no cannon fired here on the 8th of January) shall mingle with the dust. But the time came when, to save the nation's honor and do justice to those whose rights had been violated, it became the duty of the Chief Magistrate to call the attention of Congress, and the American people, to the redress of the injuries which we had sustained by the French spoils, and the only means left for President Jackson was to recommend reprisals. At this, the whole Federal party started, as if by one universal electric shock, and said: "What, are you about to declare war against France for the paltry sum of 25,000,000 francs? What, are you about to involve this nation in a war with France, that must deluge us in blood, and sink us in bankruptcy and ruin, for the paltry consideration of 25,000,000 francs? Are you about to declare war against France, who assisted you through with your revolutionary struggle, and to whom you owe a debt of gratitude you never can pay, an obligation that never can be cancelled, for the paltry consideration of 25,000,000 francs?"

Yes, sir, this was the cry then, and it was howled as loud, as long, and as piteously as the crocodile cry of corruption, corruption, and panic, is now howled. In 1811, when the recharter of the old Bank of the United States was under congressional discussion, Mr. Clay, the now leader of the Federal party, denounced the bank as unconstitutional. He contended that Congress had no power to incorporate a bank or any other institution, and that a bank was a dangerous and an unsafe institution; but now, sir, without any change or amendment of the Constitution, and without any material change in the policy of our country or difference in our institutions, a bank is the very thing we want, and is perfectly constitutional. In 1816, Daniel Webster, whose opinions on constitutional law is the political Koran of the Federal party, and before whose opinions they fall prostrate, kiss the ground, and worship as before Omnipotence, said that gold and silver was the only currency recognized by and known to the Constitution. It was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad. But now the rag-tag shipplaster currency answers all the purposes of a national currency, and is perfectly constitutional with that gentleman and all his party. In 1830, when the great political question, in which all others were merged, was the recharter of the Bank of the United States, Mr. McDuffie, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report in favor of the recharter of the bank, which was popular with the Federal Bank party. Every sentence and word of that report was hailed as good orthodox Bank Federal doctrine, and no part of it was more popular than the following passage, which constituted the objections of the committee to a national bank, and the avowed objections of the Federal party to such an institution.

In relation to a national bank, (speaking of the number of agents which the United States Bank employed, and their political influence,) he says: "But the patronage resulting from the appointment—the annual appointment of these agents, great as it would doubtless be, would be insignificant and harmless when compared with that which would result from the dispensation of bank accommodations, to the standing amount of $50,000,000! The mind almost instinctively shrinks from the contemplation of an idea so ominous to the purity of the Government and the liberties of the people. No Government of which the committee have any knowledge, except, perhaps, the despotism of Russia, was ever invested with a patronage at once so prodigious in its influence, and so dangerous in its character. In the most desperate financial extremities, no other European Government has ever entered upon an experiment so perilous. If the whole patronage of the English monarchy were concentrated in the hands of the American Executive, it may be well doubted whether the public liberty would be so much endangered by it, as it would by this vast pecuniary machine."

This was the opinion of the Federalists in 1830, 1831, and 1832, in relation to a national bank. So it was then—always was, and will be—the opinion of the Democracy of this country. This document had a circulation throughout the United States that no other document ever had. It flew through the country like leaves in the fall fell upon the highways, on cross-roads, in the fields, and in every door-yard; those who could read, were compelled to read it; and those who could not had it read to them; and no part of that report was used in argument in favor of the recharter of the United States Bank more than that part which I have cited. It was used to put down and nullify the mere suggestion which General Jackson advanced, that a national bank might, perhaps, be established, within the power of the Constitution, and of less dangerous tendencies. But what will you think, sir, of Federal consistency, when I tell you that no sooner had General Jackson vetoed the Bank of the United States, and the people had, by an overwhelming majority, sustained him in his course, than the Federalists were for "a national bank!" Yes, sir, for a national bank, with all its subjugating tendencies and "Russian despotism;" and in 1834 the congressional elections turned upon the question of a national bank.

In 1834-'35, when the General Government was receiving the notes of specie-paying banks in liquidation of the land purchases, the Administration was denounced and the practice deprecated as destructive to the rights of the people and their interest in the public domain. It was rung upon every change that the Administration was frittering away the public lands, which were reserved in trust for the use of the people, and taking in consideration the shipplasters of irresponsible banks. True it was, sir, that the spirit of speculation was about to draw the whole public domain in its vortex. Those who had credit could obtain bank notes by the quire, and purchase hundreds of thousands of acres of the public lands, perhaps to the loss of the Government, as there was an uncertainty of the power of the banks to redeem their paper, and to the great injury and prejudice of the poor and industrious man, for whose use the land is, and really of right ought to be held. Such was the rage for speculation, and such was the system of monopoly, that the country was threatened with the introduction of the feudal system, with the vacillating and degrading tendencies peculiar to a system of landlords and tenants.

General Jackson, seeing the progress of these overwhelming evils, recommended what was called the specie circular to the Secretary of the Treasury. The policy was adopted, which was to prohibit the sale of a greater quantity of land than three hundred and twenty acres to one individual, for any other kind of currency than gold and silver. This measure had the desired effect, viz: to bring a sound currency into the Treasury, and, in some degree, to check the wild rage for speculation, and to secure the public domain from the grasp of the wealthy monopolizer. But no sooner was the specie circular put into successful operation, than the whole pack of the Opposition again raised the howl. The Administration was denounced for declaring war upon the banks, war upon the credit system, and making an odious distinction in the currency between the Government and the people. There was not a Whig whiff in the country, but could ask with great emphasis, "What, is the Administration about to establish two currencies, one for the Government, and one for the people?" "The Government must have gold and silver, while the people are to have shipplasters." Again, in 1834-'35, and '36, the Federalists said it was unsafe to deposit the public revenue in the local banks. They were unfit for financial agents, and the "banks and local bank-deposit system was in character with the ruinous and destructive policy of the Administration." Well, in 1837, when the banks suspended payment, locked up the public revenue, and proved themselves faithless agents, and unworthy of the confidence of the community and the Government; and when in consequence thereof it became the duty of the President of the United States to recommend a separation of the Government finances from the banks, and the establishment of an independent constitutional Treasury, then, again, was the whole force of the Federalists arrayed against the Administration, and every possible motive but that which was good and patriotic attributed to them. Ruin to the country, desolation to commerce, destruction to the banks, and prostration to every interest, public and private, was sung from Maine to Mexico, and as in the case of the Treasury circular, "two currencies!" "one for the Government, and one for the people," was exclaimed and vociferated by every Whig thing in the country.

Further, when General Jackson was run for President, in 1824, 1828, and 1832, the Democracy were warned most solemnly and lovingly not to support a military chieftain for the Presidency. We were told and admonished, in an apparent spirit of patriotism and love of country, that all Governments had fallen, and all Republics had been subverted, by the destroying hands of military chieftains and military ambition. Yes, sir, we were told that "war, pestilence, and famine," would be our fate, if we should place a military chieftain in the executive chair. The hero of New Orleans ought not to be made President of these United States; we must have a civilian for a President. But General Jackson was elected; he served his first term, but no military despotism made its appearance. He was elected a second time, and served out his term, but no military despotism yet appeared. But there were some honest persons of the Democracy who perhaps thought there would be more safety in bestowing the Presidency upon a civilian; and a distinguished one, in the person of Martin Van Buren, was presented to the American people as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. But now it was discovered that a civilian was not so safe as was thought, and particularly the one now offered; and a military chieftain was brought forward in the person of Major General William Henry Harrison, commander-in-chief of the northwestern army, and offered as the competing candidate against the civilian already named. Yes, sir, in 1832 there was danger, ay, ruin to the country and downfall of the Government attendant on the election of the hero of New Orleans to the Presidency; but in 1836 there was no danger in electing the hero of Tippecanoe to the same high station.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Duncan.

Ho. of REPS.

Again: when General Jackson was President, the Federalists said Martin Van Buren administered the Government. Jackson's messages were splendid documents in point of talent; they could not be surpassed. All the objections the Federalists had to them consisted in their hostility to the Democratic doctrines they contained; but they said General Jackson neither composed nor wrote them; they were Martin Van Buren's messages. But now that Martin Van Buren is President, every leading measure and proposition of the Administration comes from the Hermitage. Sir, I repeat the question again: What confidences to be placed in a party who change their name and their principles with the return of every election?

But, sir, I have presented this array of Federal inconsistencies, not merely for the purpose of exposing the base practice of changing names and principles for the unhallowed purposes of political deception, but also to prove what I have already stated, and what has been well known in reference to the principles of the Federal party; which is, that it is a part of their faith, and a fundamental principle of their doctrine, that the common people have not the intelligence, firmness, and moral integrity necessary for self-government; and all these changes of names, and professed changes of principles, is base and black hypocrisy.

Sir, we have had a prophetic destruction from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] as blighting as that pronounced by the inspired prophets against Babylon. He has told us, in substance, that if this Administration is to be continued, this Government must fall; your Constitution will be rent, and scattered to the four winds. This would be bad. Your free institutions will be prostrated and leveled with the earth. This would be worse. This magnificent pile of noble architecture will totter, tumble, crumble, and mingle with the dust of the pyramids of Egypt, the temples of Greece, and the obelisks of Rome! Hardly a scratch or scroll will be found upon the lofty columns that now surround us to give name to this magnificent temple of liberty to the curious and romantic wanderer in after ages! All this is withering prophecy to the philanthropist and the lover of liberty; but the worst is yet to come; that which will be far more distressing to the lover of science, literature, and politics. The gentleman concluded his prophecy by the chilling threat, that if Martin Van Buren is again to be elected President of these United States, he (the gentleman) will do—what, sir? Take the Great Western, and go to Liverpool! Yes, sir, the gentleman will expatriate himself from this Government. What a calamity! It will be the footing up of all the other calamities that await this people and this Government, if this wicked Administration is to be continued.

I think the Democracy, sir, will have to take this last threatened calamity seriously into consideration. When I go home, I will lay the matter, in a proper manner, before the first Democratic convention which may be held in the district I have the honor to represent. I will also consult some of my old and well-tried friends in Democracy. Father Felter and Father Dawson are patriarchs in Democracy. They are experienced in political matters. They are doctors in Democracy, and, withal, sound, pure, and upright patriots at heart. Their opinions on this important question will be of great weight. I think the Democracy, so far as my district is concerned, will take such order on the question as will operate to the best interests of the country. Should I have the honor of a seat in the next national convention which will be held for the presidential nominations of 1840, I will lay the matter before the convention; and if it shall be thought that the loss of the gentleman as a citizen of the United States will be an injury paramount to the benefits of Mr. Van Buren's administration, why, Mr. Van Buren "then, and in that case," will be withdrawn, and some less dangerous man shall be taken up in his place. I know that the Democracy will do what is right in the premises. But, sir, I hope, if the gentleman should expatriate himself, and "take the Great Western for Liverpool," still it may not prove the final end of this Government. When Alexander the Great planted the Grecian standard in the soil of India, and was carrying his conquests into the interior thereof, and one victory seemed to be gained to the glory of the Grecian arms but to give way for another equally glorious, in all these battles Alexander was found in the front ranks. (A most happy admonition to some of our liveried gentlemen, who had better be in Florida, or at some other post where they would be doing more service to their country, than hanging and lounging about the city of Washington, each occupying the room of two at all your balls, routs, and assemblies, where, in some instances, there is nothing but women to fight.) Some of his officers, in the most friendly manner, admonished the King of the danger he was risking in thus exposing his royal person, and the great interest that Greece had in the preservation of his life. The King answered that the welfare of Greece did not depend on the life or death of one man. So I would hope, sir, that the duration and welfare of this Republic does not depend on the presence or absence, or life or death, of any one man. But this Republic may fall; yes, sir, it will fall, as did the Assyrian empire, when the Medes were governed by a mule, and from the same cause. Cræsus, King of Assyria, consulted the oracle Delphos, for purposes that related to his future prosperity, and the prosperity of his empire. He was told that when he crossed the river Halys, that a great empire would be destroyed; and that when the Medes should be governed by a mule, he would be in danger. He never dreamed that it was to be his own empire that was to be destroyed when he should cross the river Halys, and he thought the thing impossible that ever the Medes should be ruled by a mule. But after his empire was destroyed, and he made prisoner by Cyrus, King of Persia, he sent a gold chain, with a reprimand, to the Delphic oracle for so deceiving him; he was informed by the oracle that it was his own empire it was meant should be destroyed, when he should pass the river Halys, and that Cyrus was the mule who was to govern the Medes—a mule being a mongrel beast, half ass and half horse. And that Cyrus, being the son of Cambyses, King of Persia, and Mandanis, daughter of Astyages, King of the Medes, he was of mongrel composition—one half of his blood Persian, by his father, and the other that of the Medes, by his mother. So, sir, when this Republic comes to be governed by a mule, (Federal away,) it will fall, or it will be subverted. Sir, what is the Federal party? A mongrel composition consisting of part Bank and part Anti-Bank, Masonic and Anti-Masonic, Abolition and Anti-Abolition, &c., &c. Made up, sir, of the factions and fractions, and odds and ends of all factions, bound together by no common principle or tie but natural and unrelenting hostility to the Democratic party, and the Democratic principles. When the day shall come that this mule shall govern this country and this people, then will our Republic fall, and our free institutions crumble to the ground, and mingle with the dust of the free institutions of other Republics which have fallen by the misrule of similar factions and ambitious demagogues.

Sir, as an evidence that this corrupt Administration is soon to be overthrown, the gentleman has presented us, in glowing colors, the recent Federal victories in New York. And the gentleman attempted to amuse us with the effect that that Federal triumph must have had upon the President. It is true that the State of New York has given, at the recent election, a Federal vote by a small majority, much smaller than it was the preceding election. And I have no doubt but that the Federal success last fall was the necessary result to secure Democratic success to the next presidential election. Yes, sir, the ten thousand tricks, stratagems, and base frauds, which were used to deceive the Democracy, and to secure Federal success, will recoil with ten-fold force upon the heads of the workers of such base iniquities; and, besides, a defeat something like that of New York was necessary to keep up that Democratic watchfulness, so indispensable to the preservation of our free institutions. With the rushing torrent of political prosperity, which was the lot of the Democracy last fall, there was danger of falling into carelessness and apathy, from which we could only have been roused by some great violation of our political rights, such as occurred in 1824, when the people by fraud, corruption, and bargain, were cheated out of the man of their choice for the first office in their gift. But, sir, the Federal success in New York, and the manner by which such a result was brought about, will keep up a laudable and wholesome Democratic excitement, which will not be limited to that State, but will influence more or less the Democracy throughout the Union, and will tell a woeful tale for Federalism in 1840.

While I am on this subject, it will not be improper to notice some curious circumstances of a national character which seem, if not to partake of the supervision of which I have been speaking, at least to have all the characteristics of retributive justice. I allude, sir, to the rejection of the distinguished and talented statesman and accomplished gentleman who now fills the executive chair of these United States. It will be remembered that during the late Administration, General Jackson nominated, in the recess of Congress, Martin Van Buren Minister to the Court of St. James. The Senate of the United States—having a majority at that time opposed to the Administration and the Democratic party, but since reformed by the people—rejected the nomination, and Mr. Van Buren was of course called home. What followed? Why, the people, the freemen of the country, elected him vice president of the United States; elected him to the second office within their gift; placed him in that same Senate, to preside over the same men who, for party purposes, narrow party considerations, had rejected him. What a triumph of principle and of retributive justice! But the laudable and popular indignation for such base injustice did not stop there. Popular love and popular confidence, which he had honestly earned, gave him the highest station within the gift of the American people—a station which he is now filling with honor to himself, dignity to his office, and to the highest and best interests of his country.

There is another little matter, of the same character, which I will just mention.

It will be remembered that General Jackson nominated one Ben Tappan to the office of district judge of the State of Ohio—as sound a Democrat and as pure a patriot as ever honored the names; and, withal, of the first order of talents, and of the most unexceptionable deportment. This nomination, for party purposes, contracted, groveling, selfish considerations, and for the gratification of a vindictiveness which can be found in no party except the sworn enemies of Democracy, was rejected. But what do you think the people have done, sir? They have placed this same Ben Tappan in the seat of him by whose vote the nomination was rejected, and have consigned him (Ewing) who voted the rejection to perpetual and everlasting "solitude and the desert wastes of water." These things may not have been brought about by any providential interposition, but they evidently partake of that kind of retributive justice which is one of the attributes of Providence.

I have said that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] brought forward the alarm of Belshazzar to portray the alarm of the President on hearing of the defeat of the Democracy of New York. I thank the gentleman for the classical allusion. I will try to make something of it for my purpose.

Sir, the conduct of the Federalists in 1837, on the reception of the news of their victories in several of the States, will well bear comparison with that of Senacherib, and many other tyrants of his time, who were mere scourges in the hand of the Almighty to punish the wickedness and idolatry of mankind. In speaking of the sway of his power and of his conquests, he said:

"By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent; and I have removed the bounds of the people, and have robbed them of their treasures; and have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man, and my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people; and as one gathereth eggs that are left, have I gathered all the earth; and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped."

But this monarch, so august and wise in his own eye, how did he appear in that of the Almighty? Only as a subaltern—a servant sent by his master—the rod of his anger, and the staff in his hand. The Almighty's design was to chastise his children, not to exterminate them; but Senacherib had it in his own heart to destroy and cut off all nations. What, then, will be the issue of this kind of contest between the designs of the Almighty and those of this prince? At the time he fancied himself already possessed of Jerusalem, the Almighty, with a single blast, disperses all his proud hopes, destroys in one night a hundred and four-score thousand of his troops—putting a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his lips, (as though he had been a wild beast,) he leads him back to his own dominions, covered with infamy, through the midst of those nations, who, but a little before, had beheld him in all his pride and haughtiness. How was it with the Federalists in 1837, on hearing of their victories? These are the results of our strength; it is done by our own power, for we are mighty. One gentleman [Mr. CUSHING, of Massachusetts] said, in substance, in the name of the rest of the Federalists, that the Democracy in Maine had fallen before the power of Federalism like grass before the scythe. But what did all this vain boasting amount to? We will see in the end. A Belshazzar feast was held at Faneuil Hall. Daniel, (not the prophet,) with all his officers and minions assembled, and, after being harangued by Daniel and other Federal high priests, retired to a place appointed, where the history of the times say there were twelve hundred and three-score bottles of champagne in readiness for the feast; all drank and all "breathed deeper and freer than they had ever done." But, in the midst of their reveling, a handwriting was seen on the wall, and when discovered, it disclosed the appalling fact that Missouri had closed her elections, and that the Democracy had gained a triumphant victory over the Federalists. This produced consternation and dismay. But the revelers received that kind of consolation that the queen-mother Nictoris gave her son Belshazzar—that was, that Missouri was expected to be Democratic. "Solitary and alone" ruled that State; all expected that the Federalists would be defeated. So they were comforted, and the feast went on. But hardly had they taken the next glass, when a voice thundred at the gates—the Federalists have been routed in Maine horse, foot, and dragoons, and more than five thousand left dead on the field. Consternation had not time to subside, when a courier rushed upon them with the intelligence that a battle had been fought in Maryland, and the Federalists had been routed with dreadful slaughter. On the heels of this death-dampening news came on another courier with the news that the Keystone in the arch of the Union had been replaced, and that a pitched battle had been fought between the Federalists and the Democrats of Pennsylvania, and that the former were overthrown, and six or eight thousand slaughtered; close to this intelligence, followed one from Ohio, with the news that a pitched battle had been fought, and the shipplaster Governor had been overthrown and upwards of fourteen thousand of his Federal troops inhumanly and indiscriminately slaughtered, and his whole Conservative troops cut off, not one man of the self-styled "Spartan band," was left to take the news of the sad disaster to Lacedæmon; close on this disaster followed the news from South Carolina and New Jersey, with the melancholy intelligence of the almost entire overthrow of Federalism in both these States; in the latter, over a thousand Federalists were put to the sword; last, though not least, came a courier from Delaware, bearing the proud banner of Democracy, with the inscription of victory, and the overthrow of Federalism! Federalism was overcome. The knees of the bacchanalians, Belshazzar like, smote together. The air sickened; dumbness and horror reigned; the wine-cup dropped from the pale and quivering lip; the Euphrates was turned from her channel; the Persian troops marched in dryshod; the walls were demolished, the citadel seized, and the city of Federalism was destroyed, and its citizens put to the sword! How does this prostration compare with the vain boastings of the Federalists one year before, and how very insignificant is the small and temporary Federal victory in New York, when compared with such a succession of triumphs, gained upon principle, and under the broad stripes of the banner of Democracy.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] after attempting to expose what he supposes to be corruptions of this Government, says that they grow out of the maxim and the watchword, that to the victors belong the spoils. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] says that no reformation can be expected while there are so many hungry expectants. There is not a day nor an hour that passes but we hear some taunt about the spoils party, hungry expectants, office-holders, the army of office-holders, &c. Sir, I think I once before was compelled to notice this hypocritical whining about office-holders. Where, I ask again, did we ever hear of a free Government without office-holders. What do gentlemen mean when they talk about the army of office-holders? Are there more officers than are wanted to manage the Government? Then let them be pointed out and removed. If gentlemen, who are constantly harping about office-holders, know of any superfluous ones, they are bound, in duty to themselves and to their country, by the nature of their office, and the oath they have taken to discharge the duties of the office, to point them out, and to take such order as would cause the instant removal of such worthless drones upon the public store-house. Is the number of officers too great? are they derelict in duty? or are their salaries too high? All these evils can be remedied if they exist; and I invite gentlemen, who are evaporating so much of the public money by denouncing the office-holders, the spoils party, the hungry expectants, &c., to point out the evil specifically, and recommend the remedy. I will be foremost in carrying that remedy into immediate practice. But, sir, I am inclined to think that constant and incessant yelp about office-holders does not grow out of the fact that such evils as I have represented exist. It is because the Democracy have the ascendancy, and the Federalists cannot occupy all the offices, and all the spoils themselves. This is the cause of all the Federal whimpering about office-holders and spoils party.

What is the course of the Federalists when and where they have the ascendancy? So far as my experience goes in my State, the Federalists clear the chess-board of every man who is tainted with Democracy, whenever they have the ascendancy, when it can be done without prejudice to their party. I have been informed that, under the late Federal-Ritter power, almost every Democrat went by the board, who came under the Executive control, even down to the laborers on the public works. I may be in error; if so, some gentleman from Pennsylvania can correct me. I have little doubt but that the Federal reformation system will be carried to the full extent in New York, during the short time the new powers will be permitted to flutter in that State.

But, sir, I come now to speak of the charges of corruption, profligacy, panic, and ruin, which have been rung in our ears until our hearing has been wounded and our stomachs nauseated. This howl of panic, ruin, and corruption, has been a standing mean used by the Federalists from the commencement of this Government to this time. It is a howl like that of no beast on the face of the earth, but that which makes it. It is the howl of a demagogue, and is used for the purpose of political deception. It varies in its tone. It is sometimes boisterous and terrific; it is sometimes more like the piteous and deceptive cry of the crocodile. It varies with the causes that operate upon the demagogues who make it. Sometimes it proceeds from a robust political desperado, but more generally from the lean, lingering, lank office-seekers; and the time was when this howl had some effect with the people; but their howl of corruption! corruption! has become like the cry of wolf, wolf! The people know the object, and by whom the howl is made. They give it no attention. The charge of corruption, panic, and profligacy, and its repetition, constituted one half that was said by the Opposition at the last and the extra session, and cost the people of this Government more than Stephen Girard's estate was worth at his death. These charges against the Administration were considered and investigated by the people, and with a full knowledge of the facts upon which they were founded, and with a discriminating mind, and a sound judgment, which rarely ever errs when unclouded by falsehood or undeceived by misrepresentation, have expressed a deliberate opinion, through the ballot-boxes, that the charges of corruption, profligacy, and panic, are false. They are a base slander upon the Administration, and a libel upon the people, so far as panic is concerned, and made for political effect, to advance Federalism. But, sir, it is time for me to raise the general issue with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] and to present such facts as will sustain my plea. The gentleman, in the outset of his long speech, said that there were corruptions and base frauds committed by the officers of this Government, and that the Administration and the heads of Departments were cognizant of them, connived at them, participated in them, and were morally involved in all the guilt and crime connected with them. This was his declaration; and that he would present such an array of facts in support of his charges, that no one dare contradict him, nor deny the charges that he had thus publicly, and from his place, made. Now, sir, I, on behalf of this Administration, join issue with the gentleman, and plead the general issue "not guilty."

I have seen and heard the "array of facts" which the gentleman has brought forward to sustain the charges contained in his declaration, and I heard with patience and attention the gentleman's comments upon his array of facts; and I dare say that the charges are not sustained. I dare say that the Administration, or the heads of Departments thereof, are not "guilty." I admit that abuses have existed, and frauds upon the Government committed by some of its officers. But I dare say the Administration, or the heads of Departments thereof, were not cognizant of them, did not participate in them, did not connive at them, and are not morally involved in the guilt connected with them; all these I dare say, and there are some other things I dare say. I dare say that more faithful, economical, and prudent executive officers, so far as the heads of Departments are concerned, never administered this Government, than those of the present Administration. I dare say two thirds of all the public defaulters and fraudulent speculators, from the commencement of the Government to this time, and particularly in this and the last Administrations, were Federalists in principle, as they were scoundrels in practice, and violent opposers of the Democratic principles, party, and administrations.

Further, I dare say that there have been fewer official frauds and defalcations in this and the last Administrations, (and I speak with reference to the length of this Administration,) in proportion to the amount of public revenues collected and disbursed, by more than two hundred per cent. than existed under any preceding Administrations.

Further, I dare say that more than nine-tenths of all the money out of which the Government has been defrauded originated by the banks and the connection of the Government with them; and with the importing merchants and the credit system—all darlings with the Federalists, and a part of the party and the whole of their policy. Sir, the charge of fraud and corruption is made upon the Administration generally, and particularly upon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodbury. These are grave charges against high, distinguished, and responsible officers of this Government, and if true, are matters of grave import, in which the whole community have the deepest interest. If those who make them are sincere, and make them in good faith, they are solemnly bound, by the nature of their oath and the duties of their office, to prefer articles of impeachment. But, sir, I dare say further, that that will not be done, although gentlemen say that Mr. Woodbury stands convicted by his own reports; yes, he stands convicted by evidence "out of his own mouth." Yet, sir, on behalf of Mr. Woodbury, and without conference with him, or his consent to throw down the glove, I challenge any member of this House to prefer articles of impeachment against him. Sir, the Opposition could do nothing which would please Mr. Woodbury better. Sir, there is no man in this House that would not recoil at the thought of the indignation of a liberal and an honest community that must rest upon the head of him who would be foolhardy enough to prosecute such an adventure upon an individual whose merits secure him so large a portion of the public confidence and good feeling. And as bantering, daring, and boisterous assertion is the order of the day, and one of the modes of argument in this House, and as I have as good a right to participate in this new mode of discussion as any other member, I repeat the challenge—impeach Secretary Woodbury if you dare. But, sir, I proceed to sustain my plea, and the assertions I have dared to make in defense of this Administration, by facts and matters of record. But, first, let me call the attention of those who hear me, and those who may read me, that the President nominates all receiving, collecting, and disbursing officers; those who are the defaulters were nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Mr. Woodbury has no control over those appointments. If unprincipled men get into office, and the Government is defrauded thereby, it is unjust and unfair to hold the Secretary of the Treasury responsible; responsible for the conduct of officers not of his appointing, and over whose conduct he has no control, except to detect them after a fraud has been committed, and to recommend their removal from office. Whatever moral or political evil may attach to the appointment of a fraudulent officer, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be held responsible; for, as I said, the Secretary has no absolute control over the appointment, and the President cannot be presumed to be acquainted with the merits, morals, integrity, and qualifications of the hundredth individual who is appointed to office, who may have a portion of the control of the public revenue. He must rely upon the recommendation of those who are acquainted with the applicant, and upon the Senate, who confirm his nominations, and who have fifty times the opportunity to know the qualifications of the nominees that the President has; their body consisting of that number, and their practical acquaintance co-extensive with the Union.

But I said that this was an economical Administration. Sir, I refer you to the messages of the President and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. One of the principal features in each is a strong recommendation of economy in the expenditures of the Government. What is it, sir, that constitutes extravagance in our Government? It is the appropriation of money for purposes named in the act of appropriation beyond the amount of the Government estimates. The Secretary of the Treasury presents Congress with revenue estimates. Now what does extravagance consist in? Why, in appropriating money beyond the amount of the estimates, and beyond the amount of the income of the Government and her ability to pay. Who makes the appropriations? Why, Congress. Then, sir, when we have large and extravagant Government expenditures, by which the people are oppressively taxed, who is to blame? Congress; and I hesitate not to say (and I challenge an examination of the Journals) that, nine times in ten the extravagant appropriations have been brought forward, sustained, and carried by a majority of the Federal members of Congress. Yes, sir; by the very men who cry extravagance loudest.

But, sir, I said that more than two thirds of the Government defaulters were opposed to the Democratic party, &c. Sir, I hold in my hand a book containing the evidence of what I say—a list of public defaulters from the commencement of the Government until the time it was reported, 1838. It contains the names, I think, of upwards of three thousand public defaulters. I am not acquainted with the politics of them, but I think I risk nothing in saying that more than two thirds are, and have been, opposed to the Democratic party. I judge of those I do not know by those I do know. I do not, in general, mean personal acquaintance. I say, as I have done, that defalcations are numerous; they have existed from the commencement of the Government, and they will continue to exist while the Government exists, and while frail man continues to administer it. It is contrary to human nature and to all human experience to suppose that this vast political fabric should be managed in all its various and complicated interests and duties without abuses; and all that can be done to secure the Government and the people from such abuses and frauds as have been practiced, and to provide against subsequent abuses, is to remove the causes that have existed, and to establish such additional checks as will be most likely to secure a faithful and honest administration of the Government in all its parts; at least, so far as human weakness, frailty, and temptation will permit. I think these will be paramount duties to idle declamation, and that unlimited pouring forth of bitter vituperation and unqualified abuse for party purposes and President-making.

In relation to the defalcations in financial trusts, the causes seem to have had their origin and existence, in part, in the banking system, and the connection of the Government with the banks. It seems to me this must be conceded by all who have honestly investigated the subject. Why, then, do those who are opposed to this Administration, denounce it in such unqualified terms, as the cause of all the abuses now presented by the official reports of defalcations, as well of this Administration and the defaulters under it, as those which have gone before it, for which it is neither morally nor politically responsible? Sir, we can retort. I ask, who was it that introduced the banking system into this country in a national sense? Alexander Hamilton. Who was he? One of the leaders of the Federal party. What party is it, and what party has it been, by which it has been kept up? The Federal party. To what party has the principal defaulters belonged? To the Federal party. I say, under what Administrations have the greatest amount of defalcations occurred? Not this, nor the one that preceded it. Sir, I propose now to expose the names of some of those who belong to the party who are now crying corruption, corruption, so loud and so long, in concord with the cry of panic, panic, with which we have been so long grated. And, sir, if I should open the tombs, break down the ramparts of ancient grave-yards, and dig, hyena-like, into the grave, and disrobe the dead, I hope I will find an ample apology in the paramount law of self-defense. It was not I who began this exposition. Should any man's feelings here or elsewhere be hurt, the blame must not be laid on me, but upon those who have wantonly provoked it.

The first name, then, sir, I will present, is that of one John Adams, once a President of these United States. He, sir, stands upon the records of this Government as a defaulter to the amount of $12,898. The history of this defalcation is understood to be, that a sum of money was appropriated for furnishing the President's house. President Adams drew the cash in advance. He employed this amount in purchasing a splendid carriage and horses, and other personal accommodations. This the accounting officers could not allow. He refused to reimburse the money. This amount, therefore, remains unsettled to this day, and will until the last day.

Edward Randolph, a defaulter for $61,155 07, in 1797. Whose Administration did this happen under? In document of the House No. 111, of last session, the collectors' defaults, at the same period, are shown to be, exclusive of interest, half a million of dollars.

Andrew and James Erwin. Document No. 111 exhibits a defalcation to the modest sum of $80,000. Who has been benefited by this plunder—any man here to answer? What were the politics of the base speculators? Whigs.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, rose, and said, that the Messrs. Erwin were not defaulters. It was a slander promulgated by the Globe paper.*

Mr. DUNCAN responded that he did not get his information from the Globe; he obtained it from the records in the archives of the Government, evidence of the highest character, and that which is open to the view of every one who desires to read. I hope (said Mr. D.) it is not true. I would prefer to conceal, at all times, human weakness and depravity, rather than expose, where it may be done without public injury; but I would prefer that such depravity as I am now exposing did not exist. And let me say, once for all, that I know nothing personally of the numerous and wholesale frauds which I am now exposing. I am alike ignorant of the men whom the records show to be the perpetrators. These frauds, with the names of those who committed them, are matters of record, and the facts are spread over the whole country, and known to all who read the Journals of Congress and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. Consequently, my exposition can neither affect the reputation of those whose names I expose or the cause of justice.

Mr. KING, late collector of Bath, Maine, seems to be a defaulter for the modest sum of $15,000. Perhaps the gentleman now in my eye, [Mr. EVANS,] can tell us what that gentleman's politics are, and whether he was not the late Whig candidate for Governor of that State; and whether, with all the corruptions of defalcation in which he is involved, he did not receive the entire Whig vote of his State.

So we ride—but again:

Joseph Wingate and J. B. Swanton, late collectors at Bath also. I have not before me the amount of their defalcations; but they are defaulters; and the former, since his defalcation, has been a Whig member of Congress, and most lovingly embraced by the whole party. The latter, for his violent abuse of Democratic principles, has been rewarded by the late Federal Governor of Maine, with a responsible office, the functions of which require a particular supervision of the finances of the county of Kennebeck. I ask an examination of the reports. It will be found that the collectors, receivers, and disbursing agents, all, or nearly all, support the views which are now advanced with so much zeal for the entire indemnity of this system of fraud and plunder. Examine No. 191, made to the House of Representatives, February 25, 1838. The loss by banks estimated at about $6,000,000; their nominal debt was nearly double, but partly secured. This amount is exclusive of interest; with interest, it will be near $20,000,000. I refer to the report to the Senate, February 2, 1838, Document No. 158.

The losses prior to General Jackson's administration, by collectors and receivers, amount to $1,200,000; the nominal sum is nearly double, but part of this sum is secured. It is probable nothing will be lost eventually under General Jackson's administration but by Littlebury Hawkins, or under the present Administration but by Swartwout and Price. There will be other defaulters, but their security will be good for their respective amounts.

Reckless, collector at Perth Amboy, has produced some alarm; his defalcation was thirty or fifty dollars. He, so soon as the defalcation was discovered, paid the amount. He was a Democrat. He was misled by his predecessor.

But do we hear anything from Arnold, the collector of the same place, some years before, under the administration of one John Q. Adams? He is in default for $80,000, not one farthing of which was recovered; yet we hear no Federal murmuring about that defalcation. He was a modern Whig. This was caused by the neglect of the Administration under which the default occurred, according to the charges now preferred; and it was under the bank administration. Why this muteness about Arnold's defalcation? All understood.

The loss on merchants' bonds. This loss amounted to $7,000,000, without interest. See detail of names and dates in report to Senate, 6th July, 1838, document No. 503. There will be found the name of G. W. Bruen, of the firm of Thomas Smith & Co., in default for the modest sum of $800,000. I would like to know whether or not he is a violent and noisy Whig in New York. Perhaps the Whig gentleman now in my eye [Mr. CURTIS] can inform me. And I would inquire of that gentleman, if he did not make the motion in common council to dismiss all Democrats in the city from office and public employ, even down to the lamplighters?

Edward Thompson, I think, of Philadelphia, whom the records show to be a defaulter to a considerable amount, say the reasonable sum of $700,000, or more. Perhaps some of the Whig gentleman from that city can inform us as to his politics. Whig, I presume? Yes; silence gives consent.

All these base frauds and wholesale defalcations occurred under the United States Bank Administration, and before the present Administration.

* An inspection of note 83, in the document referred to by Mr. DUNCAN, shows that the defalcation of Erwin has been the subject of judicial investigation, and that a judgment was obtained against him in the month of October, 1830, for the sum of $92,685! So much for the "slander of the Globe paper." The extreme sensitiveness of Mr. BELL in regard to this case, may be accounted for by the fact that Mr. Erwin is his father-in-law!

Public Defaulters—Mr. Duncan.

Ho. OF REPS.

They grew out of the wholesale gambling system established, maintained, and managed by the banks. This system the Democracy of this country have always set their face against. Who are responsible for the losses thus sustained but those who, for party and pecuniary motives, sustain and keep up the fraudulent system that gives birth and support to them?

Collecting officers. Report of January 17, 1833, House of Representatives, document No. 111, shows names of defaulting collecting officers.

Reports of First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, documents Nos. 2, 6, 48, and 186, of the House of Representatives, show defaults of disbursing officers.

In looking through these documents, among many hundred of Whig names I find that of James Monroe, formerly a captain in the Army, and is in default $4,115 44. I have understood that this is one of the Whig members of Congress elect; and I think I have seen him charged with having given $5,000 towards carrying the New York Whig elections. If so, would it not have been more honorable for him to have paid the debt which he owed the nation?

Robert Brent. The name of this individual stands on record with a defalcation annexed of $78,541. He was a paymaster general, (Whig.)

Samuel Chaplin, late paymaster, defalcation $109,000, (Whig.)

Amos Binney, late Navy agent, defalcation $70,562, (Whig.)

Joseph Kuhn. Defaulter for $22,621 55, (Whig.)

Miles King, Navy agent, (Whig,) defalcation not known.

But here comes William McMurtry, purser, defalcation $17,991, (Whig.)

Who next? Robert Randolph. Defalcation $25,097.

These are subjects worthy of investigation. Why not inquire after them? They are Whigs. Their exposition would not assist to elect a Federal President; and such an investigation would expose the banking system. But why not investigate Thomas McKenney's connection with the old Bank of Columbia? how much he owed it, and what did the Government lose? What are his politics? Is he not the editor of a violent, raving, ranting, and bitter Federal bank newspaper? Who now cries corruption! corruption! as loud as any man in all Judea?

Bank defalcations. Look, sir, at the millions that have been lost to the Government by the frauds of the banks, since 1817 up to 1838, inclusive—all during the bank reign.

Bank defaults in 1837. Yes, sir, sixty or seventy in number; all defaulters at one time. Yes, sir, in defalcation at one time to more than $20,000,000. This was all right in the banks, though the Government was made bankrupt thereby, the nation's character blighted at home and dishonored abroad. Indulgence was given to them by the President and Secretary, and that indulgence confirmed and continued by Congress. This indulgence was right because given to the banks. Yes, sir, the banks can defraud and bankrupt the Government, Whig collectors, Whig receivers, and Whig disbursers, can rob the Government of any amount, and Whig muteness and silence reigns, more especially if that robbery be perpetrated under a Federal Administration. Beside the indulgence and time given before to the banks, as deposit agents, from May to October, 1837, for $20,000,000 at first, and then for five or six millions of dollars, the Treasury Department gave time and indulgence to numerous merchants, on duty bonds, during the same period, for near five millions more, though all were in default to the Government. This was in the exercise of a sound and legal discretion, and proved in the end beneficial to the United States. I say Congress sanctioned this in September, 1837, and extended the indulgence still longer. Both of these happened after real, ascertained defaults, and were not previously; like the short time taken by the Department and the President, exercising the same legal and sound discretion in the case of some receivers, to inquire if a real default had occurred, and if the money would not, without suit, be deposited as ordered. Yet the hue and cry is, that the last is impeachable but the first is right!

And because Mr. Woodbury, Draco or Nero like, will not take a Democrat by the throat and strangle him the moment he is under the least suspicion of official defalcation, let his means to satisfy the Government be what they may, the cry of corruption must be rung upon every change, and the whole Administration denounced as basely fraudulent, and as conniving at public speculation. All indulgences that have been given to defaulters has been with a view to put it in the power of the defaulter to liquidate the amount for which he may have been in default; and so far as the present Administration, and that which preceded it, is concerned, the result of such a course of policy (where the particular case would admit of such indulgence) has been of advantage to the Government; and in all cases of default, so soon as it was discovered that delay or indulgence were either dangerous, or did not promise an advantage, the individual has been removed; so has the defaulter, under all circumstances, been eventually removed. I believe I am warranted in saying that the Government has sustained no loss by either neglect or indulgence to defaulters by the Treasury Department, or any officer thereof, but, on the contrary, has been benefited by indulgence. Sir, it is a curious fact, that out of one hundred and fourteen collectors in nominal defalcation—(nominal, I say, for many of the defalcations that appear are not so, the settlement being subsequent to the publication of the defalcations)—near one hundred of them were before General Jackson's administration. So out of the whole number of disbursing officers, more than two thousand were under former Administrations. The losses alone, by two merchants, Smith and Thompson, were more than by all the collectors and receivers, except what may be lost by Swartwout.

Swartwout had his appointment as collector of the port of New York in 1829, by General Jackson. This was one of the political errors of his life, and perhaps it has rarely fallen to the lot of man to commit fewer. It is due to Mr. Van Buren, and proper to say in this place, that he was opposed to the appointment of Swartwout; but more of this hereafter. During this discussion, huzzas have been sung as usual to the Bank of the United States. It collected the public revenue. It kept safe the public revenue. And it disbursed the public revenue, said one gentleman, (I believe Mr. Wise, of Virginia,) and not one dollar was lost while it had the management of affairs. There are some mistakes in this eulogy upon the bank. The bank never collected one dollar of the public revenue. The bank never disbursed one dollar of the public revenue; nor did the bank keep safe all of that that was deposited with it. Swartwout received his appointment during the existence of the United States Bank; and it may be safely said, that it was through and by the bank policy and the credit system, that the Government has been defrauded out of the amount of Swartwout's defalcation.

My colleague [Mr. Bond] deliberately accuses the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the Solicitor, Comptroller, and First Auditor, of a combined and studied effort to deceive the people relative to the existing provisions that authorize or direct the periodical inspection of the books and accounts of public officers; and he winds up by a deliberate assertion that the documents sent to the House are, on this point, untrue. Not content with thus making use of a palpable perversion of the reports of the Solicitor and Comptroller, to found this charge of falsehood against the President and the officers of the Treasury Department, he takes occasion, by the same means, to magnify his own sagacity and industry; parades before this House, as something wonderfully novel, one of the best known sections of the general collection act of 1799. Perhaps the very law which is more frequently referred to, and is more familiar than any other in the statute-book, and quotes, as a discovery due to his own remarkable acuteness, the very portion of that law under which the public officers, whom he accuses of being ignorant of its provisions were, at the time, notoriously acting.

The Secretary of the Treasury had directed the Solicitor and Comptroller, after ascertaining the facts of Swartwout's defalcation, to suggest such changes in the existing laws as they might deem advisable. It is their report from which my colleague makes his selections. Those officers are not inspectors of the custom-house proceedings and books, as directed by law; and that an express provision, requiring this to be done, from time to time, by a competent officer from the Treasury Department, is an obvious and important measure of precaution and safety.

This suggestion my colleague construes into a "combined and studied effort" to create a false impression as to the existing laws, and says that these documents are so far from truth, that he is able to read an express clause from the statute-book, which has for more than forty years provided for the very inspection "that is now recommended as a grave and salutary remedy." And how does he do this? How does he fulfill his boasted promise? How are the President and the officers of the Treasury convicted of falsehood, or gross ignorance? How is the searching sagacity of the member himself established? Why, forsooth, all this promised prostration of the President, Secretary, Solicitor, Comptroller, Auditor, and the whole Government, which thunders so loudly in the index, all this self-glorification of my colleague, and the astounding proof of his ability to perform these "searching operations," (to use his favorite phrase,) turns out to be nothing more than reading to this House a well-known section of the old collection law, which provides that collectors and other officers shall keep true accounts, submit them to inspection when required, and forfeit $1,000 in every case where they refuse so to do. Does this prove what my colleague wishes us to believe it does? Does it prove that regular inspections of the books and proceedings of the custom-house, by a competent officer of the Treasury Department, are now directed by law? As well might you say that the penalty imposed upon a smuggler made it unnecessary to direct by law the appointment of a single inspector or tide-waiter; that there was no need of a marshal or officer of police, because the statute declares that a counterfeiter or a thief shall be put in the penitentiary. The provision in question was well known, but it is an inadequate provision. Did any one doubt or deny that the Secretary of the Treasury might send a person to any custom-house especially to examine its proceedings? Is there a word in the report of the Secretary, or in any of those documents, that expresses such a doubt? Were not the Solicitor and Comptroller so sent under this very provision, in this very instance? Yet my colleague tries to create this impression—an impression the very reverse of what is justly and fairly to be deduced from the documents themselves. The provision in the old collection law is inadequate, totally inadequate. It is permissive, not directory. It was meant to provide for special cases, not to form part of a general system. "The new and salutary remedy," which my colleague ridicules, is not found in it, either directly or by inference. That remedy is to direct, by positive law, periodical inspections, by competent officers. If that is already done, let the place in the statute-book be pointed out. If it is not, let us have no assertion to the contrary, and no gross accusations, the support of which is attempted by stringing together disjointed sentences, and putting false constructions upon the official statements of honorable, high-minded, and competent men.

Sir, I ask your attention while I give a brief exposé, of the policy, and the result of that policy, by which Swartwout was enabled to commit the frauds which he did, and the embarrassments under which the Secretary of the Treasury labored in detecting him.

I believe the merchants' bonds were deposited in the deposit banks in New York; so was the amount of those bonds, when collected, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Swartwout made up his account weekly with the banks, on Saturday, at ten o'clock. No account was ever exhibited of moneys received by him for duties between Saturday ten o'clock, and Monday morning. All moneys received after ten o'clock on Saturday morning, and before ten o'clock Monday morning, were not deposited; or, if they were, they were deposited in his name, and to his individual credit, and drawn upon his individual check. This was the means by which a portion of the defalcation was effected, and unquestionably grew out of the connection of the Treasury with the banks. It is easy to perceive that this fraud could go on some time without detection. I believe near $300,000 of the fraud occurred in this way.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Duncan.

2. Owing to the peculiar manner in which certain funds came into the hands of the collector at New York, (and perhaps other ports,) and to the right which he had to retain a portion of those funds in his hands, they were kept out of sight, and indeed out of the knowledge of the Treasury Department. This occurs in this way: When an importing merchant receives from his vessel a cargo of goods, upon which the duties have to be paid in cash, in advance, the duty on which may be known, that is, the class of goods and the amount of duty on that particular class may be known; but it may take some time to calculate and make up the amount of duty that may be due on the whole. The merchant, desirous to have the use of his goods, agrees with the collector to pay what the duties, when made up, will probably amount to. The collector, in this case, generally receives a sum amounting to more than the duties when made up. In this he is justifiable, as he is bound to look to the security and interest of the Government. He retains in his hands what he supposes may be the overplus between what he has received and what may really be found to be due when the account is made up. Transactions of this character are of every day's occurrence. The sum thus retained is not reported (or may not be, and was not in Swartwout's case) to the Treasury, but was kept (as pretended) for the purpose of paying back to the merchant what was due him. This surplus—if it may be so called—in Swartwout's case, has constituted, at all times, a large standing fund, a part of which, it is easy to perceive, might be abstracted without the knowledge of any person but the collector himself; without the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any officer of his immediate Department. This fund, I believe, is called "cash deposited to meet unascertained duties." From this fund Swartwout abstracted about $150,000.

3. "Duties paid under protests." This constitutes a fund which puts it in the power of the collector to defraud the Government out of almost any sum. It is as follows: An importing merchant has received a cargo of goods (on which cash is payable on demand) of a particular class, and, consequently, the subjects of higher duties; so supposes the collector. The merchant contends that his goods are not of such a class; the collector contends they are, and demands the duty due on such goods. The merchant, in order to avail himself of the use and practical benefit of his goods, pays the collector the amount he demands, but, at the same time, enters his protest, and commences suit for what he supposes he has overpaid. The collector, not knowing what the result of the suit may be, and not knowing whether or not he would recover the amount in controversy from the Government should he pay it over to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, retains it in his hands for his own safety—and I believe the United States district court has decided that he has a right so to do, until a legal decision is had. Should he pay the money in protest over to the Government on its reception, and the suit should terminate in favor of the merchant, it has been doubted if he could get relief in any other way than through Congress—a slow method, and somewhat uncertain—before which an execution might sweep from under him his whole property. From this fund it is supposed that Swartwout abstracted about $150,000 or $200,000, which he had it in his power to do without the knowledge of the Treasury Department, or the means of detection.

4. When the banks suspended payments, there were in number of merchant's bonds ten thousand due for duties, and the amount due on these was upwards of five millions of dollars. The bonds were withdrawn from the banks, and an extension given by the Secretary of the Treasury, in consequence of the pecuniary embarrassments consequent upon the suspension by the banks. At the extra session Congress gave an additional extension of nine months, as well upon those bonds on which suit had been commenced as those on which it had not. The withdrawal of the bonds from the banks, the extension of credit given on them, the vast amount due, and the great number of bonds thrown into the collector's office, gave a new direction and threw all the business into such confusion, that it seems by the letter of Mr. Fleming, impossible to know, for a time, in what situation the bonds and the business of the office were; and if the officers themselves of the custom-house could not tell in what situation things were relating to the duties and bonds, how was it possible for the Treasury Department to know anything about it, or to know so much as to enable it to detect the frauds which Swartwout was then daily and hourly committing? The act of the withdrawal of the bonds, and their extension, and the confusion thereupon, not only put it in the power of Swartwout to commit frauds, but obstructed the channels through which the information would have flown to the Secretary, of the fact of frauds being committed, and consequently of the power of detecting them.

5. The collector is bound to render quarterly accounts to the Treasury, but he has three months after the expiration of each quarter, to make up his accounts, and three months after the expiration of his term of office before he can be considered published or prosecuted as a public defaulter. Let us see to what extent this legal privilege may have operated to the fraudulent purposes of Swartwout, and to the embarrassment of the Secretary of the Treasury to detect his frauds. The banks suspended payment on May 11, 1837. Swartwout's time expired on the 28th of March, 1838. Then it is found that he had the advantage of the possession of the bonds to the amount of $5,000,000. The advantage of the extension given, (advantage, because the Secretary of the Treasury was thereby prevented from detecting him,) and all the confusion and embarrassment thereupon. I say he had the advantage of all these for upwards of ten months next from the 28th of March. He had three months before he could be called to a settlement, at the expiration of which time he was called upon for a settlement by the First Auditor of the Treasury; but no settlement was obtained. Immediately notice was given to his bondsmen, about which time Swartwout sailed for England, having abstracted of the public money upwards of five or six hundred thousand dollars by these last advantages which the law afforded him. Three months to make up his accounts, the suspension of specie payments by the banks, and the confusion and embarrassment produced by that, and the withdrawal of the bonds, and the actual possession of the bonds gave him. Now, sir, I ask, what vigilance, other than that which has never been thought of since the beginning of this Government, could have been practiced by the Secretary of the Treasury, to have detected Swartwout's frauds, or to have saved the Government from those which were practiced by the advantages which the policy of the Government and the laws gave the collector, and over which the Secretary had no control? Sir, to censure the Secretary of the Treasury for a laches in Swartwout's frauds is to censure him for the want of a vigilance which no one ever dreamed of to this time. To censure him for a neglect of duty in this case is doing him the base injustice of censuring him for the neglect of that which the law, and the policy of this Government, and frauds of the banks with which its Treasury has been connected, put it out of his power to perform. So soon as the time arrived for the Secretary to act, every vigilance was used to bring Swartwout to settlement; and after he had absconded, every vigilance was used, and is using, to detect the extent of his frauds and to secure the Government. Sir, to charge the Secretary with conniving at Swartwout's frauds, or any other defaulter's frauds, or even with culpable neglect of official vigilance, is charging him with that of which he is not guilty. It is charging him with that which his high character as an honorable man, his vigilance and capacity as a public officer, and his reputation as a patriot and friend to his country, ought to exempt him. And further, I look upon such charges as a slander from which the laws of our country ought to protect him, as well in his individual as in his official character. Sir, this war upon the Secretary of the Treasury is but one of the thousand means used to break down the Administration. All that can be made out of the Swartwout defalcation will be used to the greatest possible extent to prostrate the Administration, and to blight the popular confidence in it.

It seems, it and other defalcations are to be used as a two-edged sword, that is to destroy the confidence of the people in the Administration by the cry of corruption and fraud, and to bankrupt the Treasury for the same purpose, by extravagance and profligacy in printing tons of worthless, and worse than useless documents, relating to those defalcations. Sir, in character with this effort we saw a resolution introduced the other day, and carried, authorizing and requiring the printing of twenty thousand copies of a document purporting to be a report of defalcations and defaulters, with the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury with the supposed defaulters. Sir, I have stated before that this document purports to be what it is not. It contains the correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury, but it does not contain many of the answers and final settlements of and with those that are represented to be defaulters. Many persons, living and dead, are represented in that document to be defaulters who do not owe the Government a dollar, and some of them, I am told, have just, but unsettled, claims against the Government. Sir, to publish it to the extent of the resolution, was promulgating, in many instances, a falsehood upon the living and slanders upon the memory of the dead.

But, sir, I have another objection to printing this document. It will involve a criminal profligacy in expenditure of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, which can answer no other purpose than to put so much money into the pocket of the printer. It will, sir, be putting so much money into the hands of those whom I consider more worthless, if possible, than the purpose for which the expenditure would be made. I mean the mortgage and pliant vassal of the bank, the editor of the National Intelligencer, and his cat's-paw and tool, the editor of the Madisonian, the Conservative!

But, sir, these profligate expenditures and worthless appropriations can go on so far as resolutions of this House can authorize them. There is no check here. The Democracy are in the minority. The united strength of the Whigs and Conservatives make a majority. They differ in name, but not in principle. Conservatism is but another name for Whiggery, and both other names for Federalism. They are like man and wife. They are joined in the holy bands of political wedlock. They are flesh of one flesh, blood of one blood, and bone of one bone. They will live together until separated by death. Those whom the banks have joined together, let no man put asunder.

These evils are with the people. They can remedy them; all I can do is to protest against them, which I will do while I have a tongue to speak and a hand to write.

Each of these reasons constituted a sufficient objection with me for voting against the resolution to print that document, and I repeat, that I look upon such efforts to squander the public treasure, and to bankrupt the nation, as done with a view to break down the Administration, and destroy the Democratic party.

But, sir, what could induce the Secretary to connive at the frauds of Swartwout? He was no friend to the Administration or to the Democracy. He was a Conservative in theory and practice; and, consequently, like all other Conservatives, opposed to both. I repeat, what ground is there to suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other individual of the Democracy concerned in the administration of the Government, would connive at the frauds of Swartwout, or any other Conservative? Why, sir, above all isms on the face of the earth, Conservatism is the last and tail-end ism. Yes, sir, in the estimation of this Administration, Conservatism is sunk deeper in base iniquity, foul corruption, and black hypocrisy, than even modern Whiggery itself. But, in addition to this, Swartwout was conceived in sin, brought forth in iniquity, and reared in fraud. His father was a base defaulter in Mr. Monroe's administration.

It may be asked why General Jackson would nominate such a man, with such native suspicions surrounding him? I answer, why did a Whig Senate confirm the nomination of a man who had such native suspicions surrounding him? Why, also, did the whole Whig mercantile interest of New York city unite in recommending a man who had such native suspicions surrounding him? we could retort. We might assert that there must have been a conspiracy to defraud the Government between Swartwout and the Whig merchants of New York; and we might embrace some Whig Senators in the conspiracy. All this we might do, and make out as strong a case of conspiracy as the Opposition can make of "conivance." But, sir, we are incapable of making such a charge, as the New York merchants and Whig Senators are incapable of entering into such a conspiracy.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the leading measures recommended in the President's message will be carried out. I look upon them all as of vast importance to the interests of the country, but more particularly that which relates to the collection, safe-keeping, and faithful disbursement of the public revenue. It seems to me that the highest interests of the country require that that policy should be the policy of the country—I mean the establishment of an Independent Treasury. Justice to the laboring tax-payer requires it. Every interest, whether commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, agricultural, or mechanical, and all other institutions, which have an interest in a sound currency, and the faithful performance of public and private contracts, require it. But, above all, the financial interest involved in the management of this Government imperiously demands it; for so long as the present system of the connection of the Government with the banks continues, the Government and the honest laborer must continue to be the prey of the lounging loafer, the stock-jobbing gambler, and the official speculator.

SALT DUTY.

REMARKS OF HON. J. M. NILES,
OF CONNECTICUT,

IN SENATE, January 29, 1839.

On the motion of Mr. BENTON for leave to introduce a bill to repeal the Duty on Salt.

Mr. NILES remarked that it was not his intention to go into any general discussion of the subject of the salt duty, or that of the fishing bounties. He had risen to give very briefly the reasons for his own course, and might, before he took his seat, notice one or two observations which had fallen from other gentlemen during this debate. His constituents, to a very limited extent, were interested in the manufacture of salt, and in the cod and mackerel fisheries; but the whale fishery was the principle interest in his State. The abolition of the duty on salt and of the fishing bounty is a question of general interest to the whole Union, but more particularly so to some of the eastern States.

He looked at the question, however, upon general principles, and at the proper time should be in favor of an inquiry into the subject, and probably of abolishing the duty; yet his mind was not entirely made up on that question. He was not, however, satisfied that it would be right or just to repeal the duty on salt, and suffer it to remain on other articles falling within the same category. He concurred generally in the views of the Senator from Missouri on this subject, but could not agree with him in the opinion that the salt duty was one standing alone and distinguishable from all others. Whether it was originally imposed as a war tax or not, did not, in his judgment, alter the case. He regarded the duty on salt as one of a class, all of which rested on the same principles. He alluded to articles of first necessity for upholding life, and which are of universal use and consumption. Salt is an article of this description; but it is no more so than breadstuffs, and fuel, and provisions. All these articles were absolutely necessary to human subsistence, and he should rejoice to see the duties removed from all of them, when it could be done without injustice to existing interests.

But he could not consider the duty on salt as more objectionable than that on breadstuffs and fuel. If one was the salt of existence, the other was the bread of life. He could not, therefore, see the justice of repealing the duty on one of these articles, and leaving it upon the others. If the duties on the whole were repealed, the operation would be more just and equitable, as that portion of the population interested in the production of one of these articles of prime necessity, would, to some extent at least, be relieved from the loss of the protection, by the repeal of the duty on other articles of common use, of which they are the consumers. Those engaged in the manufacture of salt, and in the fisheries, consume the breadstuffs, provisions, and coal of the middle and western States, which are subject to a heavy duty. Perhaps ordinarily the duty on grain was not practically felt, as the foreign article could not come in competition with the domestic. During the last two years, however, it had been otherwise; and in 1837, nearly five millions of dollars worth of grain had been imported, subject to a duty of twenty-five cents on the bushel of wheat.

Whilst those interested in the salt manufacture, or the fisheries, are paying a heavy duty on their breadstuffs and provisions, would it be just to take away the protection which they derive from the duty on salt, and the drawback on exported fish? The duties of the same class, and resting on the same principles, ought to stand or fall together. This seems to have been the sense of the Senate on a recent occasion. Two years since, he reported a bill for abolishing the duty on foreign coal. He then thought that this duty was distinguishable from all others; that it was not only an onerous tax on an article of first necessity for the support of life, but that it was absolutely oppressive to the poor. That duty is certainly vastly more burdensome to the poorer class in our cities than the salt duty. A family which might consume three bushels of salt, could not possibly get through the year with less than four or five tons of coal, subject to a duty of near two dollars per ton. The duty in one case would be twenty cents, and in the other eight or ten dollars. This would be the duty actually paid; but the tendency of the coal duty at particular seasons, when the navigation was obstructed, was to favor the vile system of regrating and monopoly, which at times had raised the price of the article nearly one hundred per cent. above its ordinary value. He had also supposed that domestic coal was sufficiently protected, from the bulkiness of the article and the expense of the importation.

But when this subject was brought before the Senate, a decided majority of this body were opposed to interfering with the duty; some on the ground that it would interfere with the compromise act, and others because they deemed it unjust to repeal the duty on a single article, and thought it better that the matter should rest until there was a general revision of the tariff, which, it seems to be generally supposed, must take place prior to 1842. If this policy was correct two years ago, it was more so now, when the time was so near at hand when a general revision must take place. He could not consider the reasons for repealing the salt duty, as stronger than those for abolishing the duty on coal. The first, it is true, is of more general consumption, but it is much less burdensome.

Whenever the general revision of the tariff shall engage the attention of Congress, he hoped to see the duty removed from all that class of articles constituting the primary necessities of life whether for food or fuel. But such revision is not now proposed, and cannot be made at this time. As to what is called the compromise act, that was no obstacle with him. He looked to it only as fixing the time, and that was near at hand, when the whole of your impost duties must be re-examined and readjusted. When that time came, it would not be his fortune to have a seat in this Hall; yet he hoped that the subject would be approached and examined with that spirit of compromise in regard to the interests of all sections of the country, which, on occasions heretofore, had enabled us to overcome all difficulties arising from any real or apparent conflict of interests. He hoped and believed the impost duties would be readjusted and settled upon sound principles of discrimination, so as to sustain all important interests; and that as far as shall be found consistent with this, all duties will be abolished upon articles constituting the first necessity of life, so as to lighten the burdens upon labor.

But although, for these reasons, he was not at this time prepared to vote to repeal the salt duty, or that on any other particular article, yet he had no objection to the introduction of the bill, and the investigation and discussion of the subject. In this respect he concurred with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] as he did also in many of his remarks.

Being up, sir, I will notice a remark of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who has referred to the votes of the representatives from all the New England States on the subject of the salt duty in 1813. He has shown from the Journal that they all voted against the duty, although connected with the fishing bounty. After producing these facts, the Senator says, that in going against the salt duty and fishing bounties, he places himself on New England ground. What, sir! on the ground New England occupied during the last war! On the ground of New England Federalism at that memorable crisis, as represented in Congress by men sent here to oppose the war and thwart the measures of the Government of their country? Let me tell my honorable friend, (said Mr. N.,) that that is dangerous ground for him to occupy; and let me advise him, as he values the great reputation he has with the people of this country, to retreat from it without delay; there is no time to be lost.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] seemed unable, or unwilling to account for the votes of the representatives from his own and other eastern States against the salt duty in 1813. He could not at this distant day tell what their motives may have been, or what considerations influenced their conduct; the interests of that section of the country may have been different then from what they are now. Sir, I perceive that the gentleman is in a dilemma, and I am disposed to relieve him from his embarrassment. I, sir, am free from any such embarrassment, and know quite as well, but probably no better than the Senator does, what were the considerations which occasioned the opposition of the New England members in 1813 to the salt duty and fishing bounty. If the gentleman would examine the legislative archives of his own State, he would there find an explanation of this matter, in that memorable resolution, passed about the period referred to, and since, if he mistook not, expunged, which declared that the war was unnatural and unjust; and "that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at the successes of their country in a wicked and ruinous war."

Here, sir, is an explanation of the matter. The salt duty was proposed, among others, as a war tax; it was designed to raise a revenue to maintain your armies in the field, and to sustain the country in that great struggle. But the Senator's constituents were so conscientious and scrupulous, so moral and religious, that they could not, in any way, aid in carrying on what they professed to regard as an unjust and wicked war. They were too moral to aid their country in a great crisis, when struggling for her very existence, but it did not conflict with their principles of morality or patriotism to stir up a spirit of factious opposition to the Government, calculated to distract the public councils, to paralyze its measures, and to encourage the public enemy to persevere in his hostile designs. Although Massachusetts took the lead in the factious proceedings of that day, still a spirit of alarming disaffection pervaded all the eastern States. And hence it was that their representatives in Congress voted against the duty on salt and the fishing bounties, although a measure favorable to the interests of that section of the country, because it was a war measure, and designed to provide the means to feed and clothe your armies, and sustain the national credit. There has been no essential change in the pursuits or interests of that section in these respects; the fishing business and the salt manufacture were as important then as they are now, and had as strong claims to protection. He had deemed this explanation of the votes of the eastern members in 1813 important; because if, from a mere spirit of factious opposition to the Government, they had suffered themselves to be carried so far as to oppose a measure favorable to the interests of that section of the country, that was no sufficient reason why those interests should now be abandoned. He trusted that they would receive from Congress the same consideration as other interests of equal importance, and they ought to expect no more.

Mr. N. said he could not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] that the policy of this Government had changed the pursuits of the people of the eastern States, and driven them from commerce, navigation, and the fisheries, into manufactures. Their navigation and fishing interests had at times, no doubt, suffered, but from causes beyond the control of this Government. It was not the embargo, non-intercourse laws, or other restrictive measures, that depressed these interests, but the condition of the great Powers of Europe, and their hostile measures towards all neutral commerce. But the commercial and fishing interests of the eastern States have not declined, but are now in their full vigor; and one of these interests, the whale fishery, has increased amazingly since the war.

Manufactures have not been established upon the decline of commerce and navigation; nor in consequence of the alleged unfriendly policy of this Government towards those interests. The war, which cut off our supply of foreign goods, gave the first powerful stimulus to manufactures; and from that time they have passed through various vicissitudes, but had generally been advancing until they had reached their present condition. The policy or measures of this Government have had no agency in changing the pursuits of the eastern States. The policy of the Government never has, and he trusted never would be able to produce such results. It has long been a practice with a certain class to attach an undue importance to the measures of the Government upon private pursuits. It is confined, however, to an injurious influence, as little is said about the policy of the Government having any beneficial effect upon any private interests or pursuits. But the practice is to charge all miscarriages and failures in business to the policy of the Government, which is either unfriendly to commerce, opposed to the manufacturing interests, or hostile to banks and credit. This is all a mistake. Fortunately the policy of this Government cannot essentially affect any of the great interests of the country; and what they most require is stability in our legislation.

Mr. President, I cannot forbear (said Mr. N.) to notice the closing remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis], which appeared to me to be uncalled for by the subject or the occasion, and to have been delivered in a tone and manner which I should not have expected from that quarter. He had listened to the gentleman's speech with interest and instruction, and was sorry that, in discussing a subject no way connected with politics, the Senator should have indulged in contemptuous and offensive language concerning the late Administration. The Senator sneeringly asked what the late Administration had done to advance the interests of the people of the eastern States; and answered the question by saying that the people of New England were indebted for their prosperity to their own enterprise and exertions, and the blessings of Providence, alone; and that they ought, perhaps, to esteem themselves fortunate that the bounties of Providence had not been vetoed by the late President. It may be true, sir, that the people of those States, like those of every other section of the Union, are essentially indebted for the measure of prosperity they have enjoyed to their own enterprise and industry. But the language of the Senator evidently implied that the policy of the late Administration had been hostile to the interests of the eastern States. This declaration, made in a very offensive manner, he regarded as less injurious to the late Administration than reproachful to the people of New England. What is it but to impeach their intelligence, and to charge them with being ignorant of their own interests? Sir, a majority of that people—four States out of six—were the supporters of that Administration for several years before it terminated.

General Jackson, sir, entered upon the discharge of his high and responsible duties, with strong and pervading prejudices against him in all the eastern States, and his Administration closed with the confidence and support of four of those States. And yet we are told that his policy was hostile to their interests, and that the only obligation they owe to it is, that the late President "did not veto the bounties of Providence." Such remarks Mr. N. could not but regard as highly injurious to the intelligence and good sense of the people of those States; and it was to defend them, rather than the late Administration, that he referred to the subject. Mr. N. said that the Administration of President Jackson required no defense from him. As the passions and prejudices by which it had been so fiercely assailed, springing from the interests and conflicts of party, had already, to some extent, passed away, its merits and its faults began to be viewed through a clearer medium. The wisdom of its policy and measures; the firmness with which they were adhered to; the energy with which they were carried out; the bold and disinterested patriotism with which difficulties the most appalling were met and overcome; the fearlessness with which responsibility was assumed when occasion required it; and whatever else preeminently characterized that Administration, he was willing to leave to the judgment of posterity, and the future historian. To that judgment all must submit, and from it there can be no appeal.

But, sir, I will defend my own constituents and the people of the other States referred to from the charge of having approved and supported an Administration whose policy was hostile to their interests. What are the peculiar interests of the eastern States? They are commerce, navigation, the fisheries and manufactures. And what do these interests require from the hand of this Government, more than protection and freedom from all unnecessary restraints and burdens? And have they not enjoyed these? Have they not enjoyed them in an eminent degree? At what period, during our entire history, has the navigation and foreign commerce of this country enjoyed more perfect security? When has our flag been more respected upon every sea, and by all nations? Even the savages of the isles of the Pacific have been taught to respect it. What other period of equal extent is there, since the establishment of this Government, when the merchants have not been here with their petitions, asking for protection and security in some branch of our diversified foreign trade, or for indemnity for aggressions committed upon their rights? During what other period of eight years, have we not witnessed meetings in our commercial towns, complaining in language loud and deep of the Government for neglecting to afford to our commerce that entire security and safety to which they considered it entitled?

He would not say that the unexampled security which our navigation, fisheries, and foreign commerce had enjoyed, was entirely owing to the policy or energy of the late Administration. It was in part, no doubt, to be attributed to the general peace in Europe, and the condition of other commercial nations. Yet much was undoubtedly to be ascribed to that frank and honest policy which, in our intercourse with other Powers, demanded "nothing but what was clearly right, and yielded to nothing that was wrong." But, sir, the commercial community are indebted to the late Administration for something more than entire protection in their diversified pursuits. It has done for them what no preceding Administration was able to accomplish. It obtained for their benefit indemnity and satisfaction for claims growing out of aggressions upon commercial rights, many of which had remained unredressed for more than a quarter of a century. With France, Denmark, Naples, and Spain, conventions were concluded, securing indemnities to our merchants, as the awards of reluctant and tardy justice; and yet we are told that the class who has been chiefly benefited by these measures, are indebted to the late Administration for nothing but the forbearance of the President to veto the bounties of Providence.

But, sir, there are other measures of the late Administration which have been beneficial to the people of the eastern States, in common with those of other parts of the Union. All parties now seem disposed to regard the Administration of

Mr. Jefferson as fortunate and distinguished above every other. But in what did its greatest merit consist? It was in correcting the errors, and arresting the mistaken and dangerous policy of the preceding Administration, which threatened the consolidation of the system. In his own emphatic language, it consisted in "arresting the anti-Republican tendencies, and bringing the Government back to its Republican text, and thereby 'saving the Constitution at its last gasp.'" As to his own schemes, with the exception of the acquisition of the immense territory of Louisiana, few of them were eminently important or successful, and some of them entirely failed. Let it not be supposed that in saying this I am derogating from the reputation of that illustrious man. Visionary, scheming men, and ambitious and selfish politicians, with mistaken and narrow views of the public interest, may become projectors of splendid schemes, or the authors of novel and dangerous measures; but it requires a higher order of intellect, sounder judgment, and more practical and statesmanlike views, to perceive the danger and tendency of such schemes and measures in their bearing on the national interests or the political rights of the States and the people; and great sagacity, wisdom, and firmness, to arrest their operation, and provide an effectual remedy for evils springing from erroneous legislation or mistaken policy. It was in the sagacity, wisdom, and firmness displayed by Mr. Jefferson in arresting the tendencies to consolidation and other errors of the preceding Administration, that has given to his own a large share of its celebrity.

And in this respect we also find the greatest merit in the administration of President Jackson. He too, sir, arrested the anti-Republican tendencies of the policy of the preceding Administration. He overthrew the American system, falsely so called, which had a more direct and irresistible tendency to consolidation than any or all other measures since the establishment of this Government. What was it but a system of high taxation, and enlarged, if not unconstitutional expenditure? Had not this policy been arrested, it would have fixed upon the country, for all time to come, a system of high taxation, which would have gone on increasing from year to year—which would grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength, until the people of this country, like those of England, would have been borne down by an intolerable weight of taxation—until industry was oppressed and robbed of half its earnings.

Mr. N. said he would notice one other measure of the late Administration, which, however it might be regarded by the Senator from Massachusetts, was, in his judgment, eminently important and beneficial to the people of the whole Union, and to none more than those of the eastern States. He alluded to the veto of the bill for renewing the charter of the late Bank of the United States, and the firm and determined resistance of the audacious efforts of that powerful institution to coerce the people into a compliance with its selfish purposes. Sir, this was the great measure of that Administration. By an incautious course of legislation, both State and Federal, the moneyed power of the country, sufficiently dangerous under any circumstances, had become consolidated, strengthened, and rendered a thousand times more formidable by legislative grants and monopolies. Whilst this paper-money system was daily extending, and connecting itself with all the great interests of the country, there seemed to be a strange insensibility on the part of the people to the danger and the magnitude of the evil. Some alarming crisis or bold measure was necessary to arouse their attention. Under these circumstances, and at a fearful risk to himself—at the hazard of his reelection—President Jackson "assumed the responsibility," threw himself into the deadly breach, and arrested the onward course of this fearful monopoly and consolidation of the associated moneyed power. This was an act which no other man would have performed; a fearful responsibility which no other Chief Magistrate would have assumed. Nothing short of that indomitable mind, that invincible honesty and firmness, and that courage and determination in the support of what he believed to be the true interest of the country, which characterized the late President, could have been equal to such a crisis. It is to these high qualities that the country is indebted for its escape from the greatest danger that ever threatened it, whether considered with reference to its free institutions or all its great interests.

Had that institution been reestablished as the head and center of this vast system of banking monopoly, the system would have been fixed upon the country for all time to come, and nothing short of a civil revolution could have overthrown it. It would have controlled the action of this Government here, and made and unmade, as its interest dictated, the supreme Executive; and the State Legislatures would have been equally subjected to its influence. Its power would have been everywhere felt at the ballot-box, and its corrupting influence beyond it, on the representatives of the people. All the great interests of the country, and every department of industry, must have been subjected to its sway; and every kind of employment would have become a gambling operation, rising or falling, prosperous or depressed, as the paper bubble was expanded or contracted. This system, it is true, has its root in the States, but the great central institution would have consolidated its power, and given it that unity and energy which it cannot otherwise possess.

The late Administration is entitled to the credit of having arrested the progress of this great evil, and of arousing the public attention to its dangerous and inevitable tendency. The struggle which was brought on has been severe; and if the crisis is not yet past, the final issue cannot be doubtful. The deep interest excited has led to a general discussion and investigation of the subject in all its bearings, both on the political rights and the business and industry of the country. The evils and the dangers of this system of paper money monopoly are already understood, and the public mind is now engaged in devising a remedy. On that question there is much diversity of opinion; but so long as the national sensibility is alive to the danger, we have little to fear, as a remedy in some form will, in due time, be discovered. The repulse which the system has received here, has enabled the people everywhere to rally and arrest its further progress.

These evils and dangers the Senator from Massachusetts may regard as imaginary; but, if he supposes that a large portion of the people of the eastern States do not consider them as realities, I can assure him he was never more mistaken in his life. They were not speculative evils; they were seen and felt in every interest and in every employment, and especially by the producing and laboring classes. It was on them that the evils of the system fell with the greatest injustice and severity. It rendered labor precarious, and its just rewards uncertain and fluctuating. In numerous ways unseen, yet not the less real, it robbed the laborer of half his earnings, whilst it threw upon him an accumulation of burdens.

Sir, the people understand this matter; they felt the evils which were upon them; they saw the dangers which are ahead, and they know to whom they are mainly indebted for arresting them, and preparing the way for a safe deliverance from them, and a remedy against their recurrence. They understand this paper-money monopoly and fraud, and regard it as an ingenious contrivance to confer on capital an undue advantage, and to rob labor of its just reward; or, in the expressive language of the colleague of the Senator, not now in his seat, they consider it as the most successful scheme which the wit of man has ever yet devised, to "fertilize the rich man's field with the sweat of the poor man's brow." And let me tell the Senator that his constituents and mine, and those of the other eastern States, understand this subject, mystified as it is, too well, and know their rights too well, to regard the man who put down the Bank of the United States and arrested the progress of this paper-money system, as having conferred no other benefits upon them, and having no other claims to their gratitude than in "his not having vetoed the bounties of Providence."

Mr. N. said he had been carried along by the ardor of his feelings, and gone further into this subject than he intended, but would detain the Senate no longer.

BONDS OF UNITED STATES BANK.

SPEECH OF HON. SILAS WRIGHT, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE SENATE, January 25, 1839.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 27th of December, 1838, and the message of the President of the 11th of January last, both in answer to calls for information in relation to the recent transactions between the Government and the Bank of the United States, chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, being under consideration—

Mr. WRIGHT said:

Mr. President: I rise to perform a task from which I had hoped to be discharged. I had hoped that some other member of the Senate, more capable, and less likely to be suspected of partiality, upon the one side, and of prejudice upon the other, would have relieved me from it. Hence, to some extent, the long delay, on my part, to ask the Senate to bring the subject of these reports again to its attention. And hence, too, the extreme reluctance I have felt, and some of which I have manifested to this body, to seem to court a continuance of debate upon it. The clearest convictions of duty, however, to myself, to the hitherto tried and faithful public officers whose conduct is brought under suspicion, and, above all, to that great public, whose servants we all are, to whom we are all responsible, and whose full and clear and perfect understanding of the truth, in reference to every public act of every public servant, ought to be an object of primary interest with us all, impel me to the course I pursue.

The recent business transactions between certain executive officers of the Government and the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, has justly excited some interest throughout the country. That interest has been materially increased and strengthened by the manner in which the chief officer of that banking institution has felt himself authorized to speak to the public of these transactions. It was not, therefore, to have been expected, much less hoped, that Congress would fail to make the whole subject one of inquiry and examination. The Senate has not disappointed this reasonable expectation. On the contrary, a lively and pervading interest, in this body, has been given to the whole matter, by the particular care with which the calls for information have evidently been drawn, and by the anticipatory debates which accompanied those calls. The resolutions were passed without objection, and, when I remember their particularity and precision, I feel authorized to assume that all the facts are now before us, embodied in the reports under consideration. A fair and full examination of those facts, and of the conclusions properly and naturally to be drawn from them, is my present purpose; and I take great pleasure, Mr. President, in promising you that the duty shall be discharged with as little consumption of the time, and as light a tax upon the patience, of the Senate as shall be possible.

Inasmuch, however, as the preëxisting relations between the Government of the United States and the Bank of the United States have given foundation for the transactions complained of, a very brief notice of those relations will, in my estimation, contribute essentially to a full and clear understanding of the matters under discussion. The first of these relations was that of a partnership in banking, and the second was that of creditor and debtor; and out of both have grown the proceedings which form the subject of this debate.

The Bank of the United States, as a national institution, commenced its chartered existence on the 4th day of March, 1816. By the terms of the charter, the United States were to hold the one fifth part of its whole stock—an amount equal to $7,000,000. That stock was taken, and, with very trifling exceptions comparatively, was held throughout the term of twenty years which the charter had to run. I believe that some transfers of stock from the general Treasury to the Navy pension fund had varied, very limitedly, the amount of that direct interest; but the variation is immaterial to the purposes of this argument; and, as the transfer was made to a trust fund, in the safety and protection of which an interest was felt, and actually existed, equal to that for the safety and protection of any other equal portion of the public treasure, the real public interest was not at all changed.

Upon the expiration of the charter of the bank as a national institution, in March, 1836, this great interest was left subject to the management of the directors and other officers of the bank during the two years allowed by the charter for the winding up of its affairs, and left, almost necessarily, in an unproductive state. Hence, the early interest felt and manifested, as well in Congress as by the chief fiscal officer of the Government, to give prompt and efficient attention to this portion of the public treasure. The charter of the bank expired during the session of Congress; and before its adjournment a law was passed constituting the Secretary of the Treasury the agent of the United States to superintend this interest, with full power to liquidate the amount, to receive payment, or to take security for payment at a future day, submitting to his sole discretion the forbearance to be extended and the sufficiency of the security to be offered.

In the meantime, and at about the period, if not upon the very day, of the expiration of the charter, a proceeding was had by the board of directors of the bank, which I must be permitted to call singular, at the least, and especially so, as it was a proceeding to which the Government was in no sense a party. The whole bank, its stock, debts, credits, and effects, of every name and character, were sold and transferred to a banking institution chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. This transfer took place in March, and the law of Congress last referred to did not pass until the 23d of June after. The transfer was to an institution in which, upon the face of its charter, the United States were prohibited from holding stock, so that the Government could take nothing in the new bank by this sale of its property in the old. Such was the condition of this public interest at the time Congress adjourned in 1836.

It is proper to pause here and see what was the state of the public Treasury at this period; that we may estimate the willingness, on the part of all the public functionaries, to accept security for the payment of this debt at a future day, instead of payment in hand, and consequently the willingness of Congress to submit the time of payment to the Secretary of the Treasury alone. The Treasury was, at the time referred to, full to overflowing; and statesmen of the greatest experience and deepest reflection considered the abundance of our revenues, and the surplus of our treasure, as one of the severest evils which then did, or which ever had, threatened the purity and permanency of our institutions. So great was the desire to discharge the country from the corrupting and demoralizing influences of this flood of money, that, on the very day on which this agency over our interest in the bank was given to the Secretary of the Treasury, a law was passed to set apart from the general and ordinary uses of the Treasury, and distribute to the States, in the form of a deposit, more than thirty-seven million dollars of the public money. This law stands upon the statute book next before that which authorizes the Secretary to extend a credit upon the debt due from the bank.

I will now pass to the next session of Congress, the annual session of 1836-37. On the 1st day of January, 1837, the balance was to be struck, and all the money found in the Treasury, deducting $5,000,000 to meet outstanding appropriations, was to be laid aside, and deposited with the States, in the ratio of their representation in the two Houses of Congress; the one quarter on that day, one other quarter on the 1st day of April, the third quarter on the 1st day of July, and the remaining quarter on the 1st day of October, of that year. This left the Treasury with $5,000,000 of means, and something more than $14,000,000 of outstanding appropriations. The current revenue of the year, therefore, must meet the balance of outstanding appropriations beyond the $5,000,000 left in the Treasury, and also the current appropriations of the year, or the money placed in deposit with the States must be called back to pay the deficiency. This, I think, was about the state of facts, and the condition of the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1837, though I have not looked at the figures for this occasion, and, speaking from memory, may not be precisely accurate. During this session of Congress, a report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, detailing the efforts which had been made under the law of 1836 to liquidate, settle, and secure the bank debt; giving the then state of the negotiation, and showing that no definite or satisfactory result had been reached. It appeared, however, that examinations had been made, facts ascertained, and conclusions formed, as to the fair value of the interest of the United States arising from their stock, and that distinct offers to sell the claim to the new Pennsylvania Bank, at a given price, and upon specified terms, as to time and interest, had been made by the commissioners appointed by the Secretary, but that no answers had been obtained to their propositions.

After this report was laid before Congress and the public, the board of directors of this Pennsylvania bank, through their president, addressed a memorial to Congress, giving their acceptance of one of the offers which had been made to them; and Congress, on the 3d of March, 1837, passed a concurrent resolution, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to take the security offered, and close the business.

The whole value of the claim, as liquidated by the offer and acceptance, was $7,946,356 16. This was the amount conceded to have been due to the United States on the day after the expiration of the charter of the bank as a national institution—the 4th day of March, 1836; and, by the terms of the bargain, payment was to be made in four equal installments of $1,986,589 04 each, the first to be paid in the month of September, 1837, and the remaining three installments in one, two, and three years from that time, with interest upon the whole amount from and after the 3d day of March, 1836, until paid, at the rate of six per centum per annum. The Secretary proceeded to carry into effect the resolution of Congress, to ascertain the amounts as above stated, and to take the bonds of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania to secure the payments, that being the security agreed to be given by the terms of the acceptance.

In this way the claim of the United States was transferred from the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, to that chartered by the State of Pennsylvania; and thus the bonds against the latter institution, which have given rise to the transactions principally complained of, came into existence. These bonds were each for the same amount, ($1,986,589 04). Each bear an interest of six per centum per annum from the 3d day of March, 1836; and the first was payable in all the month of September, 1837, the second in 1838, the third in 1839, and the fourth in 1840. All these bonds bear date on the 10th day of May, 1837; and it is impossible not to mark singular coincidence of dates between the conclusion of this negotiation, which postponed the payment, and placed beyond the power and control of the Treasury this almost eight million dollars, and that universal suspension of specie payments by the banks of the country, which instantly deprived the Treasury of means to pay the public creditors, and compelled an extra call of Congress. I have stated that the bonds were dated on the 10th day of May, 1837. They were, therefore, executed on that day, either at Washington or Philadelphia, while at New York, on the very same day, specie payments were suspended. I speak from recollection upon this point, but feel sure that the suspension took place at New York on the 10th of May 1837; and it was certainly followed, almost instantly, where it had not been preceded, by nearly every banking institution in the whole Union. A consequence of this was to render unavailable, for legal payments, all the balances in the deposit banks, and to throw back upon the Treasury, thus deprived of its means, masses of outstanding drafts which had been drawn upon these deposits, but which had not reached their places of destination, and been presented for payment, when the suspension was proclaimed. At this crisis the bank debt would have been a most timely and important aid, if it could have been realized in cash; but the consummation, on the very day of the suspension by the banks, of the terms of compromise, tendered on the part of the Government when the Treasury was more than full, and accepted by the bank several months after it was tendered, had postponed payment upon this debt for one, two, three, and four years.

Under circumstances like these, the proclamation of the President was issued, bearing date on the 15th of May, 1837, and calling a special meeting of Congress for September of that year. The deposits with the States, to be made on the 1st of January and 1st of April, of between nine and ten million dollars each, had been nearly completed, and drafts had been issued for the principal part, if not for the whole, of the deposit of like amount to be made on the 1st of July, when the suspension of specie payments by the banks placed the very moneys out of which these deposits were to be made beyond the control of the law, or of the fiscal officers of the Government. The consequence was, that many of the outstanding drafts for the July deposit, and some few of those for the previous installments, were dishonored by the banks upon which they were drawn, and returned upon the Treasury for payment, while the whole means of the Treasury to meet these and other payments were locked up in the banks. Hence the aid of Congress was invoked at the earliest practicable period, and the ability of the Treasury to get on until the commencement of the extra session was rendered extremely doubtful. So rapid was our transition, in a public sense, from superabundant wealth to extreme poverty, from plethoric fullness in the public Treasury to extreme want and almost perfect destitution!

It will now be proper to see what legislation was adopted by Congress affecting the public Treasury, at the extra session of September and October, 1837. In the way of supply, a bill was passed, on the 12th day of October, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue paper, upon the credit of the Government, in the shape of Treasury notes, as the wants of the Treasury should require, not to exceed, in all, the amount of ten million dollars, but with such restrictions in the law as to prohibit the reissue of any single note which should fall into the hands of an officer of the Government, in payment to the United States, while all the notes were made a legal tender for all such payments.

On the other hand, nearly every ordinary resource of the Treasury was cut off, for a period, by a law which suspended, for the space of nine months after maturity, all payments upon all outstanding duty bonds, and gave a credit of three and six months upon such cash duties as had become due and were unpaid, or should become due upon importations to be made previous to the month of November, 1837; and by another law, which, at the option of the deposit banks, suspended payment upon the balances due from them for previous deposits, for periods of eight, fourteen, and twenty months, and required that the bonds of the institutions for payment, at the expiration of those periods, of equal third parts of their respective debts, satisfactorily secured, should be received in lieu of payments in hand.

Another law was also passed at this extra session, materially affecting the Treasury in both directions. I allude to the law "postponing the payment of the fourth installment of deposits with the States." This law relieved the Treasury from this call of between nine and ten million dollars, until the 1st day of January, 1839; but it, at the same time, prohibited the Treasurer from drawing, under any circumstances or for any purpose, upon the $28,000,000 which had been previously deposited with the States in obedience to the provisions of the deposit law of 1836. Its effect, therefore, was to deprive the Treasury of three dollars of means for every dollar of demand from which it was relieved.

With the exception of the necessary appropriations made at the extra session, no other legislation materially affecting the public Treasury has been discovered.

I will now pass on to the annual session of Congress of 1837-38, and see in what manner the legislation of that session was made to influence the operations of the Treasury. On the 21st of May, 1838, a law passed giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue new Treasury notes in the place of all those which, having been issued under the law of the extra session, had been paid in and canceled, or should be so paid in and canceled under the provisions of that law. The same prohibition, however, against a reissue of the new notes was retained in the law of 1838, while these notes also were made a legal tender in all public payments.

The only other legislation of this session, intended for the supply of the Treasury, was the law of the 7th of July, 1838, authorizing a sale, in the market, of the two bonds against the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, which were to become due and payable in September, 1839 and 1840, being the third and fourth of the four bonds taken, in the manner before related, to secure the debt due to the United States from the late Bank of the United States, chartered by Congress, for the stock held by the United States in that institution at the time of the expiration of its charter. It will be remembered that the first bond was made payable in September, 1837, which time had passed, and that bond had been paid and canceled. The second bond, made payable in September, 1838, would fall due so soon after the passage of the law, that it was not thought advisable to include in it a provision for its sale, as the money might be received upon it from its maturity, before a negotiation for the sale could be brought to a successful termination. Hence the law provided for the sale of the two last bonds only; and this law it is, and the practical execution of it by the Secretary, which has given rise to this discussion, and now compels me to obtrude myself upon the attention of the Senate.

The law made the Secretary of the Treasury the agent of the Government for the sale of the bonds; limited him to the par value of each bond in the market, "calculated according to the rules for estimating the par value of securities upon which interest has run for a time, but which securities have not reached maturity;" opened to him the markets of our own and foreign countries, and directed that the sale should be made "for money in hand."

This brings me to an examination of the facts in relation to the execution of this law; and for them I must refer to the reports under consideration, and to the documents accompanying them. From this time forward I shall, as far as practicable, let the reports and the correspondence speak for themselves; as, notwithstanding the tediousness to myself and the Senate of reading documents here, I prefer that the facts themselves, and the language of the parties, rather than my understanding of either, should guide the judgment of this body and the country upon the issue presented.

It will be proper here to remark that but one of the bonds authorized to be sold has as yet been sold under the law, the bond to become due in September of the present year; that to fall due in September, 1840, being yet held by the Treasury as the property of the United States. It will, however, be seen that various negotiations, all at the instance of the bank, have been carried on between that institution and the Secretary of the Treasury, the object of which was to arrange the mode and manner of payment of the second bond, to fall due in September, 1838, and, as an inducement to the officers of the Treasury to yield to the mode and manner desired by the bank, offering, on its part, to anticipate portions of that payment at times which should be most desirable to the Government, in reference to the calls for public disbursement. It is indispensable to a perfect understanding of the transactions, that the negotiations for this object, and those for the sale of the third bond under the law before referred to, should not be confounded, while the dates and order and manner of the correspondence upon the two subjects, and the similarity of the propositions from the bank in both cases, require some care to preserve the separation perfectly, and at the same time to comprehend the whole force of the facts as applicable to each transaction.

Hence I propose to examine all the facts in relation to the time, mode, and manner of payment of the second bond, due in September, 1838, and which was not sold, before I refer to the facts attending the sale of the third bond, which was sold to the bank.

The first question which arises in this course of inquiry is, was the state of the Treasury, at the time the negotiation was concluded for an anticipation of the payment of two thirds of this bond, and a postponement for the period of fifteen days only of the remaining third, such as to warrant the arrangement on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, as one calculated to promote the public interests, and to secure more certainly the payment of the public creditors? This question the Secretary of the Treasury himself shall answer. And as the same question will necessarily arise in reference to the sale of the third bond, and as the report of the Secretary, in answer to the call of the Senate, frequently speaks of the condition and necessities of the Treasury in reference to both of these negotiations in the same sentence, his answer as to both shall be given here. I read first from page 4 of the report, which relates more particularly to the payment of the second bond, to fall due in September, 1838, though clauses of the extract allude also to the sale of the third bond. The Secretary says:

"To avoid the payment of the bond that was to fall due on the 1st of October, being made in new Treasury notes, not reissuable, nor available in any way to discharge appropriations, and which event was apprehended by the Department, the written agreement was made with the bank, which will be found among the documents, stipulating, among other things, for the payment of that bond on drafts to the public creditors, and in specie or its equivalent. This, though collateral to the sale of the other bond, was a part of the same negotiation.

"It was very clear at the time, and has been confirmed by subsequent events, that the payment by the bank of its bond in such Treasury notes, and a failure to make that arrangement, the only practicable one for the sale of the third bond, would render either a special call of Congress or a suspension of payment of some of the demands upon the Treasury inevitable. The Department did not feel itself at liberty to hesitate in deciding between an exposure of the public service to either of those extremities, by insisting upon having the whole of these large sums of money paid at one time, and placed elsewhere in other suitable depositories, if any could be found in the present imperfect state of the law, or a consent to leave them in the hands of the public debtor until they were actually wanted, and then to draw for them, in specie or its equivalent, when and where the public service required. Especially could the Department not hesitate, when this course was not injurious to that service, and it was unable at that time to withdraw those funds except by the debtor's voluntary consent."

Again, on page 5, with more exclusive reference to the arrangements in relation to the second bond, and to the places and manner of disbursement required by the wants of the public service, he says:

"In relation to another inquiry, concerning 'the period when the sum of $1,600,000, in part payment of the second bond of the Bank of the United States, was placed to the credit of the Treasury,' I state that $800,000 was placed to his credit on the 15th day of August, and $800,000 more on the 15th September, 1838. As to the 'nature of the' whole agreement on that subject, I reply that it will be found in the correspondence annexed.

"The substance of it was that about one third of the amount of the bond should be paid in the middle of August, one third in the middle of September, and the other third in the middle of October, as these periods and amounts of payment were deemed likely to promote the convenience of the Treasury, if not of both parties, better than to pay the whole large sum of near two and a half millions at once at the close of the month of September. It was further stipulated that interest should cease on each of the installments thus paid on the day they were placed to the credit of the Treasurer, and made subject to his draft. As the money was wanted at different points to meet the public expenditures near them, the drafts of the Treasurer on the bank, payable at those several points, were engaged to be met there with promptitude, and in specie or its equivalent."

Here is a condensed, but full and clear, statement of the result of the negotiations as to the mode and manner and times of payment of the second bond, with suggestions as to the convenience to the Treasury of this manner of payment, over that of the receipt of the whole sum of about two million four hundred thousand dollars, in a single payment, on the 1st day of October, while the extract closes with showing that the payments, at the times and places stipulated, were to be made "in specie or its equivalent."

Again, upon pages 2 and 3 of the report, and referring principally to the sale of the third bond, the Secretary goes more fully into the state of the Treasury, and shows most clearly the necessity for the sale and anticipation of the proceeds of this bond, which were not to become due until September, 1839, to meet the appropriations of 1838, which, he says, "proved to be unusually great." It need scarcely be said that, if such was the condition of the Treasury, and the anticipated wants of the public service, in July, as to prove the necessity for the sale of the third bond before the close of that fiscal year, the same facts must have proved more clearly the necessity of anticipating, so far as that could be done, the payments upon the second bond, the whole of which was to fall due on the 1st day of October. The language of the Secretary is:

"The appropriations actually made having proved to be unusually great, and the expenditures anticipated during the two next ensuing months being much larger in amount than the immediate means which the Department could expect to derive in money from other sources within those months, I at once addressed letters to the bankers of the United States at London, and to our Minister at Paris, requesting that measures might be taken, without delay, to obtain offers for those bonds, if possible, from capitalists in Europe. To these letters answers were received in due season, stating that, from the short time the bonds had to run, the absence of the guarantee of the United States for their eventual payment, and other causes, no sale could probably be effected of them either in London or Paris within the limits fixed by law. In the mean time, however, finding that the demands for the public service during the month of June had exceeded four and a half millions, and expecting, as the fact turned out to be, that they would equal about seven millions in July and August, and finding, also, that the available balance in the Treasury, applicable to general purposes, and subject to draft, fell below $1,000,000, and that payments were making at times in new Treasury notes, which could not be rendered at all available, I considered it necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds at an earlier day than advices could be received and any proceeds realized from Europe. Particular inquiry was, therefore, instituted in the city of New York, and elsewhere, concerning the probability of selling soon one or more of the bonds, and also a public advertisement was issued, inviting proposals generally for their purchase.

"The result was, that from the abundance of State stocks in the market, at very reduced prices, the lower rate at which other securities of the bank were selling, and the want of a guarantee by the United States, the sale was found, with the exception hereafter stated, to be wholly impracticable in this country, and was expected to be so abroad, under the conditions prescribed in the act. Indeed, no bids were at any time made for either of the bonds, in conformity to those conditions, except that of Charles Macalester, Esq., of Philadelphia, who offered to purchase both of them within the terms of the law."

Here is the most full and clear answer to the question. The expenditures for June had been more than "four and a half millions;" those for July and August were expected to be "about seven millions;" which expectation was realized by the fact, and the "balance in the Treasury applicable to general purposes, and subject to draft, fell below one million." Hence, the Secretary "considered it necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds at an earlier day than advices could be received, and any proceeds realized from Europe."

I will now proceed to notice the correspondence; and first, that in relation to the payment of the second bond. And here it will be interesting, if not useful, to notice dates and coincidences between the proceedings in Congress towards a sale of the bonds, and the efforts on the part of the bank to gain possession of them, or make arrangement for their payment.

On the 5th of April, 1838, the Senate by a resolution instructed the Committee on Finance to inquire into the state of the Treasury, and in case there should be a prospect that more means would be wanted than had been provided by Congress, further to inquire into the expediency of raising those means by a sale of the bank bonds.

On the 21st of the same month, Mr. Macalester addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury a note making distinct propositions for anticipating the payment of the second bond, to fall due in September, 1838, and inviting a correspondence. The documents exhibiting this negotiation will be found appended to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, now under consideration, commencing at page 11, and are marked A 1 to 7, inclusive. The negotiation was unsuccessful, because the parties could not agree as to the medium in which the proposed payments should be made; but there are certain points in this correspondence which I consider it important to notice, for future reference, and will, therefore, read to the Senate a few short extracts. The Secretary, in his reply to Mr. Macalester's first note, under date of 28th April, writes as follows:

"In the mean time, as you do not state that the proposal contained in your letter is made under authority from the bank, and as the discussion of such a proposal, unless made directly by the bank, or its authorized agent, might be liable to misconstruction, and lead to no useful result, you will see the necessity, before my replying fully, that any arrangement desired should be made in that form."

In reply to this part of the Secretary's note, Mr. Macalester, under date of the 2d of May, says:

"Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 28th ultimo. In answer to which, I have to state that I am authorized by the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania to enter into the arrangements proposed in my letter of 21st ultimo."

This establishes the fact that Mr. Macalester was here acting as the agent of the bank, with full power to make the arrangement he proposed, and as he continues, throughout all the negotiations as to both bonds, to act as the principal agent and instrument of the institution, without anything further appearing upon the face of the papers, as to his character or powers, the above inquiry and answer were, doubtless, considered by both parties sufficient upon that point.

In the answer of the Secretary to Mr. Macalester's note of the 2d of May, from which the above is extracted, and in which he makes formal propositions as to the times, places, and manner of payment of the second bond, is the following paragraph, which closes the letter:

"To prevent misapprehension, it should be distinctly understood that, with the exception of Treasury notes, the general course has been to accept no credit, unless the deposit is made in specie or its equivalent; or, unless the deposit has been received by some public claimant as equivalent to specie. The right of every claimant to be paid in the legal currency of the United States is fully recognized by this Department; and, considering the opinion entertained by the Executive and at least one branch of the Legislature, the idea must be expressly excluded that the notes of the second Bank of the United States, chartered in 1816, can be permitted to be employed in any of the transactions growing out of this arrangement."

This letter bears date on the 3d of May, and, under date of the 5th of May, Mr. Macalester replied, which terminated that negotiation. Among other things, he says:

"I did not and could not have intended to propose a negotiation on the basis of a specie payment."

These are the only references to this correspondence necessary to my purpose, and they are necessary because they establish the character of Mr. Macalester as agent of the bank, and the further fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the negotiation, adhered to "the basis of a specie payment, or a payment equivalent to specie."

This correspondence covered the time from the 21st April to the 5th of May. We have before seen that, on the 5th of April, the Committee on Finance was instructed to inquire as to the expediency of a sale of the bonds, and the inquiry was general, relating as well to the second as to the third and fourth bonds, all of which remained unpaid. On the 2d of May, the committee reported a bill providing for the sale of the third and fourth bonds, but not affecting the second; and on the 5th of the same month, the negotiation as to anticipating the payment of this latter bond was terminated by the agent of the bank, unless some other than a specie basis for the payment could be acceded to. On the 11th of May, the bill for the sale of the third and fourth bonds passed the Senate, and on the 7th of July after it became a law.

On the 23d of July, a second negotiation was opened by Mr. Macalester, by inviting the Secretary of the Treasury to make specific propositions for the payment of the second bond in three installments, to be paid on the 15th days of August, September, and October, 1838, the bond being payable, by its terms, on the 1st day of October of that year. To this invitation the Secretary answered, under date of the 24th of July, consenting to the times of payment proposed, and naming the places of payment, and the sums to be paid at each place, and closing with the following language:

"In all cases, however, it is of course understood that payments will be made in specie or its equivalent."

These terms Mr. Macalester accepted by a note dated 25th July, merely requesting that the negotiation might be considered open in relation to the places of payment, and the sums to be paid at each, so far as the convenience of the Treasury and the wants of the public service would permit. On the 27th the Secretary replied, consenting to make such changes in the places of payment, and the amounts at each, as could be made without material inconvenience to the Department. This correspondence will be found annexed to the report of the Secretary, commencing at page 34, and marked inclosures No. 1 to 4, inclusive.

On the 13th of August, the negotiation in relation to the payments upon the second bond was renewed by a letter from Mr. Biddle, the President of the bank, to the Secretary of the Treasury, suggesting such changes in the places of payment, and in the amounts to be paid at each place, as he desired to have made, and referring to the correspondence, above detailed, with Mr. Macalester, as the basis of the arrangement in relation to this bond. This correspondence, thus reopened, was continued between the officers of the bank and those of the Treasury up to the 18th of August, when all the places of payment, and the sums payable at each, were mutually agreed upon, and the negotiation was completed; but in the mean time, and on the 15th of August, a certificate of deposit, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, was issued by the bank, and transmitted for the first installment of $800,000, payable on that day, towards the second bond. These documents will be found appended to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, now under consideration, commencing at page 37, and marked F 8, 10, 11, 12.

This gives a distinct and separate view of all the material negotiations in relation to the payment of the second bond, the times of payment, the places of payment, and the manner of payment. From the facts detailed it will be seen that the bond was to be paid, and was paid in three equal installments of about eight hundred thousand each, on the 15th days of August, September, and October, 1838, which would occasion the first installment to be paid forty five days before the bond became due and payable, the second installment fifteen days before, and the third installment fifteen days after that time; that each installment, on the day it became payable by the arrangement, was to be, and was, deposited in the bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States; that upon the strength of these deposits, the Treasurer was to draw his drafts upon the bank, payable at the several places named, and for the several sums agreed upon in the arrangement; that those drafts were to be paid by the bank at the places at which they were made payable, without being first presented at the bank, or returned to it for payment; and that interest was to cease upon the two installments anticipated, when the money was placed to the credit of the Treasurer in the bank, and was to continue upon the third installment until that, also, was so placed to his credit.

This is the arrangement which the Secretary of the Treasury did make for the payment of the second bond, which, upon its face, became due and payable on the 1st of October, 1838. That the state of the Treasury required the anticipated payments secured by the arrangement, seems to be made certain by the report of the Secretary, and that the places and manner of payment were such as best suited the public wants and the convenience of the Department is shown by the whole correspondence. If, then, there be fault on the part of the Secretary, in consenting to the arrangement, it must be because it was wrong to enter into a negotiation with the Bank of the United States, chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and to conclude an arrangement for the anticipated payment of a debt which the wants of the public Treasury required, upon terms not only convenient and advantageous to the public interests and the public service, but upon which alone payments could be anticipated; and because it was wrong, by such an arrangement, to secure those payments in money, which otherwise might be made in Treasury notes, and thus rendered wholly unavailable to supply the wants of a reduced Treasury. Deep as my feelings of hostility have been, and still are, against this bank, both as a national and State institution, I cannot carry those feelings so far as to censure a faithful public officer for acts like these; nor, when by our legislation we have driven him to these resorts to supply our Treasury placed under his charge, can I suspect him of improper motives for having consented to negotiate with a dangerous banking institution, when it was the only alternative left to him to preserve the public faith, carry on the business of the nation, and maintain its credit, or condemn him for having accomplished these great results by such means.

I pass now to the sale of the third bond, and the negotiations which preceded and accomplished that object. The law authorizing that sale, as has been before remarked, was introduced into the Senate on the 2d of May, and the resolution of inquiry on the 5th of April previous. With his accustomed vigilance, the Secretary of the Treasury anticipated the action of Congress by opening, on the 8th of May, a correspondence with an intelligent banker in each of the cities of New York and Philadelphia, to inform himself whether, in case of the passage of a law like that proposed, a sale could probably be made of one or both of the bonds, either in the markets of our own or a foreign country. Copies of the bill were transmitted to each of these gentlemen, and their early opinions solicited. Answers to these letters were returned within a very few days, and both expressed opinions wholly unfavorable as to the prospect of a sale in this country, unless to the bank itself, without the guarantee of the Government for the payment of the bonds; while one of the writers supposed that a sale might be effected in Europe upon advantageous terms, and that the agent of the bank in London might be induced, "by weighty considerations, to enter the field as a purchaser;" and the other said: "the bonds have too short a time to run to warrant any reasonable expectation of a sale of them in Europe, on favorable terms, during the present rate of exchange." These letters will be found accompanying the report of the Secretary, marked B, 1, 2, 3.

The bill became a law, without any alteration of form, on the 7th of July. Under date of the 9th, the Secretary wrote to N. M. de Rothschild & Sons, bankers, of London, sending them a copy of one of the bonds, and requesting them to negotiate a sale in England if possible. A copy of the law was also transmitted. On the 11th, similar communications were addressed to the American Minister at Paris, with a request that he would consult certain bankers named, and such other persons as he might think proper, and learn if a sale of the bonds could be effected in France within the terms of the law. On the 17th of July, a gentleman of Baltimore, of known and approved qualifications for such a service, was addressed by the Secretary, to learn if he would consent, for the compensation of eight dollars per day and the payment of his expenses, to go to Europe as the agent of the Department, to make sale of the bonds. In the mean time, and on the 9th of July, letters were addressed to the president of one of the leading banks in each of the cities of New York and Boston, and to a gentleman in New York, known as the resident agent there of the banking houses of the Rothschilds in London and Paris, invoking the advice and aid of these individuals as to the sale of the bonds in this country, or in any foreign market.

Such were the efforts promptly made by the Secretary to secure a sale of these bonds in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress and upon the most favorable terms which could be obtained. The condition of the Treasury, and the consequent necessity for the sale of one or both of the bonds, has been already seen in the extracts from the report of the Secretary before given.

Under date of the 23d of July, the gentleman applied to act as agent for the sale of the bonds abroad, replied to the Secretary's request, expressing an opinion that, as the state of the money market in Europe was peculiarly favorable, the bonds might probably be sold there within the limitations prescribed in the law, and possibly upon terms more favorable "if the agency is judiciously executed;" but, characterizing the bonds as "a less current or salable description of securities" than are ordinarily "tendered for sale in any market," and declining the agency at the compensation proposed, but offering to undertake it for a commission of one fourth of one per cent. upon the amount of the bonds, if sold, and for the pay and mileage of a member of Congress, in case of a failure to effect a sale. (See documents C 6 and 7.)

The letters of the Secretary to the gentlemen in New York and Boston were promptly answered; the one from the agent of the foreign banking houses, containing an offer for the bonds, which did not come within the limitations of the law; and the two others holding out no prospect of a sale of either bond in this country, within the terms of the law. The correspondence with the two New York gentlemen was continued to great length, covering the time from the 9th to the 27th of July, and embracing efforts to effect a sale as well abroad as at home, but without any prospect of success.

Inasmuch as the Secretary is now charged with a willingness, if not a desire, to be driven to make the sale of these bonds to the bank itself, it will be but just to him to make one or two references to his correspondence with these gentlemen, as indicative of his feelings upon this point. I will read from his letter of the 16th of July, written to George Newbald, Esq., President of the Bank of America, New York. It will be found on pages 23 and 24 of the report under consideration, and is marked D 6. The first paragraph of this letter is in the following words:

"Sir: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant. I wrote you on yesterday in consequence of observing in the Philadelphia newspapers some intimations affecting the credit of the bonds of the Bank of the United States in the market. It seems to be evident that the maker of these bonds intends that no other corporation or individual shall purchase them. So many suggestions injurious to their value have been made, and, what is more remarkable, considering their obvious origin and motive, have been listened to, that I shall probably be compelled either to sell the bonds to Mr. Biddle, who is expected here in the course of the present week, or to send them abroad for sale."

Does this language, I ask, Mr. President, does this look like a desire, or even a willingness, to make the sale to the bank? Does it look like a wish to be compelled to make the negotiation with Mr. Biddle? Do you believe, sir, that the President of the Pennsylvania bank will look upon this language as conveying such a kindly feeling towards himself and his institution? I will read the last paragraph of this same letter. It is in these words:

"Any bank which coöperates in the purchase of these bonds, at a point like New York, cannot fail to derive great advantage from the operation. The money will probably be required to be drawn for at the rate of about half a million monthly. The drafts will be mostly sent to the South and Southwest, and the greater portion of them will be out thirty, sixty, and ninety days before presented at bank."

Here are the very benefits which the charge presupposes it was the desire and intention of the Secretary of the Treasury to confer upon the Pennsylvania bank, specifically pointed out and earnestly urged upon the Bank of America in New York, and which, be it remembered, that bank would not accept. It cannot be necessary that I should trouble the Senate with further extracts from this correspondence to rebut so groundless and improbable a charge.

The correspondence to which I have hitherto alluded, in relation to the sale of these bonds, will be found among the documents appended to the Secretary's report, commencing at page 20, and marked D, 1 to 17 inclusive.

This brings me, in point of time, to the negotiations which did take place between the bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, and resulted in the sale of one of the bonds upon the terms prescribed in the law. The first step in this negotiation is a letter under date of the 21st of July, written by Mr. Macalester to the Secretary of the Treasury, and is in the following words:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1838.
SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following proposition for the purchase of two bonds of the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania, referred to in your advertisement of the 18th instant.

I will give for one or both of them the par value, calculated according to the rules for estimating the par value of securities upon which interest has run for a time, but which securities have not reached maturity; the settlement to be made on the 1st of August next, on which day I will deposit the amount thereof, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in special deposit in the Bank of the United States in Philadelphia, in specie or its equivalent; this being done, you will then execute to me an assignment of the bonds.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. MACALESTER.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

The reply of the Secretary to this proposition is under date of the 30th of July, and is an acceptance only so far as relates to the one bond to fall due in September, 1839. The following is the letter:

Bonds of United States Bank—Mr. Wright.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 30, 1838.

SIR: Your offer of the 21st instant, to purchase one or both of the bonds of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, at the par value, as limited in the act of Congress, is accepted for the bond due in September, 1839.

The proposal being to deposit the money to the credit of the Treasurer, in special deposit in said bank, on the 1st day of August next, I have caused a computation to be made of the amount then payable by you. It is supposed to be $2,254,871 38, and is ascertained in the mode of calculation explained in the letter annexed.

That sum can be deposited; and if any error is found in the calculation, it will be corrected. On receiving the certificates of deposit, I will execute to you an assignment of the bond. It is understood that the bank is to keep this money safely till drawn out by the Treasurer, without making any charge to the United States for keeping or paying it over on his drafts.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.
CHARLES MACALESTER, Esq., Philadelphia.

In conformity with this proposition and acceptance, the President of the bank writes to the Secretary, under date of the 1st August, as follows:

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, August 1, 1838.

SIR: You will be informed by Mr. Macalester of his having this day deposited in this bank the sum of $2,254,871 38 to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

In your letter to Mr. Macalester of the 30th ultimo, directing that the money should be deposited in the bank, you add:

"It is understood that the bank is to keep this money safely till drawn out by the Treasurer, without making any charge to the United States for keeping or for paying it over on his drafts."

On the part of the bank, I confirm that understanding. With great respect, yours, N. BIDDLE, President.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Of the same date the cashier of the bank transmits to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the Treasurer of the United States, the following certificate of deposit, being for the precise amount mentioned in the Secretary's letter of acceptance, above given:

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, August 1, 1838.

I hereby certify that Charles Macalester, Esq., has this day deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in special deposit, the sum of $2,254,871 38, subject to the drafts of the said Treasurer.

J. COWPERTHWAIT, Cashier.

This presents the negotiation, the sale, and the payment of the third bond, in the language and acts of the parties, and from it a few inferences are to be drawn.

First. The negotiation proceeds from the bank, and not from the Secretary of the Treasury. He does not solicit the bank to purchase, but the bank solicits him to sell, and offers its terms.

Second. Although the proposition from the bank is before the correspondence between the Secretary and the President of the Bank of America was closed, and on the same day on which the agent of the foreign banking houses closed the correspondence between him and the Secretary, by a letter written at New York, yet the Secretary does not accept that proposition until nine days after its date, and three days after the final close of every other negotiation for the sale of the bonds in this country, without the least prospect of success.

Third. It was the only proposition for the purchase of the bonds coming within the limitations of the law, which he had been able to obtain, or was likely to obtain, in this country.

Fourth. The proposition was accepted as to one bond only, although it was an offer to purchase both upon the same terms, and those the terms prescribed in the law.

Is it possible, then, that the Secretary was desirous of a connection with this bank, and to benefit it by a sale of these bonds to it? If so, why did he not invite this bank to purchase during the ten or twelve days upon which he was so faithfully soliciting offers from other banking institutions, and from individuals? Why did he not accept at once the proposition of this bank when made on the 21st of July, and not wait till the 30th, and until all prospect of obtaining an offer from any other quarter was put entirely at rest by the final close of two separate negotiations, both of which were open, so far as his knowledge extended, when this offer was received? Why did he not accept the proposition as to both bonds, and thus confer upon the bank double the benefits which were conferred, if benefits they were, by his partial acceptance? Until these questions are answered, the charge that the Secretary sought this transaction with the bank, or sought the advantage of the bank in the sale of these bonds, should cease to be made.

But the Secretary had not heard from the negotiations opened by him in England and France for the sale of these bonds, and how, it may be asked, did he know that favorable propositions might not come from those quarters? Or why did he not wait to be informed upon those points, before he closed the transaction with the bank, by the sale of the third bond? This inquiry has already been answered in the extracts read from the report of the Secretary now under consideration. He says, at page 3 of the report:

"In the mean time, however, finding that the demands for the public service during the month of June had exceeded $4,500,000, and expecting as the fact turned out to be, that they would equal about $7,000,000 in July and August, and finding, also, that the available balance in the Treasury applicable to general purposes, and subject to draft, fell below $1,000,000, and that payments were making at times in new Treasury notes, which could not be rendered at all available, I considered it necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds at an earlier day than advices could be received, and any proceeds realized from Europe."

This is the answer of the officer himself, made upon his official responsibility, in reply to the inquiry above anticipated, made by the Senate itself. What is it? That the state of the Treasury would not permit him to wait for a sale of both of the bonds; that it was, in his opinion, "necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds, at an earlier day than advices could be received, and any proceeds realized from Europe." Is this answer true? Does any one here doubt it? Will any one here attempt to impeach it? Then the inquiry is answered; and here is the reason why the Secretary, in July, and before he had received returns from his foreign correspondents, accepted the offer of the bank as to one, and not as to both bonds.

These correspondents abroad, however, were heard from in due time; and what were their answers? That the bonds were too large, and could not be divided into smaller sums for the market; that they had too short a time to run to make them an object for the investment of such heavy sums; and that their final payment was not to be guaranteed by the United States; that, for these reasons principally, they could not be sold in England or France, within the terms of the law. I will not trouble the Senate with reading this correspondence. It will be found among the documents appended to the report, marked C, 1 to 5 inclusive.

It is further complained that the Secretary of War took a part in this negotiation with the bank. He did so; and what was it? He shall answer for himself, as his language upon the subject will convey the truth more clearly, concisely, and intelligibly, than any I can employ will do it. I read from the documents appended to the message of the President of the 11th instant, in answer to the call made by the Senate upon him for all the information upon this point, being the report of the Secretary of War in reply to the interrogatories propounded. At pages 1 and 2 of the document, the Secretary says:

"I have the honor to state that, some time in July last, in order to facilitate the speedy and successful termination of a negotiation at that time pending between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Macalester, I acceded to the proposition of the latter that, in the event of the sale of the bond being perfected, the amount of the purchase money should be absorbed by the expenditure of this Department, and the funds to be placed by the bank at such points and in such amounts as they might be required, not to exceed $500,000 a month from this source; and gave him an assurance that this arrangement should be carried into effect, provided no objection were made to it by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Macalester was accordingly furnished with a statement, showing at what places and periods, and in what amounts, these funds would be wanted, a copy of which is herewith furnished, marked A. This arrangement was, on proper explanation, subsequently concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury, and its details have been carried into effect through his office; and I have reason to believe that it aided essentially to produce the favorable issue of the negotiation. It has been carried into effect in a manner perfectly satisfactory to this Department; the public creditor having been paid in such funds as he preferred to receive. I think it proper to mention that, while Mr. Macalester was conducting his correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury in April, he applied to me to know the probable requirements of this Department for the residue of the year; and finding that in all probability they would be very heavy, he expressed a desire, which was subsequently reiterated by the bank, that the purchase of the bond should be negotiated by me, and the bond be transferred to the use of the War Department; to which I replied, as stated by Mr. Biddle in his published letter to the Secretary of the 13th of August, that such an arrangement could not legally be made. That subsequently entered into by this Department with Mr. Macalester, on which, in a great measure, depended the success of the negotiation for raising the necessary funds to carry on the operations of the Government, and which was afterwards sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury, being both legal and advantageous to the interests of the United States, I deem it unnecessary to say more than to repeat the opinion expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report on this subject, that the agreement finally concluded with the bank was forced upon the Government by the conditions imposed upon the sale of the bonds, and was entered into upon the fullest conviction (which subsequent events have proved to be well grounded) that it was not only the most advantageous which could be made for the interests of the Government, but presented at that time, in connection with the arrangement for the mode of paying the bond due in September, 1838, the only means by which a failure to meet the pecuniary engagements of the United States, or the alternative of another call of Congress by the President, could be avoided. Under these circumstances, and with these convictions, I regarded it to be my duty to use my best endeavors to assist in bringing the negotiation for the sale of the bond to the bank to a successful issue, especially as these funds were required to carry on the important operations of this Department; on which, at that particular period, the peace and the character of the country so essentially depended."

From the facts here stated, we learn that the bank, in making its propositions for anticipating the payment of the second bond, to become due in September, 1838, as well as to purchase the two bonds which did not fall due till September, 1839, and 1840, kept steadily in view the disbursements of the War Department, and constantly manifested the intention of making the payments by meeting those disbursements. Hence in April, when Mr. Macalester was holding his correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, and making his propositions, as the agent of the bank, for anticipating the payments upon the second bond, which correspondence has been before particularly referred to, he applied to the Secretary of War, as is here stated, to ascertain the requirements of that Department for the residue of the year 1838; and, finding that they would be large, urged that the bank bonds should be assigned to that Department, so that the negotiations of the bank might be carried on with it. Being informed that such an assignment could not be legally made, the negotiation was prosecuted to its unsuccessful termination with the Secretary of the Treasury, as has been before seen. On the 21st of July, and after the law had passed for the sale of the third and fourth bonds, a negotiation was opened by the bank with the Secretary of the Treasury for the sale of those bonds, and again, as appears by the above statement of the Secretary of War, the same appeals were made to him and the same desire expressed that the payments by the bank might be made in the disbursements of his Department. Being convinced that payments in that manner would, by the bank, be made an essential condition in the negotiation, the Secretary expressed his willingness to accept the payments as desired, provided such an arrangement should meet the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

On the 23d day of July Mr. Macalester reopened the negotiation with the Secretary of the Treasury, for an arrangement as to the payments upon the second bond, which negotiation was continued open until the 15th of August, when it was closed, by an agreement that that bond should be paid in three monthly installments of equal amounts, and that the drafts of the Treasurer, for the money, should be met by the bank, at the places where they should be made payable, which places, and the amount of drafts to be drawn upon each, constituted a material part of the treaty.

If, now, we bear in mind that the same mode of payment of the purchase money for the third bond was the object of the collateral negotiation carried on with the Secretary of War, anterior to the purchase of that bond by the bank, we shall be able to understand the facts, without the danger of becoming confused by blending the two distinct transactions. The Secretary of War tells us that, being convinced it was necessary to a favorable issue of the pending negotiation for the sale of this third bond, he entered into the stipulation to have the proceeds of this bond devoted to the disbursements of the War Department; to have the payments made at stipulated places in the South and West, in stipulated amounts at each place, and to draw but about five hundred thousand dollars monthly from this source, upon the condition that the Secretary of the Treasury should consent to the arrangement; that he supposed the matter was subsequently submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and concurred in by him; and he now thinks the agent of the bank closed the contract for the purchase of the bond with this understanding, and that the successful termination of that negotiation, in a great measure, depended upon that collateral arrangement. He also expresses his full conviction of the necessity of the sale of this bond for the successful prosecution of the affairs of Government intrusted to his charge, "on which, at that particular period, the peace and character of the country so essentially depended."

Not a Senator in these seats can, for a moment, mistake the important and delicate interests to which the Secretary of war refers, in using this language. None here can forget the intense interest felt throughout the whole country in the successful removal of the numerous and powerful tribes of Indians from the South and Southwestern States. None here are ignorant of the vast sums of money the Government had stipulated to pay to extinguish the title of these Indians to their lands within the States, to pay the expenses of their removal, and to subsist them at their new homes; and none, anywhere, who know anything of the Indian character, can be ignorant of the necessity of having, at the moment, the money stipulated to be paid to or for him. If money is due to the Indian, he must have money; and he must have it when you have stipulated to pay it, or your business transactions with him are at an end. You cannot tell him of embarrassments or disappointments. You cannot talk to him of credit, beyond the letter of your bond, and retain his confidence. Who, then, will be surprised at the anxiety manifested, and the responsibility assumed by the Secretary of War to secure, by the sale of this bond, the requisite funds in the Treasury to accomplish that complete removal of these great tribes which has been accomplished during the past year, and which does, and will, reflect so much honor upon that capable and persevering public servant?

I am aware that some of the correspondence would seem to imply some misunderstanding between the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War, in relation to this collateral arrangement as applied to the proceeds of the third bond, and the correspondence renders it more than probable that the one or the other had labored under a misapprehension, and had interpreted verbal conversations, intended to be applied to the mode and manner of payment of the third bond, as relating to the mode and manner of making the anticipated payments upon the second bond. Still the facts show that the agent of the bank made these stipulations essential to the closing of his contract in both cases, and that he was authorized to believe that they were understood by all the parties to constitute a component part of that contract. The facts also show that the money to be derived from both negotiations was indispensable to the healthful operations of the public Treasury, while national interests of the gravest character depended upon the ability of the Treasury to redeem the plighted faith of the country.

What, then, I ask, Mr. President, with some confidence, is the judgment to be rendered upon these transactions? Are the executive officers of the country to be censured and condemned for having entered into any negotiations with this bank in relation to the payment of these bonds, and the supply of an exhausted Treasury from that source? And, if so, upon what ground? Had Mr. Woodbury said to Mr. Biddle, "I, sir, am opposed to your bank; the political party to which I belong, and with which I act and feel, are strongly opposed to it, and I will not, therefore, negotiate with you about your bonds. I will not sell to you upon any terms, be the consequences what they may. My political hostility, and the hostility of my political party, forbid that I should have any business transaction with you"—had our Secretary of the Treasury taken this course, and failed to realize the money upon the bonds in time to meet the calls upon the Treasury, as in that event he must; and had we returned here and found the Creeks and Cherokees not removed from Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee; the military force withdrawn from Florida for want of subsistence; the western and northern frontiers unguarded, and the public works abandoned, what would have been the public judgment upon the conduct of the Secretary then? What would have been the judgment of this body? Who then would have stood up here to defend the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, and who to accuse and condemn him?

Sir, so broad and untenable ground as this will not be assumed; but it may be said that the informal and collateral understanding to which the Secretary of War was a party, has vitiated the transactions, and gives cause for censure. Let us, for a moment, look at the facts. The money could be realized upon the bonds, in time to meet the wants of the Treasury, from no other quarter than this bank. It could not be realized from the bank but by consenting to these collateral arrangements as to the times, places, and manner of payment. The money was to be placed in the bank, "in special deposit," to the credit of the Treasurer; and it was so placed. Upon the strength of this deposit the Treasurer was to draw his drafts for the public disbursements, in stipulated amounts, and make them payable at stipulated places; and, without presentment at the bank, it was to pay them at those places "in specie or its equivalent;" and there is no allegation that they were not so paid. The places of payment were named by the heads of the Departments which had the superintendence of the disbursements, as were also the sums to be paid at each, and both with a strict reference to the wants and convenience of the public service; and it has not been asserted that inconvenience or loss arose to that service from either, while the contrary is positively shown by both the reports under consideration. The negotiation for the sale of the third bond was closed, and the money paid, on the 1st of August; and that for the payment of the second bond, and the first installment paid, on the 15th of the same month. On the 13th, two days before the last payment mentioned, the bank resumed specie payments, so that, however much these negotiations may have contributed to that highly desirable result, the bank became a specie-paying bank before a single draft upon the money in deposit to the credit of the Treasurer could have passed from the hands of the officers and agents of the Government, if any such drafts had been drawn at that period.

These are the facts, and would they have justified the Secretary of the Treasury, even supposing him to have known and assented to the collateral stipulations as to the manner of payment for the bond sold, in refusing to accept the terms offered by the bank, and thus to have incurred the consequences to which I have before alluded? I think not, Mr. President. But, as my task in reference to this part of the connection between the Government and the Pennsylvania bank is performed, as I have recounted the facts and the history of the transactions, I know tediously but I hope faithfully, I cheerfully leave the Secretary of the Treasury, and all the other actors in them, to the judgment of the Senate and the country. If condemnation is to follow, I only desire that the judgment may rest upon the truth, and that I have attempted to exhibit.

Another connection has been formed between the Government and this bank, which is represented as still more alarming and ominous than the one from which we have just passed. I congratulate the Senate, and certainly myself, that the facts, in this latter case, are concise, simple, and plain. I propose, therefore, to read them all to the Senate; first seeing out of what relations they have arisen.

The Bank of Kentucky was one of the deposit banks, under the law of 1836, "to regulate the deposits of the public money." It, with almost all the banking institutions of the country, suspended specie payments in May, 1837, then having a very large amount of the public money in its hands, for which it could not account according to law. This bank availed itself of the provisions of the law of the extra session of Congress of 1837, granting time for payment to the deposit banks at their option, and gave bonds to secure the payment of the amount due from it to the Treasury in three equal installments; the first to be paid on the 1st day of July, 1838, the second on the 1st day of January, 1839, and the third on the 1st day of July, 1839, with six per cent. interest. The installment due in July, 1838, was paid, and nothing more was due upon the bonds until the 1st day of the present month. Still, under date of the 5th day of September, 1838, the President of the bank wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

"I shall, during the course of the present week, remit to you a check on Philadelphia for $300,000, in part payment of the debt due by this bank."

Under date of the 10th September, the President of the bank again writes from Louisville, Kentucky, to the Secretary, in the following words:

"Sir: I hand you, inclosed herewith, a check on the Bank of the United States, Philadelphia, in your favor, for $300,000, intended as a payment on the amount due the Treasurer of the United States by this bank."

On the 17th day of September, McClintock Young, the chief clerk in the Treasury Department, and, at the time, acting as Secretary of the Treasury, during a temporary absence of the Secretary, acknowledges the receipt of the check mentioned in the above note from the President of the Bank of Kentucky, in the following language:

"Sir: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th, with its inclosure. I have specially directed the check for $300,000, drawn by your cashier upon the Bank of the United States, in favor of Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, to be placed to the special credit of the Treasurer of the United States, with whom all accounts are kept, and to whom all payments or transfers of balances of that kind should be made. Whether the bank will consider my indorsement sufficient for that purpose, remains to be seen."

On the same day Mr. Young, acting in the same character, writes to the cashier of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, as follows:

"Sir: The inclosed check has this day been received from the Bank of Kentucky; and I will thank you to place the amount ($300,000) to the special credit of the Treasurer, and acknowledge the receipt of the sum to him."

The request of Mr. Young was complied with by the bank, and the amount of the check placed to the special credit of the Treasurer of the United States upon its books. These are all the facts in this case; and from them some see a most dangerous and alarming evidence of a disposition on the part of the executive officers of the Government to reunite the Treasury of the country to this banking institution, in its new character of a State bank. Is such a conclusion fairly deducible from the premises? The Bank of Kentucky was, at this period, indebted to the United States in the sum of about six hundred thousand dollars. No part of the amount was due until the 1st of January, 1839, and therefore the officers of the Treasury were not authorized to expect remittances from that quarter, until the receipt of the notice from the President of the bank of the 5th September. In five days from the date of that note, the draft followed, which must have been before the notice could have reached the Treasury Department. On the 17th of September the draft comes, in the absence of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is drawn payable to him in his individual and official name, and is upon the Pennsylvania bank. Was it wrong in Mr. Young to take a draft upon that bank in payment of a debt due to the Treasury, provided it should be duly honored? Much as I have and do dislike that institution, I am not prepared to say that the officers of the Government would be justified in visiting it with that measure of proscription, and I do not suppose any one will pass censure upon that act. Mr. Young took the check and acknowledged its receipt in the language above quoted, informing the President of the Bank of Kentucky that it ought to have been made payable to the Treasurer, not to "Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury;" and that he did not know whether the Pennsylvania bank would consider his indorsement sufficient to warrant the payment of the amount to the Treasurer. He must send the check to the bank to determine this point, and he must send it there for collection. The bank was then holding a large sum on deposit to the credit of the Treasurer, as the proceeds of the bonds, and was meeting the drafts of the Treasurer for disbursements at a greater number of points, and for larger amounts, than any other banking institution in the country.

The money to be realized as the proceeds of this draft would be as valuable at Philadelphia as at any point in the country, and more valuable than at any other points except New York and Boston; and for disbursements in the South and Southwest, it would be even more valuable at Philadelphia than at the latter place. There were no general deposit banks holding public money under the deposit law of 1836, to which the proceeds of this draft could have been transferred without depreciating the funds and placing them more inconveniently for public use. By what obligation of duty, then, was the Secretary of the Treasury called upon to transfer this amount at all, for the mere purpose of safe-keeping? Will it be pretended that the money was unsafe in the Pennsylvania bank? I presume not. Little as is my confidence in the institution, in any sense, it is not yet so perfectly impaired as to enable me to believe that this money is not secure, for the short time it may remain in its vaults, before it is called out for the use of the public creditors. I cannot as yet, by my public acts, express such an opinion of this bank. Why, then, I again ask, was the Secretary to withdraw the money from that resting place but for purposes of public disbursement? That bank was, at the time, a depository of public money, of a special character, and for a temporary purpose and period; but it was making disbursements, and meeting the drafts of the Treasurer, and was therefore a convenient location, so far as the public service was concerned, for this money. If the Secretary had transferred it, he must either have placed it in some other bank which was also a depository of a special character, holding the trust, like this bank, by the selection and at the pleasure of the Secretary, and not under the law of 1836, or to a general deposit bank inconveniently located, and where the money would be less valuable. Was it his duty to do either? and if so, upon what ground? Not to secure the safety of the funds, because they were as safe where they were as in any place it was in his power to place them. Not to make the money more valuable, because it was at a point where it was as valuable for public disbursement as any point which the country presented. Not to promote the convenience of the public service, because that convenience was best consulted by leaving the money where it was. He did not put the money in this bank. It was to be paid to the Treasurer there; it was paid to the Treasurer there; and there the Secretary of the Treasury, acting through his chief clerk, Mr. Young, left it in safe-keeping until the wants of the Treasury should call it thence. This is his fault, if fault he has committed.

Was he, then, bound to transfer this money merely to show his hostility against this particular banking institution? If transferred at all, it must have been transferred to some other bank; for neither the laws of Congress nor the practice of the Department authorized the Secretary to transfer the proceeds of this draft to any public officer of the country, simply for the purpose of safe-keeping. Was the Secretary of the Treasury, then, bound to transfer these funds to a general deposit bank, where their value to the public would be diminished, or to some other special deposit bank of his own selection, not for any purpose of public utility, but merely to show the hostility of himself and his friends towards this particular bank? This is the plain, direct, and simple question presented, and this the issue formed in relation to this deposit in the Pennsylvania bank.

It may be, Mr. President, that blame to the Secretary of the Treasury, and blame to other executive officers of the country, should proceed from this transaction. It is not my province, nor is it my desire, to pronounce the judgment which the Senate or the people will form. It is enough for me that I have exhibited the facts fully, and presented these consequences, which were unavoidable, in any course the Secretary might have chosen to take. That being done, I leave the matter to this body and the country, with a respectful confidence that the motives of that officer will be spared, in any event, who has had the magnanimity to sacrifice his personal feelings, and strong hostilities, to the profit and convenience of that branch of the public service committed to his charge.

I now pass, sir, to a very different branch of the facts presented in the case before us. I refer to the published letter of Mr. Biddle, the President of the Pennsylvania bank, which has been adduced to the Senate as evidence of the improper connection between the Government and his bank. The paragraph of that letter to which I particularly allude is in the following words:

"In the month of July, the Government agreed to receive an anticipated payment of the bonds of the bank to the amount of between four and five million dollars, in a credit to the Treasurer on the books of the bank; and arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank. These arrangements, as honorable to the executive officers as they were beneficial to the public service, brought the Government into efficient co-operation for the reestablishment of the currency, and opened the way to a resumption of specie payments. The resumption accordingly took place throughout the middle States on the 13th of August, and in many of the southern and western States soon after."

If I have been at all successful in my exertions hitherto, the Senate now fully understands the whole affair of the "anticipated payment of the bonds," and is able clearly to judge how far this brief and easy mention of a compliance, on the part of the officers of the Government, with the repeated and untiring solicitations of this bank to arrange the payment of one of these bonds, partly by anticipation, and, to sell another of them to the institution, from an utter inability to find another purchaser in the markets of the whole world, makes a true representation of the facts of the case to the mind of the reader. How far would the public, to whom this letter is given by its author, be likely to be impressed with the truth, from this assumed representation of it? An agreement to make payment in a "special deposit" to the credit of the Treasurer, is converted into an agreement to anticipate the payment of the bonds "in a credit to the Treasurer on the books of the bank;" while the certificate of the bank, of the special deposit, is a matter of record in the Treasury Department. An agreement to pay "in specie or its equivalent," an invariable qualification to all the stipulations, is converted into "arrangements" "for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank." This is the evidence from this source, and such is the witness upon whose testimony before the country, voluntarily given, our highest executive officers are to be condemned unheard. How far this witness is supported by the facts, I must cheerfully leave the Senate to determine, but I must, on behalf of the officers concerned, protest against the compliment so confidently and so injuriously forced upon them by the President of the bank. They may bear the hostility of this institution, but they cannot bear its praise; and most certainly not when that praise is shaped, as it is in this part of the letter from which I have read, to suit the views of a malignant opponent.

To give to the writer of the letter, however, all the foundation which possibly can be claimed for his statement of the facts, I will detain the Senate to make a few references to another document. I refer to the message of the President of the 9th instant, in answer to a call from the Senate for all orders and instructions issued by heads of Departments, heads of bureaus, and the Postmaster General, relative to the kind of money and bank notes which might be paid out on account of the United States, since the 14th day of April, 1836. The message communicates answers to the call from all the heads of all the Departments and bureaus who have issued any such orders or instructions within the period mentioned; but the present purpose does not require that I should refer to any other than those from the Secretary of War and the heads of bureaus in that Department. These references shall be as brief as the occasion will permit; and it is here also my intention to let these officers speak, principally, for themselves.

The Secretary of War, in submitting to the President the answers to the call from his Department, says:

"In submitting these reports, it is proper to remark that the circulars from the pay, quartermaster's, engineer, and Indian departments, in October, were issued at a period which required the exercise of great forbearance and discretion in the management of the fiscal operations of this Department, in order to avoid, as far as practicable, embarrassing the money concerns of the country. I had been informed, from credible sources, that a rigid exaction of specie, to meet all our disbursements in the South and West, would retard the resumption of specie payments, embarrass the operations of those banks that had resumed, and

"Influenced by these impressions and acting under these views, which I had urged upon all branches of the Department, these circulars were issued, and in some respects exceeded what was intended; and upon being brought to the notice of the present chiefs of bureaus, they have modified them so as to render the instructions more strictly and distinctly conformable to existing enactments. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that the Bank of the United States was, at the period of issuing the circulars, a specie paying bank; and that to have exacted specie from the banks in the South and West which were indebted to that institution, or in which it had deposited funds to meet the drafts of the Treasury for war warrants, would not only have been of no aid to the public service, but would have inflicted injury alone upon those banks, and been prejudicial only to the trade of the South and West."

Here we have the views of the Secretary, and the motives and policy by which he intended to be governed, in the administration of the affairs of his Department. The time was one of great difficulty. The banks of the North and middle States had resumed specie payments, and those of the South and West were struggling to reach that desirable point. The disbursements of his Department were to be principally made in the South and West; and the drafts of the Treasurer for that purpose were, by the arrangement with the Bank of the United States in relation to the payment of two of its bonds, to be met, to much the greatest extent, by that institution. The supposition of the Secretary was natural and necessary that those drafts would be met by calls upon its debtor banks in those sections of the Union where the payments were to be made, and by deposits of funds in the banks there. Hence his proper and laudable anxiety, so far as an observance of the law, and of the unquestioned rights of the public creditors would permit, to make those heavy disbursements in a manner the least injurious to the banking institutions, the trade and commerce, and the business generally of those sections, and so as, in the least possible degree, to "retard the resumption of specie payments" in the South and West; and hence, too, he urged these views and this policy "upon all the branches of the Department." Still he tells us that the orders and instructions issued by some of the heads of bureaus in the Department, "in some respects exceed what was intended."

Satisfied that the motives of the Secretary, as avowed by himself, must be universally approved, and that the policy he adopted for the government of his Department was proper and right, so far as it was wisely pursued and properly carried out, I now proceed to refer to such of these "orders and instructions" as, if any, must be considered exceptionable. The first, in the order of time, is a direction given by the Secretary himself in relation to the payment of pensioners. The date of this circular is May, 1837, the month in which all the banks of the country, comparatively speaking, suspended specie payments, and is in the following language:

"In the present state of the currency, and during the general suspension of specie payments, it would be unjust to the pensioners to withhold from them the means of purchasing the necessities of life, by a rigid adherence to the letter of the law. The agents, therefore, will be authorized to pay them in such currency as the receivers demand and are willing to consider an equivalent for specie."

This order furnishes, upon its face, the best justification of which it is susceptible, and, therefore, without a single other remark, I pass to the circular of the chief engineer, which bears date 6th October, 1838, and is in the following words:

"Sir: It will conform with the understanding existing between the Department and the depository banks, that whenever your payments on the public account cannot be made by checks on the banks, a tender of the notes of the bank on which the Treasury draft was drawn will be made, and that in no case specie be exclusively exacted, unless the notes of said bank will not be received by the public creditor."

"The observance of this rule will be of general accommodation, and be sustained by the Department."

This is one of the "orders" to which the Secretary expressly applies the remark in his report, above quoted, that they "in some respects exceed what was intended." It will be proper here to add that, under date of the 20th October, 1838, the head of the Indian bureau issued a circular in the precise language of this one, and that the present heads of both these bureaus, when the existence of these directions from their respective branches of the Department were made known to them, instantly so modified them as to bring them within the express and unquestioned terms of the existing laws in reference to the disbursement of bank notes.

A circular from the office of the Paymaster General was issued, under date of the 8th October, 1838, which is as follows:

"Sir: Arrangements having been made with the United States Bank to pay the Treasurer's drafts to a certain amount, at different places, and it being probable the notes of that bank will be as acceptable to claimants, and in some cases more convenient than specie, you will, should you receive drafts on that bank or its agents, make as many of your payments by check as you can, which will give the receiver the option of taking paper or specie; and the Department has no objection to your using the paper of that bank in all your payments, so far as it can be done legally."

The only other of these "orders and directions," to which I propose to refer, was issued from the office of the Quartermaster General, and bears date October 31, 1838: The language is:

"Whenever remittances on the public account are made to you by the Treasurer of the United States in notes of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, or by drafts of that institution on local banks or agents, it is desirable that, instead of demanding specie from the local banks or agents, you receive from them, and disburse, the bills of said 'Bank of the United States,' in all cases when such bills may be entirely satisfactory to the individuals to whom payment may be made."

The Quartermaster General states that this circular was sent to but eight officers of that Department, and that, understanding a construction had been given to it to authorize the payment out of notes of less denominations than those allowed by the law of the 14th of April, 1836, those officers were immediately instructed that the direction was to be construed in conformity with that law, and not otherwise.

The number of orders and directions transmitted with the message of the President is very great; but upon a careful perusal of them all, I consider those referred to above the only ones which have material reference to the disbursements to be made under the arrangements with the bank, and all which go a step to show that the bills of the bank were agreed to be disbursed, as a part of these arrangements. And now, Mr. President, permit me to ask how far any of these orders authorize the assertion of the president of that institution that "arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank?" We have seen that the arrangements between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank, in fact, were that the payments should be made "in specie or its equivalent," and so far as the collateral stipulation with the Secretary of War may be considered a part of those arrangements, that the same medium of payment was required and agreed to be made by that also. In these negotiations, then, there were no "arrangements made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank," or for any disbursements, near or distant, in those notes, any further than they might be considered embraced in the terms equivalent to specie; and how far that might be, would, of course, in all cases, depend upon the will and choice and estimation of the public creditor to whom payment was to be made. It will certainly not be pretended that orders from the head of a department or a bureau, containing simply directions for the government of the subordinates of that branch of the service, can change the terms of these contracts, or give to either party rights which were not conferred by the contracts themselves. If "arrangements were made" between the executive officers and the bank "for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank," the right was conferred upon the latter to make those disbursements in such notes, independent of any relations, or rights, between the Government and its creditors, and a tender of the notes would be good payment as between the Government and the bank. Is such a right pretended or claimed by the bank, growing out of the arrangements for the sale and payment of its bonds? It has not been, and is not. On the contrary, if no such "arrangements" were made, or right conferred, by the contracts, then nothing in the "orders and directions" from the heads of Departments and bureaus to the disbursing officers could make the one or confer the other. In this aspect of the case, therefore, the president of the bank was not authorized by the facts to say that "arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank."

While upon this part of the case, another inquiry should be made. Did these "orders and directions" assume to confer upon the bank the right to make disbursements in its notes? I here most freely express my dissent from the policy and practice indicated by some of these circulars. The Secretary tells us that some of them "in some respects exceed what was intended" by him; and I think some of them go beyond a sound and safe rule. I cordially concur in the views and policy upon which the Secretary acted, as expressed by himself; but I think some of the circulars go much further; and, instead of adopting a policy which was calculated to hasten the resumption of specie payments in the South and West, and to restore the currency to a sound state in those sections of the Union, must, if continued in force and acted upon, have had a strong tendency in the opposite direction. Did they, however, assume to confer the right to make public disbursements in bank notes? Not one—not even the broadest of them. They urged the policy of making disbursements in that medium "so far as it can be legally done;" "in all cases where such bills may be entirely satisfactory to the individuals to whom payment may be made;" "unless the notes of said bank will not be received by the public creditor," &c. Thus in all cases deferring to the option of the public creditor, and to his legal rights, the question of making disbursements in bank paper. The orders, therefore, did not assume to confer the right to make "public disbursements in the notes of the bank;" and even they, broad and indefensible as some of them seem to me to be, do not bear out the president of the bank in the declaration referred to: yet this individual goes on to say, "these arrangements, as honorable to the executive officers as they were beneficial to the public service, brought the Government into efficient cooperation for the reestablishment of the currency, and opened the way for the resumption of specie payments." What "arrangements" are here referred to? Evidently those spoken of in the previous sentence of the letter, "for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank." Having shown that no such "arrangements" had been made between "the executive officers" and the bank, I may be permitted to hope that those worthy officers will not be made to suffer in the public estimation under the blighting influence of the compliment so gratuitously bestowed upon them.

Here, Mr. President, suffer me to ask, why do you think this letter of Mr. Biddle was given to the public? Was it, do you believe, to bestow credit upon the executive officers of this Government, or to manifest his connection with and attachment to this Administration? If it was the motive, some of his able and sagacious friends upon my right must feel surprise at his want of sagacity. They tell us, almost daily, that the cause of this Administration is a sinking cause; that ours is a falling house; and they must deeply regret that this sagacious banker should now conclude to join his fortunes, and those of his institution, to such an interest. Sir, these gentlemen will tell you that no such desires and objects have given this letter to the light. Was it, then, to speak of the negotiations between those executive officers and the bank, and to do them justice in that particular? No; in my opinion, no such negotiations prompted this letter, but certain negotiations which the sagacious writer foresaw were about to take place at Harrisburg, in his own State, were the moving causes to this public address, in the shape of a letter to an individual correspondent. The bank had been too deeply concerned in the singular political transactions which were agitating a great State. Success began to be doubtful, and a change of position, in advance, was found to be advisable. Hence these quiet and peaceful declarations, and these amicable appearances towards ancient enemies. Hence this abandonment of mercantile speculations, and this neutrality of posture in reference to future events. From considerations like these, sir, I believe this letter was written, and not from any change of feeling or spirit on the part of the writer, or the institution over which he presides.

I must ask a little more of your time, Mr. President, upon this letter. The writer says the transactions between the Government and the bank, of which I have spoken so elaborately, "brought the Government into efficient cooperation for the reestablishment of the currency, and opened the way to a resumption of specie payments." The arrogance of this expression is so excessive as to excite no other emotion than that of ridicule. That the Government had been, from May, 1837, not cooperating with the bank, but efficiently operating against the irredeemable policy and declarations of the bank and its president, "for the reestablishment of the currency," is now matter of history; that the "arrangements" to which the letter refers, and which the wants of the public Treasury, occasioned by the suspension of the banks, and the legislation of Congress consequent thereupon, compelled, were calculated to enable the bank the more easily to pay its debts to the Government, and thus to abandon its irredeemable doctrines and policy, when, by the action of other State institutions, they had become no longer sustainable with a preservation of credit, and to place itself upon the list of resuming banks, is most likely. Mark dates and facts. The negotiation for the sale of the bond of 1839 was completed and closed on the 1st of August, 1838. The definitive offer of the Secretary of the Treasury for the anticipations, and mode and manner of payment upon the bond of 1838, was dated on the 25th of July, 1838, and the broad acceptance of that offer by the agent of the bank, was of the day following. By this offer and acceptance, the first installment of $800,000 was to be paid on the 15th day of August, and all the payments upon both "arrangements" were, by the terms of the same, to be made "in specie or its equivalent."

How, then, were the notes of the bank to be made applicable to these payments? Could it be done short of a resumption of specie payments by the bank, so as to make its notes, in form at least, "equivalent to specie?" What do the acts of the bank show to have been its sense of its own course and policy under these circumstances? It resumed specie payments on the 13th of August, thirteen days after the payment was made at the bank for the bond of 1839, but before the drafts upon that deposit would be returned upon it in any considerable amounts, and two days before the payment of the first installment upon the bond of 1838. Did these transactions authorize the president of the bank to say, that by them the Government was brought into efficient "cooperation" for the reestablishment of the currency? Into efficient cooperation with whom, or with what? With an institution that had resisted, with all its immense power, the resumption of specie payments—the only measure by which the currency could be reestablished; which was a debtor to the Government to nearly eight million dollars, and which was compelled to ask time for payment, of one, two, three, and four years; which found its extended obligations falling due so near the period when specie payments must be resumed, or its credit destroyed, that it was driven to the "executive officers" to seek terms of payment which would enable it to perform that high duty? Efficient cooperation with such an institution, and by such means? Need I say, sir, that the arrogance of the assumption is only equalled by the closing sentence of the paragraph?

Let me read it to you, Mr. President. Here it is: "The resumption accordingly took place"—where do you suppose, sir? The banks of the whole Union had suspended specie payments in May, 1837. This immeasurable calamity was visited upon the whole country, and now the president of the largest and most powerful bank in the Union is telling us of the resumption, of the return of the banks to their legal and moral obligations. He has before given us his exposition of the causes which brought about this great and good result, and now he says "the resumption accordingly took place." Again I ask you, sir, where do you think it took place, and when? He shall tell you: "Throughout the middle States on the 13th of August; in many of the southern and western States soon after." What, let me ask you, as one of the representatives of that section of the Union, what became of the humble northern and eastern States in this happy announcement to the American people? Were they not worth the notice of the president of the bank? Or did he not know that this same glorious work of resumption, for which he says the way was opened in August, had taken place in those States, and was triumphantly sustained against his power, and the power of the giant institution over which he presided, from one to three months before the period of which he speaks?—before that “way” was opened which enabled the State national bank to come in, by a forbearance of its debts and an accommodating compromise as to the manner of their payment.

Sir, I am ready to relieve you from this course of remark, and to dismiss from my consideration such testimony, coming from such a source.

I am also most happy, Mr. President, to be able to assure you that I will very soon relieve the Senate from a continuance of any remarks upon this subject. One or two brief topics remain to be considered, and I have done, at least for the present.

In the course of the debate which the subjects under consideration have excited, my peculiar personal attention has been called to the language used in the law authorizing the sale of the bonds of this bank. That language is, that the bonds shall be sold for “money in hand,” and I believe I was the draughtsman of that law. I have, upon a previous occasion, and when thus called upon, stated to the Senate my best recollections as to my intention in the use of the terms quoted. I had not then made a recent examination of the law, and I spoke from memory wholly. I now find no cause to change what I then said, that it was my intention the bonds should be sold for cash, if sold at all, but I find that the disposition of that “cash,” intended by the committee, was fully explained on the face of the bill, and that I am now only called upon to read to the Senate the second section of that law, as it was reported and passed, to make this point perfectly intelligible to all who hear me. That section is in these words:

“And be it further enacted, That all money received upon the sale of the said bonds shall be immediately paid into the Treasury of the United States, or placed to the credit of the Treasurer thereof, in some proper depository, in the same manner that other moneys, received from dues to the Government, are, by law, directed to be paid into the Treasury.”

It will be recollected that but one bond was sold, and, in reference to that, how was the money paid? I have already read to the Senate, from the documents appended to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the certificate of the bank, showing that the proceeds of this bond were placed in that institution, “in special deposit,” to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Was that bank, then, a “proper depository” in a legal sense, and within the meaning of the law above quoted? We have seen that there were no general deposit banks under the law of 1836, or banks which could be selected under that law, to answer the purposes of the Treasury. We have also seen that neither the law nor the practice of the Treasury Department authorized the Secretary to transfer money to the hands of individual officers of the Government for the mere purpose of safe-keeping. Hence the Secretary has been compelled to select banks as special depositories, without reference to the deposit law, in cases where money comes into the Treasury, as in the case under consideration, not in the ordinary course of collection, but without passing through the hands of an authorized collecting officer. The authority of the Secretary to select and use these banks for these purposes, is the same which authorized the use of banks by the Treasury Department from the commencement of the Government, under the Constitution, and the organization of such Department, up to the charter of the late Bank of the United States in 1816, and from the removal of the public deposits from that bank in 1833, until the passage of the deposit law in 1836. In his selections, under this authority, there are no restrictions of law upon the officer; and if, therefore, depositories so selected are, in a legal sense, “proper depositories,” then I am unable to discover why this bank was not as proper a depository of the proceeds of these bonds, within the meaning of the second section of the law for their sale, above quoted, as any other bank which the Secretary could have selected would have been.

Some objections have been made that the Secretary of the Treasury has, in his annual report, compounded, by the use of language, the character of the deposits made in the various banks, on public account, and rendered it difficult to tell in what condition the public money is, or how it is, in fact, kept. I have taken some pains to inform myself upon these points, and the inferences which I had drawn from the reading of the annual report, have been confirmed by the explanations of the Secretary. The terms “general deposit” are used by him in reference to those moneys deposited in banks selected under the deposit law of 1836. The terms “special deposit” are mostly used in their technical sense, as a deposit of the specific thing, the identical money, or currency, delivered to the bank for safe-keeping; and the terms “deposit to the special credit of the Treasurer,” are used to denote such deposits as are neither “general” nor “special,” within the technical meaning of the other terms, but as are made in banks selected by the Secretary, under his general powers, before referred to, and are placed there subject to the drafts of the Treasurer, with a notice, and distinct understanding, that they are to be drawn for at an early day, and are not, therefore, to be used by the institution holding them for the general purposes of banking. The remarks of the Secretary upon these points, in the report under consideration, give substantially these explanations. They are as follows:

“The arrangements made with the banks that hold special deposits, or deposits to the special credit of the Treasurer, have been regarded as temporary in their nature or character, and have, in most cases, therefore, been informal. It having been expected that Congress would, at an early day, adopt some general system, that could be carried into practical effect, on the subject of keeping the public money, and comparatively few collections having been made, except in Treasury notes and Treasury drafts, since the suspension of specie payments, till within the last three months, the Department has deemed it most respectful to Congress to abstain from adopting any uniform and permanent arrangement on the subject of deposits in banks not selected under the general deposit act, but to use them, for the present at least, only as necessity should require.”

And again:

“In cases of deposits in bank, made specially, the money has, in some instances, been placed in specie, in boxes, fastened up, and not to be withdrawn by the receiver or others without the draft of the Treasurer on him, payable at the bank where the special deposit was made. In other cases, it has been placed in specie, or bills of specie-paying banks, to the credit of the Treasurer, sometimes as in ‘special deposit,’ and sometimes as ‘in deposit to his special credit,’ and allowing the bank to have entire charge of it afterwards.”

From this language of the Secretary, as well as from the facts in the case of the bonds, it is inferable that deposits, in their inception special, in the bank sense of that term, have been subsequently changed in their character, by making such deposits the basis of drafts by the Treasurer, which were paid by the bank on presentment as drafts upon general deposits are usually paid. Indeed, the Secretary tells us in his annual report that “this system of special deposits, or of deposits to the credit of the Treasurer, has, from convenience, and indeed almost from necessity, not generally corresponded with the usual forms of special deposits.”

It is quite possible that the Secretary of the Treasury has not, upon all occasions, in reference to these matters, used the language technically appropriate to the occasion; and it is equally possible that he may have committed errors of judgment in the multiplicity of his arduous and most perplexing duties, but when the trying period through which the country has passed under his administration of the Treasury Department shall be remembered and appreciated, I desire to be no more confident of anything than I am of the fact that he will have no cause to complain of the verdict which an intelligent and patriotic and grateful people will render upon his public services. None of us here, Mr. President, can have failed to see that it is much easier to find fault than so to act, in a responsible public trust, as not to deserve censure, much more so as not to receive it, whether deserved or not. It now seems to be fashionable to complain of the Secretary of the Treasury; but we should be willing to do justice even to a political adversary; and none will, none can, deny that Mr. Woodbury has managed the finances of the country through one of the most difficult periods in our national existence, with a degree of success before altogether unknown under similar embarrassments. Sir, we have had similar embarrassments before, and with what result? We had a suspension of specie payments by the banks in 1814, not as general as that of 1837, and when and how were specie payments restored? After a continuance of three years, by the aid of a national bank.

When and how have these payments now been restored? After a continuance of one single year, and principally, as I verily believe, by a sound and firm administration of the national finances; by a rigid and unyielding adherence, in all national receipts and payments, to that standard of value erected by our glorious Constitution, and which, if not scrupulously observed by the Government in times of pecuniary trouble, cannot be continued as a standard of value for the country.

I know, Mr. President, there have been many patriotic and good men who have sincerely believed, during the late derangements in our currency, that specie payments could never be resumed by the State banking institutions, and the currency reestablished at the proper constitutional standard, without the aid of another national bank. I have been one of those who have uniformly believed that, if the operations of the national Treasury were not suffered to be brought down by the general depreciation, but were kept up to the standard of gold and silver, the whole circulating medium would speedily be raised to that level; while I have as firmly believed, if that standard for the public Treasury was surrendered, there would be an end of anything like a fixed and permanent standard of value, until financial embarrassment, commercial suffering, and universal derangement in every department of business, should drive the whole people to call in the aid of some artificial power to assist in erecting it. The soundness of the former opinion is now demonstrated. The standard of currency for the Treasury has been preserved at the constitutional elevation through the whole of our late troubles; and the consequence has been that, without any other aid, a universal resumption of specie payments has taken place within little more than one year, and business is reviving, at least as rapidly as can consist with firm and enduring health. For all these great and good results, as well as for the great success with which the Treasury has been managed and its wants supplied, during these severe embarrassments, I speak the solemn convictions of my judgment when I say that no man in the country deserves more credit than the present Secretary of the Treasury; and when the political prejudices and party conflicts of the day shall have passed away, I verily believe that history will accord to that faithful and laborious officer even greater praise than I attempt to bestow upon him.

Mr. WRIGHT having concluded, Mr. RIVES replied at length; after which,

Mr. WRIGHT said: Before I proceed to notice the arguments of the honorable Senator, you must permit me, Mr. President, to make a single allusion to his opening observations, and it is the only remark of its character which I intend to make in the course of my brief reply. I heard with unfeigned pleasure the declaration of the Senator, that it would give him sincere gratification if the conduct of the Executive officers, in the transactions alluded to, could be fully justified. But for that remark I should have been constrained, from the matter and manner of the argument, to suppose that the honorable gentleman entertained a real desire to convict them of impropriety of intention and action. His declaration, however, deserves full credit, and such are not his feelings.

He complains that I have not answered his arguments, or met the issues tendered by him upon former occasions. I supposed I had said all which I could usefully say upon the whole matter, but I will now reply to some of his positions of to-day, even at the risk of repeating, substantially, what I have already said; and I take this occasion to promise the Senate, after its extended indulgence to me already, I will not be tedious in the performance of this undertaking.

The gentleman's first and principal point is, that the sale of the bond of 1839 to the bank was illegal, because it was practically sold upon credit, when the law authorizing the sale required, in express terms, that it should be made for “money in hand.”

To this I have simply to reply that we have seen what were the terms and conditions of the sale, and that one of them was the payment of the whole purchase-money on the 1st day of August, by placing the amount in special deposit in the bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. We have also seen among the documents,

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Bonds of United States Bank—Mr. Wright.

SENATE.

appended to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, one from the cashier of the bank, in the following words:

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, August 1, 1838.

I hereby certify that Charles Macalester, Esq., has this day deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in special deposit, the sum of two million two hundred and fifty four thousand eight hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty-eight cents, subject to the drafts of the said Treasurer.

J. COWPERTHWAIT,
Cashier.

Now this paper is either true or false. If true, then the payment was made according to the terms of the agreement for the sale of the bond, was made in "money in hand," which money was, by the very act of payment, disposed of as the second section of the act referred to required. Does any one doubt the truth of the certificate? Does the gentleman himself doubt that this amount of money was in the bank, as its property, and subject to its disposition, at the time the certificate was given? Bad, Mr. President as is the authority of this bank and its officers, with me, upon most subjects, I do not believe that one of them would issue a false official and responsible paper of this character, nor do I believe that the cashier was ignorant of the nature of a "special deposit," or of the import of the facts to which he certified. Any collateral understanding, existing at the time, as to the manner in which the Treasurer should dispose of this money, or in which the bank might, by making certain other payments, discharge itself from its liability thus incurred for this deposit, could neither destroy the fact of the payment, nor alter the character of the deposit at the time when the certificate was given. But suppose, sir, that this certificate was false at the time it was given. Then the whole transaction was void, from the fraud practiced upon the Secretary, and the legal property in the bond did not pass to the bank by the delivery, as that delivery was in consideration of the certificate, and it was the only evidence of the value received. Upon this supposition, therefore, the bond was not sold, and that could not be an illegal sale, which was not a sale at all. The honorable Senator next takes the position that the transaction was a disadvantageous one to the Government, because that, out of the proceeds of the bond deposited, as we have seen, the bank was to answer drafts of the Treasurer for the use of the War Department to the amount of but $500,000 monthly, while the statements from that Department show that its wants were equal to $1,000,000 per month.

This position is susceptible of several answers. First, the bank would agree to no more favorable arrangement, and the Secretary of the Treasury must consent to withdraw the deposit at the rate of $500,000 monthly, or he must forego the sale of the bond altogether, and thus get nothing from this bond in aid of the Treasury, as no other purchaser could be found who would pay the price fixed by the law. Second, the gentleman has overlooked the fact that payments were making, at the same time, upon the bond of 1838, at the rate of $800,000 per month, so that, from both sources, the bank would more than meet what he says were the necessities of the War Department. Third, the proceeds of these bonds were not all the means of the Treasury. The whole current revenue remained, besides other deferred debts, and what the War Department should require, which the bank was not to pay, it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to supply from these other sources.

Another ground assumed by the honorable gentleman is, that the bonds might have been, and should have been, sold abroad, and that a special agent should have been sent abroad to negotiate the sale; and then he infers that the Secretary of the Treasury was not driven to make the sale to the bank, had he pursued properly the course which the law pointed out.

I have before shown, generally, what the Secretary did do, by way of effecting a sale of these bonds abroad, and, from the results of those efforts, had he any encouragement to pursue them further? This is the fair question, when we are discussing the faith and intentions of the officer. In May, pending the passage of the law, and almost immediately upon its introduction before Congress, the Secretary wrote to a banker of high standing in each of the cities of Philadelphia and New York, to inquire as to the prospect of a sale of the bonds, at home or abroad, within the terms proposed to be prescribed. They both answer him, substantially, that, upon the terms of the bill and without a guarantee, no sale could probably be effected in this country, unless to the bank itself. Mr. Solms, the President of the Moyamensing bank of Philadelphia, gave it as his opinion that a favorable sale of the bonds might be made in England, and seems to rest that opinion upon the then state of the English money market, and the fact that the agent of the bank in London would, he thought, be induced, "by weighty considerations," to become a purchaser. This is the only direct opinion favorable to the sale of those bonds abroad, which I have found among the papers; and this seems to have been formed at least as much upon the expectation that the bank itself would be the purchaser as upon any other consideration. This gentleman did not propose to free the Secretary from a sale to the bank by sending him to London for a market.

Mr. Newbold, the President of the Bank of America, New York, says:

"The bonds have too short a time to run to warrant any reasonable expectation of a sale of them in Europe on favorable terms, during the present rate of exchange."

After the passage of the law, the Secretary immediately wrote to the house of N. M. de Rothschild & Sons, bankers of London, and requested them, if possible, within the restrictions of the law, to make sale of the bonds. They declined to purchase, for the reasons which I have before stated, and say that a sale upon the terms prescribed, cannot be effected in London. I cannot speak from personal acquaintance as to the propriety of the Secretary's selection of his English correspondents for this object, but I understand the house to be among the first banking houses in London, and suppose it will be conceded by all that there is no fault in the course of the Secretary in this respect.

He also wrote, without delay, to our Minister at Paris, and requested him to consult the best bankers in France, and effect a sale of the bonds there, if it could be done within the limits of his authority. As the gentleman has commented upon the unsatisfactory character of the reply from this quarter, I will read a part of Governor Cass's answer. He says:

"But Mr. Welles sought information from the bankers, and his views may be depended on. He states, that after examination, he found it impossible to obtain an acceptable proposition, because, in the first place, the bonds are too large, and because, in the second place, bankers who made an offer would necessarily be compelled to hold themselves in readiness to comply, after information of the result should be obtained from the United States; and would thus be bound, for many weeks, to have the money within their control, while, in the meantime, some event might occur to change the state of the money market, and thus to embarrass them. Mr. Welles was decidedly of opinion that a better arrangement might be made in the United States than here. Under these circumstances, and placing confidence in his representations, I do not think that the object could be effected in Paris, upon such terms as you would approve."

Could the Secretary, after such an opinion, coming from such a source, and based upon such authority, longer hope to find in France a market for these bonds, within the limitations of the law? Can his motives be suspected, because he relied and acted upon such evidence?

The Secretary further, immediately after the passage of the law, opened a correspondence with a Mr. Belmont of New York, an agent, resident there, of extensive banking houses in London and Paris. This correspondence was continued from the 9th to the 21st of July, and resulted in an entire declination to purchase the bonds within the restrictions of the law, either for himself, or for account of his principals in Europe.

But, says the honorable Senator, the Secretary ought to have sent an agent to Europe to negotiate a sale of the bonds, and not to have depended upon the uncertainty of correspondence. I have shown that an effort was made by the Secretary to employ an agent, soon after the passage of the law; but that the person applied to, conceded by the gentleman to be qualified and competent, declined to accept the compensation offered by the Secretary—eight dollars per day and necessary expenses—and demanded a commission of one fourth of one per cent. upon the amount of the bonds, if a sale was effected, and the pay and mileage of a member of Congress if he should fail in the mission. I have made upon my table a hasty casting of the amount of this commission demanded by the agent, and, if I am not mistaken, it is, upon both bonds, a trifling fraction below $10,000. This expense the Secretary did not feel willing to incur in any event, while the prospect of a sale did not seem to him to authorize the pay and mileage of a member of Congress for a journey from this country to England and France, and the return, simply to make the experiment. He did not, therefore, send the agent. In this he may have erred, for it is not my purpose to prove that the Secretary is perfect, or exempt from error. This point I cheerfully leave to the decision of this body and the public. My only anxiety is, that the whole truth shall appear before the decision is pronounced; that it shall be distinctly known that the bond was sold at the par value, as fixed in the law, and that every dollar of the proceeds has paid a dollar of debt against the public Treasury, without any deduction of $10,000, or any other sum, for the expenses of negotiating that sale. If, then, the conclusion shall be that the Secretary has brought the Government into improper connection with a hostile bank, by the negotiation, it must be admitted that he has saved this $10,000 to the Treasury of his country by the operation.

The Senator next says, there is no evidence of the necessity of the sale of this bond at all, and indicates an opinion that it is the duty of the Secretary, and of those who are willing to apologize for his acts, to show that necessity before they attempt to justify the sale he made. To the Senator's arguments upon this position I have several answers.

First, the Secretary has himself stated that the calls upon the Treasury for the month of June "had exceeded four and a half millions;" that he anticipated, "as the fact turned out to be," that those calls would equal about seven millions for the two following months of July and August; "that the available balance in the Treasury, applicable to general purposes, and subject to draft, fell below one million; that payments were making, at times, in new Treasury notes, which could not be rendered at all available;" and that, therefore, he considered it "necessary to effect a sale of at least one of the bonds, at an earlier day than advices could be received and any proceeds realized from Europe." This is a state of the Treasury, and the exhibition of its necessities, from the head of that Department; and I, sir, have been accustomed to place confidence in statements upon that point, from that authority.

Second, the law authorizing the Secretary to issue Treasury notes for the supply of the Treasury, expressly limits that power to its necessities, after all the other lawful means of supply have been exhausted. Hence the sale of the bonds became a duty, before the credit of the Government, in the shape of these notes, was resorted to; while the only power existing to issue notes, at the period of these transactions, was the power to issue new notes, under the law of 1838, in the place of those paid in and canceled under the law of 1837; and it was, in the nature of things, impossible for human foresight to say how rapidly the old notes would come in, and, consequently, what might be the extent of the power, within any given period, to issue new notes.

Third. The apparent balances of money on deposit in bank, to the credit of the Treasurer, afford no standard by which to form a judgment as to the amount of available means of the Treasury on any given day, because those balances were constantly made the basis of drafts by the Treasurer, which, the Secretary tells us in the correspondence, would necessarily be out from thirty to ninety days, before they would come round to the bank to be there debited to the Treasurer, and deducted from the amount standing to his credit upon the books of the bank. These are believed to be full and perfect answers to the positions taken by the Senator to show that a necessity for the sale of the bond did not exist. The condition of the Treasury, therefore, at the time the sale was made, appears from the statement of the Secretary above given, unimpeached by the considerations to which the Senator has referred, and which he seemed to suppose inconsistent with it. Is, then, the officer having charge of the Treasury Department to be taken as authority for the state of the Treasury, its wants, and its necessities, at any given period?

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Swartwout Defalcation—Mr. Bynum.

HO. OF REPS.

With me, sir, he is. The honorable gentleman has made repeated appeals to me upon this point, as chairman of the Committee on Finance of this body, and I cheerfully admit that the vigilance of his researches, and the minuteness of his inquiries may have shown him much better qualified for the head of that committee than myself; but I candidly tell him and the Senate, that in the discharge of my duties in the position I hold, the statements of the proper officers of the Government, as to the condition of the Treasury, have been authority to me, so far as facts and figures are concerned. Until the facts and figures, therefore, coming from that quarter, shall be shown to be erroneous, I recognize no right to call upon me to sustain their accuracy.

The Senator further says the issues of Treasury notes were not made by the Secretary in the most advantageous manner, that a rate of interest might have been given to them which would have enabled the Department to command specie for them in the market, and would have induced capitalists to hold them as investments until they became redeemable by the law, and, therefore, ceased to bear interest; and he contends that the Secretary ought not, therefore, to be permitted to urge his apprehension that the new Treasury notes would come in for redemption, in the way of payments upon the public dues, as causing a necessity for the sale of this bond. It is not for me to contend that the Secretary of the Treasury is all-wise as a financier, or that the issue of these Treasury notes in some other form and manner might not have afforded to the Treasury greater temporary relief. It is enough for my purpose, that the Secretary acted in good faith and according to his best judgment, and issued the notes in the manner which he believed best calculated to afford to the Treasury and to the country the relief intended by the law; that they were issued, were out, and were returning upon the Treasury for redemption, in the shape of payments of the revenue, at the time the law passed authorizing the sale of these bonds. The necessity from this quarter did, therefore, in fact exist, and the experience of the Department, by the payment by the bank of the first bond, paid in 1837, almost wholly in Treasury drafts and other like Government liabilities, enabled the Secretary to judge with certainty of the extent of the necessity growing out of this consideration. Had he then rested quietly until these bonds reached maturity depending upon their proceeds for money to meet the public disbursements, and then met payments in unavailable Treasury notes, notes which could not be reissued for any purpose, what would have been thought and said of his financial skill or official faithfulness? Or, if he had sat down and mourned over the fact that the notes had not been originally issued in some different manner, would that have supplied his exhausted Treasury?

A further complaint of the honorable Senator is, that the proceeds of the draft upon the Pennsylvania bank for $300,000, transmitted by the Bank of Kentucky, in part payment of its debt to the Government, were permitted to remain on deposit in the former institution, until they were required for disbursement; and he asks, with great emphasis, why was not this sum transferred to some other depository? Why not to the Bank of America, at New York? Why not to any place other than this bank, to which the Secretary and his political friends had been so hostile? I am not aware, Mr. President, that I can say anything which I have not already said upon this subject. I have already shown that this money was as valuable to the Treasury, as convenient for its use, and as safe, where it was left, as it could have been made in any other depository; and, in the face of these facts, if it were perfectly respectful, I would answer the gentleman's queries by asking him, why should the Secretary have transferred this money, until required for disbursement? For what public interest or object? Had he transferred it, was there any possible reason he could have assigned for the act other than his own hostility and that of his political party to this bank? And would the Senator from Virginia have advised the Secretary to put himself upon such a defense, for such an act, either before this body or the country?

I am here compelled, Mr. President, to make a remark in self-explanation and justification, and I am sorry to find that, in this debate especially, the most precise and clear definitions are rendered constantly necessary. The gentleman says in my former remarks I termed this Pennsylvania bank "a proper depository," and he repeats the phrase with an evident design to carry the implication that its use by me was the manifestation of a change of feeling on my part towards the institution. Sir, the gentleman could not have failed to notice that I was speaking of the second section of the law authorizing the sale of these bonds, in which the terms "proper depository" are used; that I was examining the legal power and right of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the present state of the law in relation to the public deposits, to select this institution as a depository for the proceeds of these bonds, that I came to the conclusion that the Secretary possessed the legal power and right to make this selection, as much as that of any other banking institution not a general deposit bank under the deposit law of 1836; and that this bank, therefore, in a legal sense, within the powers of the Secretary and the meaning of the second section of the act for the sale of the bonds, was, when so selected, "as proper a depository for that especial purpose as any other which could have been so selected." These were my words, or their substance, and I used the phrase, which the Senator has so frequently repeated, in no other sense or connection. If he was not before aware of my meaning, in the use of these terms, I now offer him this explanation and definition of it.

A further objection brought by the honorable gentleman against the Secretary of the Treasury is, that the public interests were disregarded by depositing this $300,000 in this bank; inasmuch as, had the deposit been made in a general deposit bank, under the deposit law of 1836, of suitable capital, an interest might have been obtained upon the deposit for the time it remained in bank. If this objection, Mr. President, is to be considered as developing the policy of the deposit law of 1836, I am bound to say that it will make that measure more objectionable to me than it has ever before been, unfavorably as I have ever viewed it. What is the provision of that law referred to? That the bank shall pay an interest at the rate of two per centum per annum upon all money remaining on deposit with it, for one whole quarter of the year, over and above an amount equal to the one fourth part of the capital of the bank actually paid in. Now, sir, to have placed this $300,000 upon this investment of two per cent. a bank of the very smallest capital must have been selected, so that the largest possible excess might have existed, upon which interest would be payable, while that part of the deposit which equaled one fourth of the capital of the bank, actually paid in, must have been suffered to remain three full months to entitle the Treasury to a recurring interest of two per cent. upon the average excess. I have ever thought, sir, that to make a bank pay interest upon public deposits was the most direct mode to stimulate those institutions to use the public money for banking purposes; and, therefore, the worst possible policy which any Government, State or national, could possibly adopt; but if, in addition to this insurmountable objection, the consideration of capital paid in, as a security for the deposit, is to be abandoned, and the Secretary of the Treasury is to be required to select the banks of the smallest real capital, that the largest amount of the public money upon deposit may be drawing interest, the tendency of the system of State bank deposits, as adopted and established by the deposit law of 1836, is infinitely worse than I have heretofore considered it to be. And if the Secretary of the Treasury is to receive public censure, here or elsewhere, for not acting upon this dangerous principle, I must stand closely by him and share in the condemnation.

The Senator has considered it to be his duty to make very especial and marked reference to the letter of Mr. Biddle to the Secretary of the Treasury, written under date of the 13th of August, 1838, to be found among the documents, at pages 36 and 37 of the report of the Secretary, marked F 7, and infers from it that some correspondence between the Secretary of War and the bank, not communicated to Congress, must have taken place, in reference to the arrangement for paying the bank bonds in disbursements for the War Department. The honorable gentleman has called upon me, in my seat here, to answer to any knowledge I may possess as to such a correspondence, and I frankly stated to him and the Senate, that I neither know anything of it, nor do I find the least reason, from this, or any of the documents, to suppose that any such correspondence ever took place. If he, and the Senate, will have the goodness to look to the letter from the Secretary of War to Major Cooper, the then acting Secretary, written from the Virginia Springs, and to be found with the documents appended to the President's message, in answer to the last call of the Senator, it will be seen that all the arrangement upon this subject which the bank has claimed, or which even suspicion has alleged to have been attempted, is there fully avowed by the honorable Secretary, and its prompt and honorable fulfillment is respectfully urged upon the Treasury officers. I cannot, therefore, possibly see what motive is left for concealment, or why any correspondence of a private character should be supposed to have been wrongfully withheld, in relation to an arrangement completed, avowed, and carried into full execution.

The gentleman seems further to apprehend that I, and those with whom I act here, have changed our views and feelings in relation to the dangers of a national bank, and the dangerous character of a State institution so powerful as that of which we speak. Mr. President, he mistakes us utterly. We have experienced no change of feeling or opinion upon either of these points. I say willingly and cheerfully that I listened to some of the remarks of the honorable gentleman, in relation to the danger of institutions of either character, with unmixed delight. I rejoiced to hear him refer to the former expressions of opinion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] upon these subjects, and to declare his increasing convictions in their justice and truth. Let him continue to be governed by these opinions and feelings, in reference to these matters, and he need not make himself more sure of anything, in the whole course of his life, than he may now be of the fact that I, and those who think and act with me here, will be found with him, side by side and shoulder to shoulder, rendering him our feeble aid and support in any war in which he may be engaged in the prosecution of such principles.

I have but a single other remark, Mr. President. The Senator has made repeated allusion to the time I have taken to prepare for the debate of this day. Sir, I pretend to no extraordinary powers of intuition. I require preparation to address this body, and my great fault is that I do not sufficiently prepare for so responsible a duty. Yet I must be permitted to think that such remarks, coming from that gentleman, should not have been made without qualification. He may not have known that the deep interest of a large number of the members of the Senate, in a measure depending before the body, (the land graduation bill,) at the time when this debate was introduced by himself, induced me and others to consent to postpone the further consideration of this matter until that measure could be definitively disposed of; but such was the fact. The Senator did know, however, upon whose request the postponement, for the last week, had taken place, and I thought I had a right to expect that he would not have made remarks calculated to charge that delay upon me.

SWARTWOUT DEFALCATION.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. BYNUM,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 19, 1839,

On the motion of Mr. WAGENER to be excused from serving on the Investigating Committee to examine into the Defalcation of Samuel Swartwout.

Mr. BYNUM said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I came to the House this morning with little intention of troubling it with any remarks of mine upon the subject under consideration, and but for its extraordinary character, and the extraordinary manner in which this debate has been carried on, and the singularity and

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Swartwout Defalcation.—Mr. Bynum.

SENATE.

variety of considerations which it embraces, I should have contented myself by letting it pass without doing more than giving a silent vote on the proposition before the House. Sir, I deem this one of the most important questions that has for years past occupied the attention of this House—not from the simple proposition on which we are called to act; no! but from the magnitude of the consequences which, if some of the intimations that have fallen in this debate be true, must ensue, if it is intended to carry on this investigation in good faith to the country, or if anything more is intended by it than a political hoax, which it has now become so customary for a certain party to practice upon the too confiding people in almost every nook and corner of this vast and growing Republic. The immense importance of this investigation, and of the manner in which it should be conducted, arises from two considerations, entirely independent of the professed and ostensible objects of those who have now taken it into hand. The propriety of investigating the mere defalcations of Swartwout and Price involves matters of common occurrence about which few, I hope, of any party, will be found, here or elsewhere, to disagree. That investigation should be made, and in good faith to the public; and if none other had moved it, I should have felt it my duty to have done it myself. Upon that subject I have seen little or no disagreement, here or elsewhere.

But he had said that there appeared now, from the remarks of honorable gentlemen on the other side, two other subjects involved, of independent consideration from the one avowed to be the object of the inquiry. What were they? First, sir, is the contemplation of an impeachment of the Secretary of the Treasury as a particeps criminis of these defalcations. He, sir, has been marked in advance, and charged with the commission of crime that should and must brand him and his family with infamy with all posterity, if the one hundredth part of the allegations and bitter denunciations that have been made against him on this floor, within the last few weeks, be true; and, sir, if they be not true, then I will not say here what execration and public indignation should await the base calumniator and false accuser. I hope I am the last man on earth who would step between the guilty criminal and the impending penalty of the outraged laws of the land; and should be amongst the last to attempt to throw around an offending guilty officer one panoply that would shield and protect him from the odium of insulted justice, and immediate and deserved punishment, however ignominious. If, then, these serious considerations are involved, which none will deny, what infuriated partisan will dare rise on this floor and say that this investigation should not be conducted with the strictest impartiality, and that the composition of this committee should not be made by men the most uncommitted, disinterested, and free of prejudice against the Secretary, whose private, as well as public, character is to be so seriously affected by the result of this investigation?

The importance of these facts surely cannot fail to strike gentlemen who feel an interest in an impartial investigation of this matter. I would say to them, if they have no regard for Levi Woodbury's public or private character, and are determined to immolate him in their party rancor, let the innocence of an unoffending private family plead for the observance of the common forms of justice in the prosecution of this trial, and commit their fortunes and their fame not into the hands of those who have openly and publicly proclaimed him already guilty, in advance, and to establish which they have staked their interest and their honor. I appeal to gentlemen to pause, if but for a moment, in this mad career of party warfare, and reflect upon the stupendous injustice that they are about to inflict upon injured innocence in the blind and maddening pursuit of a victim for party malice. Let them place upon the committee no man that has prejudged the guilt or innocence of a party to be placed on his trial; or if they do, then let him have at least one friend, to be selected by his friends, to see that the forms of justice have been observed, if the substance be denied.

I charge gentlemen who now, by a strange combination, have obtained the power of this House, not to go into this investigation, which is to affect so seriously the individual character of one heretofore uncontaminated with reproach, with unclean hands, or with any predetermined resolution to convict, whether there is found innocence or guilt. The country demands a fair and an impartial investigation of this matter, and not of a partisan nature; not by men whose own innocence or guilt is to be dependent, in any way, on the result of this inquiry. No gentleman who has, in any way, imbibed a prejudice or expressed an unfavorable opinion, should deign to act on that committee for a moment; nor should any consideration induce this House, under present circumstances, to place such a one on that committee. To do it, sir, would be a mere mockery of justice, and to bring into scorn the partiality of the whole investigation. The country does not look for such an inquiry, nor can it in the least be benefited by such a one. The people have already been harassed with repeated inquiries, intended for party purposes merely, without a single practical good resulting to the country.

In the second point of view, the character of this committee is of the first importance, as the character of this whole Administration will, in a measure, be brought before them. Yes, sir; an Administration brought into power by nearly two thirds of the free voters of the country is now about being committed to the hands of a majority of a committee who are deadly hostile to the feelings and sentiments of nearly two thirds of the people of this country—an effect produced by alliances the most extraordinary, and one which the people of this country should never cease to remember. The people will learn, with no little astonishment, that a Congress, a majority of which they elected supporters of this Administration, have been converted, by political management here, into a dead minority. To know where and by whom this renegeancy and treachery to their rights have been committed, the freedom of no people can long endure, until a strict accountability is demanded and had into the conduct of those who have presumed to change their course without consulting them. Their conduct should not be forgotten.

The people should, and will, I cannot entertain a doubt, demand of those Representatives of easy virtue to know why they have joined in with the Opposition to throw the Administration they were elected to support into a minority. But, sir, between them and their constituents I shall not interfere. This last treachery only affords additional evidence of the incontestable truth of that ever to be remembered maxim with every friend of freedom throughout the world: "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance." With it, no man, or set of men, should be trusted to tamper with impunity, and those who do it have evermore acted on the presumption that the people, the friends of liberty, and to whom its price is beyond all value, are credulous, and are easily to be imposed on and duped by great professions of scorn to be dictated to by party and party leaders of honesty, sincerity, and disinterested patriotism. The world over, and these have been the uniform declarations and professions of those who have become recreant to the trusts confided to them by a too generous constituency.

The Republican party, beyond all others, have suffered most from this political malady. It has been their curse since the earliest formation of this Government, and has been progressive up to the present date, and now even threatens the subversion of all freedom in that Government under which we live and have prospered so long and so gloriously.

One of the greatest novelties of this investigation, as it is proposed to be carried on by the present allied powers, is that the majority of this House, the representatives of the majority of the people of this country, the whole of the officers of the Government, are to be placed into the hands of a committee, a majority of which—I might say two thirds of which—represent a party that are composed of the representatives of a most meager minority of the people of this country. Here, sir, then, absolutely for the first time in the history of this Government, be it said to its immortal honor, has been the majority of this country placed into hands to be tried by a minority, a thing that should be long recollected as the first step of a departure from that fundamental rule in all free Republics, that in all cases a majority shall control—facts, sir, that must strike, forcibly, every statesman of the waning and decreasing regard for the sovereign control of the great majority of the people, as now entertained and evinced for the first time by a certain party in this country.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I am glad, truly glad, that it is so. I am rejoiced at this early development of the principles of a party that has just gained control in this Government. I am glad of the developments made here of their true characters, and of the principles upon which they are to act as a party. It is the first earnest given of the principles upon which they are to act, and on which they are to carry out the true doctrines of what is now called the modern Whig party and their appendages in holy alliance.

It will now be seen, most astounding as it is, that the character of this Administration, brought into power by a majority of the suffrages of the freemen of this country, backed by the election of a majority of Representatives to this Congress, have, by an art not unfrequently used here, by an alliance to which the people have in no way been a party nor instrumental, now been placed into the hands of a minority Opposition, the peculiar representatives of all the idle, unproductive interests of the entire nation; an augury than which nothing could be more portentous and alarming to the advocates of productive industry and of freedom throughout the civilized world; evincing, most clearly, a regularly concocted plan, to my mind, of a settled, fixed system, which, in connection with what has taken place elsewhere* by this new party to usurp by fraud, deception, intrigue, and stratagem, the rights of the majority of the freemen of this country, and to overthrow that great fundamental principle in all free governments of the undisputed right of the majority to control. Is not, then, the course about being pursued here, and on this occasion, perfectly in character with, and a piece of, that well-digested plan of operations which has been recently carried on elsewhere by the same party to thwart the will of the majority of the great body of the people of this country? Does no man see the kindred relationship of this step to others of recent date? Sir, in my judgment it wears the party brand—resistance to, and usurpation of, the rights of the majority of the free people of this country. Hence the stupendous magnitude and importance of the appointment of a fair, impartial, and unprejudiced committee, with a due respect to the feelings of a majority of this House and the country, and with hands ungaited with any preconceived opinions of the guilt or innocence of any man or set of men. Upon this subject this House has a lesson. Will it heed it?

In the next place, will it be forgotten that the people of this nation have but just returned to this Congress a majority of Representatives—from fifteen to twenty-five—in favor of the present Administration, who professed to be Democrats and Republicans when elected, and pledged themselves to the support of the present Republican Administration? Can the opinions of the majority of the people's Representatives, or the opinions of a majority of the people themselves, be fairly represented on that committee when it is known that a majority already elected on it belong to the minority of the House, and who represent a most meager minority out of it? Do gentlemen not see the extraordinary composition and character that they are about to give to that committee—about, did I say?—which they have already given to it, and which must mark with suspicion their whole proceedings with every friend of popular rights?

Sir, the committee themselves should pause before they take it upon themselves to act under such circumstances. For this reason, then, I have said if you would have the report of this committee to produce a salutary effect, give us a fair committee, composed of unbiased, uncommitted members in favor of the guilt or innocence of any individuals, and whose interest nor honor is at stake, to convict or acquit any man? Without such a committee, your investigation will be a mere farce, and all will consider it a mere mockery of justice, and a mere hunt after party calumny and detraction; not to "whitewash," but to "blackwash" the individuals and the party to whom a majority of that committee is opposed. Can anything be more apparent? If we would have an eye singly fixed upon the public interests, with a view to investigate this transaction for the benefit of the country, and the country alone, the composition of this committee should be made of the most impartial, unprejudiced, and unexceptionable materials. Sir, I warn those who now, for the first time, have gained the power in this House by the aid of the "secret ballot," not to commit in open day, in the face of the world, that hideous, damning, and blackest of crimes, of selecting a committee themselves, composed of a majority of their own friends—a thing that they have consumed so much of the important time of this House in denouncing and stigmatizing as a species of favoritism, corruption, and prostitution, pregnant with a degree of partiality and injustice that defied all scrutiny into the malpractices of this Government. I charge them, in the face of this House, in the face of this country, not to let their first act, after obtaining power, be imbued with all the crime and odium which they have so eloquently attached to it when committed by the Republican party in this House. I charge them, if they have yet left one sentiment of respect for the intelligence and good sense of the people of this country, not to let their first act be guilty, and convict them of this black and damning sin, about which they have been so clamorous, and which it has been their daily vocation, since the organization of their party, to hold up and denounce as an act of most crying injustice, and monstrous corruption. I charge them not to treat with such disrespect the good sense and recollection of the people of this country.

I charge them not to let this people demand of them to know why it is a virtue in one party in this country to commit an act which it is prostitution, corruption, and profligacy, when committed by another; why it is that individuals or parties appear before them, and denounce that in others which they applaud, as the highest praise, the commission of by-themselves. And I charge gentlemen, in the name of our common country, in the name of that liberty which we all profess so much to love, not to presume too much upon their power of misrepresentation and stultification of the honest, intelligent, and unbiased freemen of my country.

Of all the parties that have heretofore existed in this country, that of the Whig, now so called, should be the last to resist and refuse the appointment, in this House, of a liberal and impartial committee to investigate any subject, and more particularly the present. The least variation from the strictest impartiality, and the greatest liberality, is at war with every profession and declaration that they have made for years, both in and out of this House. Sir, with them to presume the contrary, consistency would cease to be a virtue, and sincerity of profession a damnable heretodox. But how shall this party appear? How shall the world judge them, when it is made evident, that the very first act committed by them, after acquiring power, I say, will be found in opposition to all that they have said and written on this subject ever since the constitution of this mongrel party? What shall the world say when their very first act is made to give the—I will not say what, but will call it by a milder name—the most palpable contradiction, and open falsification, of every profession of sincerity that they have heretofore, with such prodigality, made to the American people.

Now, sir, let facts speak to an impartial and intelligent world; and I invoke all attention, that nothing may be lost, that justice may amply be done to all whom it may concern. Here are resolutions adopted to raise a committee of nine members to effect an investigation of a transaction, deeply imbued with fraud, as it is alleged, and in which not only your Secretary of the Treasury, but the whole character of this Administration, is involved.

This charge has been again and again made, and repeated upon this floor; the charge has been met, and all are willing to go into the investigation, and to ferret out what of fraud and corruption it is in the power of the committee in good faith to effect. I have before said that the Administration party, or Republican party, representing a majority of the people of this country, have at least a majority of some fifteen or twenty-five of the Representatives of this body, including the Conservatives; all of whom, he believed, had been elected as friends to this Administration. Yet strange to tell, already, by virtue of the "secret ballot," had there been elected on this committee, Messrs. CURTIS, HARLAN, WISE, DAWSON, SMITH, and HOPKINS; four Whigs, two Conservative, all of whom, judging from their course here, are as deadly hostile to all that is connected with this Administration as they are to the monarchy of Great Britain. Now, sir, the Whig party, "all told," have, on this floor, from one hundred and five to one hundred and ten Representatives of the two hundred and forty-two. The Republicans have from one hundred and twelve to one hundred and eighteen. The Conservatives have ten to twelve Representatives in this House, just enough to give the Whigs a small majority, whenever it becomes their interest to do so. Here is the true position of parties, and what is the aspect before us? Let the country note it. Already have the Whigs, who comprise both a minority of the Representatives of this House, and a minority of the people of this country, taken care of themselves, and wrested the power from the majority, both in the House and out of it, and placed on the committee four of the nine of their own members, and for services rendered, gave to the Conservatives two already of the nine to represent their ten or twelve on this floor; one of whom, however, is as much of a Whig, and as deadly hostile to the Administration, as any member of the Whig party in or out of this House; thus securing to themselves, by the alliance, a dead majority on the committee, although representing both a minority in the House and out of it. Now all this is no partiality, gentlemen, nothing like it; and though you represent but a minority of the people of this country, and the majority of the committee represent the minority of this House, I give you the greatest credit for your ingenuity, your tact, and your management; you deserve most richly a better cause.

But, Mr. Speaker, in all good conscience, what will the world say in all future time of the frankness and sincerity of the professions and purity of a party who, by their first act, after obtaining power, have committed the very despicable crime that they have so long been wont to charge home upon their opponents, of being of the deepest dye, and fraught with every species of corruption that was alarming and appalling to the rights of freemen? What will they say at the display of such tact, management, and ingenuity, at the expense of every profession of sincerity and political honesty? How will the world regard their clamor, in all time to come, about partiality, trick, stratagem, and intrigue? What have they done in regard to this committee but the very thing that they have so long denounced you, Mr. Speaker, and the whole Republican party, for doing? Sir, did I say it was the very thing for which they denounced you and the Republican party? I beg pardon; I will show it to be infinitely worse—yes, sir, worse—and which, sir, will place your conduct in that chair in a most enviable light. Can they possibly think that we do not see the covert objects of this Janus-faced movement for an election by secret ballot? Do they think that their craft can forever protect and shield them from detection and exposure? Do they think that the people are so blind and stupid as not to see through their double object in wresting from the Speaker of the House the power of appointment of a committee at this time? Do they think that we are not aware of the reflection upon both the integrity and capacity of the majority of this House, who have placed you, sir, in that seat? And do they suppose that we are not aware of another, and a still greater object, that this purity party have in view by this very reflection, and which is at the bottom of much of this movement? Is it, sir, to affect you in a certain State, before whose Democratic Republican freemen your name is now held up for a most prominent station? Is it expected, by such hoco poco, crafthood movements here, that the Republican freemen of that distinguished State are to be duped and hoodwinked and led up to the sacrifice and immolation of one of her own sons, who has distinguished himself so much in his advocacy of the agricultural, planting, and productive interests of the State, against the unproductive, impoverishing, monopolies that have everywhere so marred and blighted the prosperity of our country? Let me entreat them to respect more the intelligence, sagacity, and practical understanding of the farmers, and the productive, laboring men of my country.

Your enemies have in this done you an act of justice that must exalt you far beyond anything that your friends could have done for you. They have shown, after all the hue and cry set up against you, and the unmeasured tirade of abuse which they have leveled against you, that they, they, sir, by their first act after obtaining power, have sanctioned your conduct to the fullest extent; nay, more, they have gone far beyond it. You gave to the majority of the Representatives in this House, and, consequently, a majority of the people of the country, only a majority on the several important committees, in conformity with every republican usage and practice since the organization of constitutional governments that had for its basis the control of a majority of the people. This was your crime, and was the corrupting crime of the party to which you belonged, and for which you have been daily threatened, on this floor, with a political guillotine. But what have your enemies done? They have taken it upon themselves, not to place on a committee a majority to represent a majority of the members of this House, not a majority to represent a majority of the people of this country, but, worse than all, they have placed on the committee a majority of those who represent both a minority on this floor, and a minority of the people of this country; and by this means have given the Representatives of a minority, both of the people and Representatives in this House, the power to try and condemn, in the committee, the majority; a thing perfectly anomalous in all free governments; inconsistent with every principle of Democratic republicanism, as abhorrent with every doctrine of equality and common justice; and one which, if it had been committed by any Speaker of the Republican or Democratic party, would have been rung, trumpet-tongued, through every cabin, shanty, village, and hamlet beyond the mountains. What a wonderful regard is here shown for the opinions, the feelings, and the interests of the majority of the freemen of this country in the very first act of a party after obtaining power? What a commentary does it not furnish to their future course, should they retain the power that they have seized on by this "holy alliance," a power not given by a majority of the people, nor even contemplated to have been given, but which they have obtained by a coalition, in defiance of the will or wishes of that people as expressed through their Representatives.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is far from being all; the worst is to come yet. I believe it has been customary in this House, since I have been honored with a seat on this floor, when important committees were to be appointed, for the Speaker to receive suggestions and recommendations of particular gentlemen, from both parties in this House, of such gentlemen as they desired to be placed on such committees; and such suggestions have at all times received the most favorable consideration; and I do not know of a single instance where the present Speaker or his predecessors have not yielded to such suggestions. In the appointment of all our important committees, by both our present and former Speakers, each party has been generally represented by its ablest members. This, in all fairness, is all that we now ask. Will this new coalition of Whigs and Conservatives, now the majority of this House, dare to disturb this salutary usage, and, for the first time, depart from its long acquiesced in propriety, from which I have heard as yet not of a single act of deviation? This, however, has not been considered by the Whig party liberal enough for them; their complaints have continued unceasingly, until they have gained power by aid of the alliance and their secret ballot; and what have they done? Their first act, too; mark that.

They have not only selected a majority of the committee from a minority of the House, and who represent a minority of the freemen of the country, but, contrary to every principle of liberality heretofore practiced by the Speaker, of placing on the committees such as the minority party might desire, they have denied, and persist in refusing to give to the majority, even of the House, and the majority of the country, one single man that they desire to be placed on that committee to represent the majority of both the House and the country. A step taken, sir, a little beyond anything heretofore known in this Government of freemen, since the foundation of our free Republic. Yes, sir, they are now endeavoring to force on the committee a small minority of members to represent the majority, who do not wish to act themselves, and who are not the choice of the majority whom they are to represent as a party. They have refused, as a party, to vote to place a single man on the committee that has been selected to be placed on it by the Republican party, whom they are to represent, and are now determined, after having elected a majority of the committee from their own minority of the House and the country, imbued with all their precommitments and prejudgments, as openly pronounced on this floor, to select such of the remainder of the committee as they may think disinclined, and too inefficient to do justice to the parties concerned—the Republican party, or the country at large—displaying a species of pertinacity and arbitrary rule, heretofore unknown to the better days of this Republic. Evincing a disposition for, and a determination in the exercise of, arbitrary power that is without a parallel in the annals of free republican Governments. They have not been contented in getting and selecting their own men, and a majority too, though themselves in a minority, but are determined to select for us ours, in the very face of our remonstrances against the justice of such a selection; and attempt to force men upon the committee to represent us, against our will or wishes, and all this done, too, sir, by a party heretofore clamorous against you, and the majority of this House, for the use of arbitrary power. Merciful God! What a lesson on the beauties of hypocrisy and consistency here, are we taught!

Look, sir, at the composition of the committee as already formed—six out of nine deadly hostile to every principle, opinion, feeling, and interest of the Republican party, though some may profess a little friendship for it, (perhaps to make things easy at home), and the remaining three, it is obstinately opposed to be given to the majority, to be composed of such men as in whose abilities and political integrity they entertain the highest regard, and would choose to trust on such an occasion. Here, sir, is a bright specimen of the fairness, purity, impartiality, and disinterestedness of this immaculate party, who were wont to sicken with disgust and nauseate at the very name of corruption and foul play in politics. History will do them justice for their purity and the honesty of their professions, and prosperity should not fail to award them a crown, more durable than brass, for so eagerly embracing that partiality and corruption which they have so bitterly denounced, when charged to be practiced in the worst degree by others. Let not those gentlemen deceive themselves, in the powers of their splendid talents, in making all to glisten that does not shine. Let them not presume too much upon their power of panic-making, and to alarm the weak and ignorant against their Government, because they themselves cannot rule it, nor their powers of eloquence and declamation to bewilder and stultify the popular sense and moral feelings of the hardy yeomanry and people of this country. The Republican party have only asked to place on this committee such men as they can rely on, if but two or three, with such talents and qualifications as will enable them to do justice to the majority of this House, to the Administration, and to a majority of the people of this country; and, sir, this they are denied.

The Whig party are determined, then, to have the entire control of this whole investigation, the entire game in their own hands, to be conducted in their own way, with the Conservatives to protect their friend Swartwout, and to throw, no doubt, if possible, the entire blame on the General Government. From every indication yet elicited, little, in my judgment, is to be expected from that committee, but a most partisan investigation and criminating report. It would be discreditable to the declaration of individuals, as already expressed on this floor, to believe the contrary; yet these have been the very first individuals to be placed on the committee by their party, with what degree of fairness and impartiality the intelligent freemen of this country will decide.

Sir, I have heard much of the celebrated investigation of the United States Bank, and the far-famed committee universally known as the "white-wash committee;" but if this does not turn out to be a blackwash committee, then am I no prophet, nor the son of a prophet.

Mr. WISE rose, and was understood to say he demanded an explanation. He wished to know whether the gentleman meant to say the committee would intentionally misrepresent what was true, or say what was not true? and whether Mr. W., as one of the members, had ever done, or would do so?

Mr. BYNUM said, were he not disposed of his own accord to do all that was fair on the occasion, he should disdain to answer any inquiry; but he was determined to look to the condition of the country, and the situation of the party with which he had the honor to act. He had nothing to do with the gentleman from Virginia as an individual there. He should scorn to answer any question which required him to select that gentleman, or any other, from the rest of the committee. He confessed that there were some gentlemen on the committee for whom he had the highest respect and personal regard, but was free to confess that there were others for whom he had little or none. The demand of the kind which had been made, however, would, of itself, prevent his expressing any opinions of individuals.

Mr. WISE still insisted. The gentleman had made some exceptions. Did he mean to designate him?

Mr. BYNUM said, if the gentleman wished to put questions to him, he had better wait until he had concluded. He could assure the gentleman that the scorpion rod he had so frequently attempted to wield over that House had no terrors for him; nor would it have, were he a thousand times more terrific than he would have the world believe him to be. Would he now attempt to force gentlemen to say that they did not believe his former declarations, as made on that floor, as to the guilt or innocence of certain individuals? The gentleman himself might have believed them—might have made them in good faith at the time. He should not undertake to decide upon his motives or sincerity. He had no explanations to make to that gentleman.

Mr. B. thought he had now shown most clearly the extraordinary dilemma and awkward predicament in which this purity party had fallen, by the singular course they had taken on the present occasion. He thought he had shown most conclusively, and placed far beyond all future cavil forever hereafter, the hollow pretenses of that party to fairness, liberality, and impartiality. It was impossible, it appeared to him, that they could ever hear again these sacred words mentioned, without a crimson blush of shame arising on their cheek.

With these general remarks, (said he,) I will now proceed to notice what has fallen from several gentlemen in relation to this subject, as declared on the floor of Congress, and which I confess I heard with no little astonishment: astonished, sir, because I heard it declared on the floor of this House, by a Representative in Congress who, it should be presumed, would declare nothing here that he was not prepared with the proof to substantiate. To become the common reviler and calumniator of those whose virtues and long-tried services have recommended them to higher places than our own, has become a practice, sir, of this House, little less derogatory to the standing of a member of Congress than it is disreputable to the councils of a great nation of freemen, of which it has heretofore been our pride and our pleasure to boast. Nor would I be considered amongst those who would throw the least obstacle in the way of the strictest scrutiny into the conduct of public officers occupying high places. I consider them amenable to the Representatives and to the people for the faithful discharge of the high trust that has been confided to them, and shall ever be for holding them to the strictest accountability. But, sir, while I would do that, though not a member of the "decency party," I hope I shall never, on this floor, lose a proper respect for the offices of my Government, if I should retain none for the occupant. A becoming respect, sir, for the Government of my nation, and a respect due to our beloved country, should forbid it. Continue your abuse and calumny and detraction of all in the higher offices of your Government, and you level to the very earth the most exalted stations, to which it should be the pride and laudable ambition of every freeman to aspire, as the meed of merit and the greatest reward of the most illustrious deeds that freemen can confer. Sir, continue to degrade and disgrace every officer in your Government; and what sagacious statesman is there amongst us that cannot easily foresee the disastrous results and downward tendency into which our whole political fabric must soon tumble?

All free Governments are based alone upon opinion; and when, from constant abuse and degradation of the offices and officers of a Government, public opinion becomes infected and loses a proper respect for the Government itself, what must naturally follow but a change of the whole system, and a speedy resort to some other by which they may have a greater respect? And is this the true object of your indiscriminate abuse of all the officers of this free Government? I believe, in the sincerity of my heart, it is the true, secret, and sole object of many. But we are told that these denunciations are not directed against the offices, but against the officers who fill them. Now, sir, there is a certain principle in metaphysics which has ever proven the irresistibility and influence of the power of association. Keep up your constant degradation of your officers occupying high places, and how long, from this very power of association, before you imbibe, and induce others to do it, imperceptibly often, the greatest contempt for the offices themselves, and which offices alone constitute the Government itself? Who are so blind, then, as not to see the deadly blow, in all this indiscriminate calumny, abuse, and detraction, aimed at the very stability and existence of the present system of this, our free Republican form of Government?

Who is there so blind as cannot see the danger that such a course at once threatens to the durability and permanency of the present system of our free, republican Government, and with what pride such a course here must be hailed throughout the world by the implacable enemies of all free Governments? With what cheering hopes it must inspire the great enemies of our freedom, both at home and abroad? Sir, these are subjects of the greatest moment and high consideration to the philosophical statesman who reflects upon the destiny of empires and the fate of republics; and let no man blind himself to the lessons of experience, which the history of fallen nations should teach us upon these absorbing subjects. Then how should any man who professes a becoming regard for his Government, and the institutions under which he lives, justify himself in rising here from his seat and pronouncing one of the first officers in the Government "a corrupt pander of power; the particeps criminis of a hundred defalcations," without the safety of the Republic demanded it, and he had the proof at hand to establish so foul a charge beyond the power of cavil or contradiction? Are gentlemen prepared with their proofs to establish these charges, or, if they fail, are they prepared to meet their constituents and defend themselves against the charge of uttering the foulest calumnies merely for the gratification of the blackest political spleen and party malice? What excuse should the American people (those who are now not prepared for revolution and plunder) receive as a justification of such a course? Are gentlemen aware of the high and awful responsibility that they assume in belching forth this indiscriminate inate calumny and abuse against almost every high officer in your Government, whether placed in office by the people themselves, or by the executive department, who himself is a mere servant of the people, and whose greatest crime it is, with some, to have been the object of the people's choice?

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Swartwout Defalcation—Mr. Bynum.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, asked if the gentleman had alluded to him, or to what he had said on a former occasion in relation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BYNUM. I do allude to what the gentleman from Mississippi said on a former occasion, as I then wrote it down and understood it, and have it now before me.

Mr. PRENTISS. Then, sir, I wish to explain.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly, sir; for I should be exceedingly sorry to do any act of injustice to that gentleman, or any other on this floor.

Mr. PRENTISS was understood to say that he had said, in his previous remarks, that the Secretary of the Treasury was the particeps criminis of a hundred defalcations, as it was shown in his report to Congress; that he had particularly examined the report, and had found in it that number of defalcations, or more, but that he knew them not, of his own knowledge, in any other way; that was the evidence on which he relied, and was prepared to show, if necessary.

Mr. BYNUM. I am exceedingly glad to hear the gentleman say that he knows nothing against the Secretary of the Treasury, of his own knowledge, upon which to found those high charges of corruption and profligacy.

Mr. PRENTISS. No, sir, I did not say that; I know of one defalcation in Mississippi.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman know, of his own knowledge, that the Secretary of the Treasury was a particeps criminis of that defalcation, or that he connived at it in any shape or form whatever?

Mr. PRENTISS. He knew of the defalcation.

Mr. BYNUM. And, sir, he reported those defalcations, as he was bound to do; and further the law allowed him no right to go. If such are the grounds on which you are to convict the Secretary of the Treasury of impeachable offenses of corruption, if he be not convicted already in the minds of certain gentlemen, I doubt the necessity of an investigation; but it is now due to the Secretary, the party, and the country, that it should be had and carried on in good faith. The report of the Secretary we have all read, and are liable to place on it very different constructions from those of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi. But that he (the Secretary) should be guilty, or be a particeps criminis of an offense, because it was committed under his administration of that Department, is as novel as it is extraordinary. Just as well, Mr. Speaker, might they attempt to hold me or you, sir, guilty of the many little petit larcenies which are committed by our domestics and servants at home in our absence to this House. The reason and justice in the one case is equally the same in the other, and the attempt to hold one responsible for the guilt in such cases would be frowned down as most insulting to the plainest understanding in the community.

The moral sense of the American people has not yet arrived at that pitch of roundity, as ruthlessly to sacrifice a public servant upon the heated charges of aspiring politicians, or upon the highly wrought declamation of mere party malice. They call for the evidence of some overt act, committed directly or indirectly by the person charged, else humanity will be allowed to plead his cause, and justice demand forthwith his acquittal. Gentlemen should beware how they persecute a man and pronounce him guilty, before he is put upon his trial and the evidence is heard in his behalf. The American people are neither tyrannical, cruel, nor oppressive in their nature, and they have seldom held those guiltless who have attempted to play off upon them such a part, and establish for them such a character; so abhorrent and revolting to all the better feelings of their native dispositions. No, sir, no, sir; I thank my God that I yet live in a country where humanity and justice have not been entirely stifled and strangled by the ferocious spirit of an unfeeling savage party malignity. I trust I yet live among my countrymen who have too high a regard for liberty and justice to witness the untarnished reputation of one man in society, however humble, rent and mangled for the mere gratification of party vengeance. If we are to have an investigation, and a consequent trial of any of our public officers, let us engage in it with clean hands and pure consciences, and let us not condemn before we convict. Such a course might be tolerated in the court of some Eastern despot, but never, never, I hope, in free and happy America.

While I hope ever to be the last, in or out of this House, to throw a shield around any public officer to screen him from the just demands of public justice, I will never consent to witness, in the heat of party violence, an act that would disgrace and degrade the age of a Nero or Caligula. But, sir, perhaps all this is right; and we should thank Heaven that it is so; that these developments have given us a glimpse of the true character of what may be the reign of that party, should they, by trick or stratagem, ever gain the ascendancy in this country. I am, sir, for an investigation, a bona fide investigation, to be conducted with impartiality and in good faith to all parties; and none other can or should be received as worthy of this House, by the just, intelligent freemen of this country.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] tells us that we are determined to defeat this investigation. Who are opposed to it? Can the gentleman name the first man? No, sir; I dare him to do it. None have manifested the least disposition here to thwart or oppose it. No member of the Republican or Democratic party would do it. If there be one to be found in this House opposed to the investigation, to be carried on in good faith, he is a traitor to his party; nay more, he is a traitor to the country. What have they to expect from such a course but the realization of that weakness and want of political foresight that the puffed-up and arrogated wisdom of their Whig opponents have labored so much and so long to convict them of in vain?—an attempt that has been carried on against the Republican party ever since the first dawning of our Revolution. It was their ignorance which spoke into existence this nation of freemen, with a republican form of Government; and it has been by such ignorance that their freedom and happiness have ever since been protected and cherished, and their country led on to a degree of prosperity and greatness unexampled in the history of the civilized world. Under such ignorance, then, who would not prefer to live, and bear all the reproaches and aspersions of the arrogated pseudo wisdom of the world?

Sir, the gentleman tells us that they have selected their men, and their strongest men, too. "There's the rub." They have their strongest men, a majority of them, too, already placed on that committee. And what do we ask? Simply—although representing the largest number in this House, and almost two thirds of the people out of it—to allow us to place on that committee of nine, three of our strongest men. We have only asked for three to be placed on that committee to represent the majority of this House, the majority of the people of the country, the great Democratic party of the nation, and this, sir, is denied; and because we persist in so humble a request, we are told that the Democrats are opposed to the investigation! Most modest, indeed! Give us a fair committee—or foul, as it is already composed—give us but three of our strongest men, and we will go into the investigation now, tomorrow, the next day, or when and where you please. Give us but three, and we will go with you into every recess, and dark hole, and black cavern of this great conservative leader, Samuel Swartwout; and with you we will endeavor to ferret out, in good faith, this foul defalcation, which smells to the very heavens. But we are unwilling to trust the character of this Administration, or the untarnished reputation of any distinguished individual connected with it, in the hands of a committee, with all their prepossessions and precommitments against them; without having honest men of our own party, in whose competence, talents, and firmness we have the greatest confidence. And is this the unreasonable, iniquitous conduct that the Democratic party is guilty of, for which they are to be denounced upon this floor? This recent victory, gained by the aid of the secret ballot and the holy alliance, surely has not already placed gentlemen beside themselves, and, in their transport of joy, made them forgetful of all that is right, equitable, or just. I pray them to have a little moderation in the first fruition of this ominous alliance, if they would perpetuate, but for a short time, the durability of the ecstasy of its consummation.

Again: the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] with all his accustomed liberality and modesty, has charged us with a wish to place on this committee a set of jack-legged, pettifogging lawyers. Wonderful! Now, Mr. Speaker, this is perfectly in keeping with the arrogance of the "decency party," and shows what has ever been their political curse, their bane, for which they have never been able to find an antidote, no matter under what party name they have appeared. They have bad memories, and their own acts are continually rising up in judgment against them. To abuse in others what they themselves practice, is the disease of that party, and shows how greatly wanting they are in that becoming discretion that they so vehemently denounce the want of in all others. But to the charge: we want jack-legged lawyers and pettifoggers placed on that committee. Now, sir, will the goodness and mildness and liberality of the honorable gentleman permit me to ask what are the professions of those six gentlemen out of the nine, that the Whig party has already placed on that committee? For information's sake, I will read the names of those gentlemen already on the committee to the honorable gentleman and to the House.

Here, sir, are the names of Mr. HARLAN of Kentucky, Mr. DAWSON of Georgia, Mr. CURTIS of New York, Mr. WISE of Virginia, Mr. SMITH of Maine, and Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia. These gentlemen have already been selected by the "secret ballot," and placed by the honorable gentleman's party on that committee. After this charge made by him, will the gentleman condescend to tell us and the country how many of this number, of the six members already placed on that committee by him—him, sir, and his party—are lawyers? whether pettifoggers or jack-legged? for after this bold charge, the country may feel some curiosity to know. Sir, the gentleman is silent. I shall, then, make bold to do it for him. Here are their names; and I pronounce every individual on that committee, yet selected by that fair-play, justice-loving party, to be a lawyer; there is not a single member of them who is not now, or has not been, a practicing attorney. O consistency! "what a priceless jewel thou art!"

But, sir, they are all Whigs and Conservatives, and perhaps the gentleman means that that party contains no jack-legged pettifogging lawyers. They are all distinguished gentlemen, that "know each other by instinct." There are no lawyers of the Republican party, who are not jack-legged pettifoggers, now certainly in this House. This, sir, is carrying their aristocratic, Federal-Whiggish arrogance and presumption a little further than I have ever known before, and cannot, surely, fail to awaken the disgust of the great body of the American people with the principles and designs of a party, so arrogant, presuming, and self-consequential. Let such doctrines and principles endure, and I here pronounce it, in my place, that the days of our old republicanism, simplicity, and equality, are numbered. Sir, this hauteur and arrogance are contrary to the very genius of republican simplicity and equality, and repugnant and abhorrent to the whole letter and spirit of this free republican form of government, to establish which the blood of our forefathers flowed like so much water.

I will not investigate here the claims to distinction to which his Whiggish and Federal lawyers, on the committee are entitled. I have never heard of their practicing beyond the county courts in the districts in which they live. They may, however, be by far more notorious and distinguished. There is a trite maxim that crosses my mind, and may not be inapplicable to the present occasion. I have often heard it said you should

25TH CONG.: 3D SESS.

Swartwout Defalcation—Mr. Bynum.

HO. OF REPS.

"set a rogue to catch a rogue." With equal propriety, then, we should place on that committee lawyers of the opposite party, to watch the opposite lawyers, to investigate with the opposite lawyers, and to report with the opposite lawyers. This, sir, is the unreasonable request that we have made, as the representatives of the Republican party, and for which we are all denounced as obstinate, perverse, and with a disposition to thwart the investigation which we have commenced. Will the people judge it so?

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS rose to a point of order. He wished to know if the wide discursive course taken by the gentleman from North Carolina was in order when the subject was only to excuse a member from acting on the committee?

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from North Carolina was strictly in order. He had been proceeding to show the character of the committee, so far as organized, and the necessity of its having a particular character, in justice to the House, and to individuals, as impeachable matter might grow out of it. This he thought he had a right to do, and that consequently the gentleman was in order.

Mr. BYNUM. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for his kind disposition to keep me in order. I have no doubt of the sincerity of his motives, and the benevolence of his object. The party to which that gentleman belongs have certainly given many evidences of their great regard for the order of this House, and shown the greatest disposition to keep all in order who deviate in the least from any subject before it. But unfortunately for the gentleman and his party, they never rise to a point of order until some Democrat of the Republican party is about to dissect the materials out of which they are composed, and to show their rottenness to the open gaze of an abused people.

It is never until then, sir, the giggle of applause, and the cry of "Go on! go on!" ceases to reverberate through this House; and that more ominous and doleful one is substituted by them in its place here—"Order! order!" Mr. Speaker, I rise, sir, to a point of order." Here, again, we see the result of that defective memory; how universally it seems to prevail with every member of the party! But, sir, away with that. We have been told that we wanted the leaders of the party on that committee. This, as far as my knowledge extends, would be a most difficult task to execute by the Democratic party. If they have leaders, I am yet to learn who they are. I know them not. In my judgment, the want of such leaders as has been ascribed to it is one of the greatest misfortunes of that party at this time. That, I confess, is now one of the greatest defects in the party; they acknowledge no leaders, and consequently act nearly on every occasion without the least concert, by which means often, though in a majority, they have suffered themselves to be defeated by their more wily and better drilled adversaries, who ever move at the tap of the drum, under their drill majors. This defect I have often warned my party of, and called on them to profit by the lesson taught them on that subject by their more skillful and astute opponents in all party tactics. A party whose every move is at the bidding of their most renowned leaders, surely should be the last on earth to find fault with others for obedience to the will of their leaders; but in this, too, they may arrogate to themselves the exclusive right of being led; and, from habit, no doubt, would have the world consider that a virtue in them which would be a heinous and crying sin in all others. This, though, is only one of the true characteristics of that party—it is but a part of their system.

But suppose we were to wish to place our leaders, if any we have, on that committee: would it be doing more than the Whigs have done? They have placed on it leaders at whose nod they move as though by "instinct." Then would it be so very unfair to place by their sides at least one Democratic leader, if such there be? If this were all true that is stated, for one I cannot see the least cause of complaint on the part of the allied parties, if they entertain the remotest idea of a fair and an impartial investigation; and instead of its being urged as an objection, if the object is an impartial investigation, the leaders of one party being placed on the committee, it affords the strongest and most irrefutable reason why those of the other party should be, to meet and confront them. Than this objection, then, they must look out for some better reason to sanction their partial and illiberal course on this occasion. This same gentleman spoke of quibbling lawyers. Quibbling lawyers! Why, sir, this brief victory, achieved by the "secret ballot" system, seems to have run the party mad. Quibbling lawyers! Why, sir, of what is their whole party made up? To quibble about technicalities, and the inviolability of incorporated privileges, and their entire irresponsibility to the will or wishes of the people, whom they insult and rob and plunder, is their religion—their daily vocation here and elsewhere—the life's blood of the whole party; it flows and circulates, and can be alone sustained, by a quibble, as it has ever been by that illustrious brood in all ages, the craft family. What, sir! six lawyers to be placed on a committee of nine, of one party and its allies, and for them now to complain for fear that their opponents should place three others on the same committee that would quibble? The idea can only be entertained, by any portion of the intelligent people of this country, as one of the supremely ridiculous, and as an insult to the understanding of those whom they would attempt to dupe by the use of it.

Never, never, sir, in my judgment, has there been a party before so straitened for a plausible reason, even on which to hang an excuse for their most singular and flagrant inconsistencies.

If, sir, this be the character of the commencement of the reign of their dynasty in this House, and in this country, what has the country to hope from its consummation, its maturity, and its termination? In its very inception its birth has been marked with all the cold-blooded, hollow-heartedness of the hypocrite, such as has infected mankind in all ages, and bowed down the mightiest nations of the earth in time of yore. Sir, this hand writing is perfectly legible, and is plainly to be read in the history of all nations that have passed before us, by those who have the moral courage, the boldness and industry to scan, examine, and proclaim it. But from this point I will not digress further, as I may have, on some future occasion, a better opportunity of exposing more fully the true character of this mongrel party, its objects, its principles, and its fallacies. The brief view which I have taken here of the history of its conduct, if nothing more, I hope will have the effect to call out others more capable than myself, upon some more fit occasion, to do justice to the histories of those contending parties.

Mr. Speaker, with an air peculiar to the presumption of the party from which it comes, it has been vauntingly asked the Republican party of this House, who are your candidates to be run to be placed on this committee? Sir, I know of no candidate in the Democratic party, nor do I presume that an individual Democrat in this House knows of such a one. We know, from the votes of the House as repeatedly given, as well do they, who are desired to be placed on the committee by that party, but every one of whom the allied party has as obstinately and pertinaciously refused. Away, then, with such affected blindness, as apiece of a kindred with the whole project of your gilded designs, in a consummation to effect your political purposes! Sir, it is idle to talk thus, when it is apparent by every act that the men that we have determined on to select for that committee, it has been fixed, settled on and avowed on this floor, by that party which now rules the House here, shall not be placed there, to watch, meet, to aid or oppose their designs. Such taunting avowals here are adding insult to injury, and tampering with the public sense, which they appear determined to wrong, and leaves reason for an awful foreboding as to the result of this investigation.

Permit me to say that this mode of selecting the committee by "secret ballot," and divesting the Speaker of that power, in conformity with the uniform rule and long established practice of the House, has been sprung upon us, and is as singular and novel as its execution has been foul, partial, illiberal and unjust to the majority of this House, and a majority of the freemen of this country, as I have before shown. Sir, the want of a knowledge of the compact alliance of these two parties, precluded the belief of the possibility of such a state of things in the mind of any member of the Democratic party; hence, out of this House, they had not resolved on running any men, or set of men, to be placed on this committee. Will this answer be satisfactory to honorable gentlemen who seem so much at a loss to know why we had not done so?

But we have been asked again, in an air of stately emphasis, was there no caucus candidates resolved on by your party? For the reasons stated before, there were none; and such a resolve would have been evidence of an insight of what had been determined on by the allied parties, of which we could have had none, without suspecting that which all were unwilling to believe. No, sir, we had no evidence of such designs, and had no right to act on such a presumption. I ask, in reply, if they had no caucus to determine on whom to place on that committee? and pause for a reply. [No reply.] Then, sir, the presumption is that they did. I have ascertained, since coming to the House this morning, that one branch of the coalition did hold a caucus, (the Conservatives,) and determined on whom they were to elect in "secret ballot"—a just commentary, too, on the present composition and condition of this House, and the respect paid to the sovereign power of a majority of the freemen of this country, when a knot of twelve Conservatives get together and resolve on who are to be placed on a committee of this House to represent two hundred and forty-two members, and a great majority of the people of this country. Could anything show more conclusively the entire rottenness of the whole foundation of this matter, as proposed to be carried on by this alliance? This information I have from a distinguished member, who stands high in the Conservative ranks, but who has not been treated with the greatest respect even by them on this occasion. So much as to the justness of their charge of caucusing against the Democratic party of this House, and so much for the truth and justness of the charges of the Whig or Federal party against the Democracy of this House, for the course that they have thought fit to pursue in relation to the present subject. Let the country take it, and we will abide their decision.

Again, I will briefly notice the character and constitution of this committee. It has been said that this committee was to act only the part of grand jurors, composed of impartial, uncommitted men, to report with impartiality the result of their conviction, after hearing impartially the evidence, and then, sir, to leave all further prosecution and trial to others. This would be in conformity with the principles of common law and justice, to which the lowest individual is entitled under the Constitution and the law. Very different, however, is the complexion of this committee, on which is placed the prosecutor, who is to act the part of the juror and the attorney, who is to be the judge of the validity of the articles of impeachment that he himself has drawn up. Such is the striking resemblance of the character of this committee to that of an inquest of an impartial, disinterested grand jury, upon which is placed neither judge, prosecutor, nor attorney. Such, sir, are the striking characteristics of these two tribunals, differing in every essential attribute, as much as midnight darkness does from daylight. A tribunal of such an organization can but be looked upon as revolting to the rights of freemen, and furnishing no protection to the rights of property, nor to the most honest and uncontaminated character. But I will not dwell longer on this subject.

One word more upon the immediate proposition of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WAGNER,] now before the House, to be excused from serving on the committee. A request so reasonable, sir, one could hardly have supposed there would have been a single objection to. The gentleman informs the House that he is disinclined to serve, and has advanced some most salutary reasons. Though of the highest respectability, yet, from his habits and inclination, he is not disposed to throw himself into the political arena, to contend with the artful and ferocious spirits of the Opposition, contrary to the wishes of his friends in this House; and is unwilling to be arbitrarily pressed into service by his enemies, to subvert their views. The request is as reasonable as it is honorable to the integrity of that gentleman. Here is another symptom of arbitrary tyrannical rule, that has characterized the birth of the new dynasty, begotten of this holy coalition.

Now, sir, what if the Speaker—yes, your blackened and foully abused Speaker—had dared to have done such an act—to press into service, against his will, and that of his party, to be placed on a committee, a member of this House, who might be deemed incompetent or unwilling to enter on the duties assigned him? Sir, had he dared to have done such an act in this House, a hue and cry of arbitrary power and corruption would have been raised against him, that would have reached and reverberated from every valley of the Mississippi to the mountain tops of the Saint Croix. Sir, you would have been hunted down, as with blood-hounds, by those who dare now to execute the deed themselves; and here, sir, in the face of their own Government, and in presence of the American people, relying upon their splendid talents, doubtless, and powers of mystification and stultification of the American people to justify the damnable deed; powers that I know to be great, and I give them all credit of possessing, in a pre-eminent degree; but in this they may find themselves mistaken, and awful might be the visitation of a just retribution. Why not compose this committee of the whole of your Whig members, who are so willing to serve on it? Are you already afraid to select them all of your immaculate party? Do you begin already to suspect your own innocence? Has conscience begun already to work within? If you will not give to the Democratic party such members as they desire to be placed on the committee, and who are ready and willing to act with you, compose it of your own members entirely. Surely you do not suspect their purity? You have already the whole power of the committee in your own hands, and would now, for appearance sake, place on it a few of your unwilling or disaffected members, and force them to act? What mockery! While you retain the whole substance of the power of the committee, you would feigningly hold out to us and the world a shadow, for mere appearance of being represented, by selecting men and forcing them to act as you may think best fitting the occasion, and best calculated to subvert your purposes; amounting to a representation not of ours, but of your wills.

Sir, I have done, and shall be sorry to see the impressment of any Republican member, by his political enemies, to be made to serve against his will, upon this or any other committee, to keep up the mere show of impartiality and justice, when the substance has been peremptorily refused.

COLLECTION AND DISBURSEMENT OF THE REVENUE.

REPORT OF HON. R. M. T. HUNTER,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 6, 1839.

Mr. R. M. T. HUNTER, from the Select Committee to whom were referred, on the 8th of January, certain Resolutions in relation to the mode of collecting and disbursing the Public Revenue, submitted the following report:

It seems to have been the object of the resolutions referred to this committee, first, to leave the public money in the hands of the public debtor until actually wanted by the Government; thus giving this portion of the capital of the country to the uses of the trade, at the same time that interest is secured to the public as the consideration of its use.

Secondly, to set off periodically the liabilities to and from the Government, by fixing certain days, at intervals of three months, for receipts and disbursements, so as to concentrate as many demands to and from the United States as may be practicable at the same time and place.

Thirdly, to diminish the risk of speculation and default on the part of public officers; first, by this exchange of credit, which, so far as it can be effected, accomplishes at the same process the collection and disbursement of the revenue, without affording a temptation to theft; and next, by providing for cash transactions, that the money which passes through the hands of the public officers shall be limited in quantity to the actual demands to be made upon them within a period so short as twenty days.

And, fourthly, to introduce greater order and facility in the administration of the Treasury Department, by fixing these stated periods for receipt and disbursement, so as to enable the Secretary to obtain adequate notice, not only of the sums due from the Government, and of the time and place of demand, but also of the sums due to the Government, and of the time and place of receipt.

These being the objects of the resolutions, the first inquiry suggested to the committee was as to the means, if any, of attaining them.

There can be no difficulty in arranging the receipts so as to cause the revenue from customs to flow into the public Treasury at fixed quarterly periods. It is supposed that the first section of the bill herewith reported accomplishes that object without changing the compromise act, or in any matter affecting the great interests concerned in it. The main questions are not only as to the ultimate solvency of the debts thus incurred by the merchants, but as to their punctuality in meeting their engagements in time for the emergencies of the system proposed by these resolutions. That the bonds thus given would be ultimately paid, with a very inconsiderable loss to the public, your committee entertain no doubt. The nature of the penalties imposed by existing laws and by the second section of this bill, the experience of the Government, and the high character of the American merchant, all justify this confidence in his fidelity to his engagements. The act of the 2d of March, 1799, already provides that the obligors who fail to pay their bonds given for duties when due, shall no longer be entitled to credit at the custom-house. Superadd to this the summary process given against them by the second section of this bill, in the event of their failure to pay at the day; and it is hardly to be supposed that the merchant would enter into any engagements under such penalties, which he might not surely expect to meet at the proper time; and the more especially when, upon so short a time as is here supposed, he would so soon be exposed to the entire loss of credit, and perhaps of property. It would rarely happen that a merchant who was able to import the goods would be unable to pay the duties in three months from that time; and certain it is that he would not lightly hazard his credit and property by exposing himself to the chance of a default, made so notorious and so speedily prosecuted as would be the case under the existing laws and that now proposed. The high value which every merchant places upon his credit forbids such a supposition. Indeed the experience of our Government affords almost demonstrative evidence of the justice of this conclusion. In 1824, William H. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury, made a report exhibiting the entire amount of losses sustained upon the bonds given for customs, from 1789 up to the 31st of December, 1823. From this it appears that out of $527,480,239 secured by bonds for customs during this entire period, the loss had not exceeded $1,575,626; whilst $758,191 only was considered doubtful; thus demonstrating the sum lost and doubtful not to have been more than forty-four hundredths of one per cent. upon the amounts collected. From 1823 to 1828 the proportion of loss seems to have been greater; as appears from a report made by the Secretary of the Treasury in the last year; but even with the addition of this period to the former estimate, the loss will be found to be less than one per cent. If additional evidence of the fidelity of American merchants to their engagements were to be required, it might be found in the wonderful efforts which they made amid the difficulties of the late crisis to sustain their credit. Of the protested bills returned to them from abroad, which were said to have amounted to £2,000,000 sterling, nearly the whole amount has been paid. A London paper has stated the loss at less than one fiftieth of one per cent. Looking to these facts, we feel assured that the proposed mode of securing the public funds approximates so nearly to perfect safety, that we should find no difficulty in recommending an entire exchange of credit for cash in collecting the duties, if there were any considerations of convenience of political expediency which peculiarly recommended the former mode. But, in point of fact, the plan now proposed incurs fewer of the objections urged against the credit system of duties than that in present operation. It is true that a small portion of the duties are collected in cash under the present system; but they bear a proportion to the whole amount of not more than one to four, whilst the credit now given is for three and six months. Under the change proposed, the credit will never extend beyond three months and twenty days (and rarely so long) before a partial payment at least will be required, together with a reexamination of the security. No case can well arise in which the credit will exceed six months, and then only for the surplus not required at once for the purposes of the Government. This periodical supervision of the securities for public money, at short intervals of time, it is believed, will render those securities not only safer than under the present system, but sufficiently so for all practical purposes.

To recommend the proposed system, however, it may be said that a punctual payment of these debts, when due, will be necessary, and that the operation of this machinery contemplates a greater degree of exactness, in this respect, than is usually found in the operations of trade. A close examination of the evidence by which we ought to be guided in this matter, will go far to remove this suspicion. The repeated evidences given by our merchants of their fidelity to their engagements, through a long series of years, have been referred to already. These, together with the penalties imposed by this bill for a want of promptitude in redeeming their obligations, seem to justify the expectation of a sufficient degree of punctuality for the purposes of the proposed system.

The successful operation of this system will not require entire punctuality in the merchants, or even a greater degree of it than has been usual in their past dealings with the Government. In the report of Mr. Crawford, before referred to, a period of thirty-three years is embraced, during which the greatest loss ever sustained upon the bonds given for duties was incurred in 1819, and was less than one and a half per cent.; and here it is to be observed, that the proportion of loss to the income secured by bond in 1819 and 1820, was more than four times as great as the average proportion during the residue of the thirty-three years embraced by this report. A deficiency so small as this would probably be provided for, in all cases, by the estimate made at the Treasury Department for the sums to be drawn from the bonds when they are due; but if sometimes the loss should not be covered in this way, the funds arising from the land sales, which, for the present, are not included in the proposed arrangement, would be available to correct these irregularities. But even if the lands were included within the system, there would always be a resource in the surplus ample enough to supply any deficiencies from defaulting debtors. It will be perceived that the bill provides a mode of keeping a surplus with entire convenience, and without loss either to the Government or the community; the debtor retaining the use of the money, and the Government drawing the interest. A small surplus has been considered always as necessary for the safe and convenient administration of the Treasury Department, which occasionally is forced to meet emergencies not easily foreseen. This surplus had scarcely ever been less than two millions, which, in a revenue of customs of twenty millions, would leave ten per cent. of that amount in the shape of a bonded surplus. Now, there is no period in the history of our finances which shows a deficiency of anything like ten per cent. in the payments of merchants upon their bonds. The greatest loss ever sustained in this way, during the period embraced by Mr. Crawford's report, was less than one and a half per cent.—a sum which even this moderate surplus would cover many times over. The extension of the merchants' bonds, in the late general suspension of specie payments, has not been considered as affording any exception to this rule. It may be doubted whether that measure did not proceed as much from liberality as necessity; and if it was compelled by necessity, that it originated not so much from the inability of the merchants to pay their debts, as from their inability to meet a sudden demand for a large amount of specie, in which alone the debts to Government could be paid by the existing laws. Under the proposed system they never could be at a loss for the medium in which to pay their dues to Government. The drafts drawn in favor of public creditors would be always available for this purpose. The first and second sections of this bill would, therefore, provide (as is believed) for the payment of public dues for customs at quarterly periods, and with sufficient punctuality for the wants of the system.

The next end contemplated by these resolutions is to produce an offset of the liabilities to and from the Government at quarterly periods. To attain this object, sections have been introduced into this bill, which provide that the disbursements of the United States shall be made, as far as practicable, on four quarterly days, occurring at not more than twenty days after those fixed for receipts; that for money actually due, drafts may be drawn upon the collectors at the next receipt-day, which bear an interest within certain limits, and that the payee or assignee of these drafts shall present them at the specified time and place, or else forfeit the interest and the guarantee of the Government for the ultimate payment of funds placed in the hands of its agents to discharge the debt due to him. Recourse is given, however, to the creditor upon the official bonds of these agents.

The first inquiry suggested by these provisions is, how far is it practicable to arrange the disbursements at quarterly periods? The expenses for the foreign service, and some of those in the Indian department, could not, perhaps, be drawn within this arrangement; but it might easily be made to comprehend most of the disbursements upon the army, the navy, the civil list, and so much of the public works as is executed by contract. These constitute the great mass of public expenditures; and so far as they could be made by drafts to the public creditor, the collection and disbursement of the revenue would be accomplished by the mere exchange of credits. These drafts would satisfy the public faith to its creditors, because, within the specified limits, the Secretary would always impose such an interest as would render them immediately exchangeable for specie; and in any event they would be paid in specie, if held by the creditor, within a period of not more than ninety days, and with an interest to compensate him for the delay. But in point of fact, they would enter into the exchanges of the country. With the provisions that the bonds are to be paid in specie if not discharged in these drafts, together with the penalties upon a failure to present them speedily, as required, it would become the interest of the banks, the merchants, and the public creditor; to facilitate them on their intended destination. Drawn, as they must be, at not less than seventy nor more than ninety days, there would be ample time to transmit them between the most distant extremities of the Union, whilst the provisions before referred to would effectually exclude them as currency, and confine their uses to the simple purposes of offset or exchange. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether, at first, the public creditor, from a want of knowledge of the system, might not fail to present the draft with promptness enough for these purposes of exchange, and might not incur the penalties for this failure as much from ignorance as neglect. Some mistake of this kind might be made at first, but there would be too many interests concerned in teaching him the true mode of disposing of his draft to suppose that he would long remain in ignorance upon the subject. All fears of this sort might be removed, however, by a short specification on the face of the draft of the penalties imposed upon a neglect to present it as required by law.

This system of exchanges, together with the provision for leaving the surplus in the hands of the public debtors, will leave a very small portion of these bonds to be collected in actual money. The payment of such a sum in specie, as required by this bill, cannot produce a sensible effect upon the banks, or give inconvenience to the merchants, by causing periodical ebbs and flows in their demands for capital. During the period between disbursements and receipts, the easy and insensible operations of exchange will furnish them with the means of paying far the greater portion of their bonds by a mere offset of credits, to the mutual convenience of themselves and the Government.

There remains to be noticed one other difficulty in the practical operation of this exchange of credit. The drafts disbursed to public creditors, and drawn in anticipation of the revenue, might exceed in some ports the proportion of the debts to be paid at those places. But, in such cases it would always happen, where the disbursements did not exceed the receipts, that there would be a corresponding deficiency in the drafts drawn upon other places of receipt. To adapt this state of things to the equal proportions of the surplus to be left in the different sections, a provision is introduced, which enables the collector to direct any excess of these drafts to a disbursing officer, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. This officer may always be supplied with the funds to meet these drafts from the offices upon which too little had been drawn at the previous day of disbursement. The Department, in all cases, having at least seventy days' notice of the drafts which are outstanding, together with a knowledge of the bonds falling due upon the day when they are to be paid, will probably find no difficulty in preserving both the faith of the Government and the policy of this bill.

Another object contemplated by these resolutions is, to remove, as far as possible, the danger of speculation on the part of the public officers. This will certainly be accomplished to a very great extent under the system now proposed. If proper regulations were made, so as to inform the Secretary of the Treasury as to the bonds which passed into the collectors' hands, they could scarcely become the subjects of theft, and to the extent that the disbursements were made in drafts, there would be absolute safety as to the disbursing officers. Nor would there be much danger as to the sum collected in money. This amount would, of necessity, be small, and, passing immediately from the collecting to the disbursing officer, would not remain in the hands of the last more than twenty days before every cent would be demanded by the public creditor. Defaults in either of these officers would be so quickly detected, that the restraint upon them would be almost perfect. The great temptation to default, arising, generally, out of large sums lying idle for a long time with those who keep them, would, of course, be removed by a system which left no idle money in their hands.

Lastly, it seems to have been designed by these resolutions to promote a more systematic administration of the Treasury Department, under a new mode of collecting and disbursing the revenue.

It is impossible to estimate beforehand the precise advantages of any increase of system in the conduct of human affairs. But the general advantages of order over disorder in the fiscal administration, cannot well be too highly appreciated. Perhaps, however, a clearer view of the subject will be given by a reference to some of the inconveniences under which the Treasury Department now suffers, and which will be removed by the system now proposed.

At present the money flows into the collectors' hands daily, and without regularity as to amount. The Secretary, not always having notice of the time and amount of receipts until they are in hand, has, for the most part, to make his arrangements for removing these funds, not before, but after they are received. The consequence is, that large sums often lie idle to all the purposes of trade and Government, and serve only, during this time, to offer temptations for speculation to the public officers. According to the best information which your committee can obtain, the average amount thus lying in the hands of the receiving officers and other custodiers of the public treasure, independently of the amount in the custody of the disbursing officers, has been about $1,000,000 at the end of each quarter, for the four years preceding the 1st of January, 1838. So much for the receipts. The evils ensuing from the want of adequate notice, and a systematic arrangement of the disbursements, are still more striking. The Treasury is subject to constant demands, of which it has no notice as to time or amount. The consequence is, that money must be placed with the disbursing officers long enough beforehand, and in amounts sufficiently large to cover all probable demands. The average sum thus left idle in the hands of disbursing officers has been about $4,000,000 at the end of each quarter. And this, because there are no adequate provisions to arrange these demands, so as to give sufficient notice of them to the head of the Department, and to compel their production by the public creditors at the proper time. Nor is this the only inconvenience arising out of the present state of things. The disbursements are made as the demands for them arise. The receipts come in daily as the bonds fall due, and vary not only from day to day, but from month to month. When the receipts and expenses are nearly equal, there is constant danger, as we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that enough may not be received in some months of the year to meet the demands upon the Government. For although the aggregate receipts and disbursements during the year may correspond, yet this is by no means the case from month to month. At present, there are but two modes of meeting the evil: the one, to leave a large surplus on hand to meet these contingencies; and the other, to give the Secretary the power to issue Treasury notes at his discretion. The system now proposed avoids all of these inconveniences. No balances need remain in the hands of the receiving or disbursing officers. The Secretary having notice of the amount and time of receipts, as well as of the amount and time of disbursements, can always make his arrangements beforehand to remove the public money from the collector as soon as received, and to disburse it either in the very act of receipt, or at not more than twenty days from that time. Speedy accountability will thus be required from the public officers, and an almost instant detection will await them in case of default or fraud. Nor will the inconvenience as to inequality in the receipts and disbursements ever arise to anything like its present extent. By throwing together the receipts and disbursements for three months in the quarterly settlements, there can scarcely be a serious inequality between the two, when their yearly amounts correspond. Should any such difficulty ever arise, it will readily be corrected by the small surplus left with the public debtor, for which this bill provides, without loss either to trade or to the Government. Short settlements, promptness in all concerned in the fiscal administration, and the means of speedy detection in cases of default, may all be secured, as it seems, under the proposed system, with proper Treasury regulations. The whole administration of the finances will be brought more under the view and control of the head of the Department, and less will be left to the discretion of subordinate officers. The disbursing officer will pass the debits to the Treasury books at least seventy days before they are due; the collector will transmit weekly the entries on the credit side of the account, and the quarterly balance-sheet of the Department will exhibit, to a very great extent, the entire process of collection and disbursement in a mere exchange of credit. Should these anticipations be realized, it is evident that there would be more of unity, efficiency, and responsibility, in the administration of the Treasury Department, than we have had under any other system. It is true that this system, like every other, would depend very much for its success upon its proper execution; and inconveniences would certainly arise at its commencement which further experience would probably rectify.

It will doubtless be remarked, that the resolutions referred to this committee do not comprhend the public lands within the system which they propose. Perhaps it is as well, for several reasons, that they should not be included at present. In the first place, difficulties might arise in the commencement of a system so novel, which would be easily overcome by the available cash funds afforded from the public lands. This would, at least, be highly useful until the system became familiar in practice. Again: the public mind is just now so unsettled in relation to the mode of disposing of these lands, that changes might occur, in relation to them, which would take them without the operation of the system, if it were now adapted to them. Should the present mode of disposing of these lands from the General Government to the individual purchaser be retained, it would not only be practicable, but expedient, hereafter to include them within the proposed system. The only practical difficulty in the case would be as to the means of enforcing punctual payment of the bonds given for them when they were due. It is believed that this might be accomplished by making the receipts semi-annual instead of quarterly, and by the provisions hereafter suggested for enforcing the punctual payment of these bonds when due, whether given by the highest bidder at the auctions, or by the purchaser on private entry. This might be secured by providing, first, that so much money should be paid at the execution of the bond as would secure the probable fulfillment of the contract; secondly, that the obligees who failed to pay these bonds when due, should be refused credit thereafter at the land offices; thirdly, that neither patent nor possession should be given until the payment of the money at the receipt day, when it was due; and, fourthly, upon such failure at the proper day, that any other person might take the patent for the lands upon paying down immediately the sum due upon the bond.

As it is not proposed to include the public lands just now within the operation of the system, it will be needless to enlarge upon the provisions just sketched in relation to them.

Having reviewed the practical operation of this system, it may be well to examine, for a moment, its political and incidental effects; one of which undoubtedly will be an entire separation of the banks and the General Government. The separation must be complete, inasmuch as the Government will no longer have the means of rewarding or punishing the banks through the use of its funds and credit, whilst the banks will lose the power of impeding the fiscal operations of the Government when these are conducted without their agency. The General Government will then be entirely responsible for the success of its fiscal administration, and the banks will be subject to no power but that of the States which created them. So long as these are dependent upon each other in interest, they must either sympathize in action, or a fierce war between the two will be inevitable; and in this the people must be the sufferers. The banks, on the one hand, being armed with the power of expanding and contracting the currency, and the General Government, on the other, either attacking their credit with the people, upon which their existence depends, or arraying one set of banks against the other, through the use of its funds, that it may conquer by their divisions; the consequence would be, either that the Government would acquire the power of the banks, or the banks would obtain that of the Government; and the people would be the sufferers in this contest for powers which ought not to be united in either.

To arm the General Government with the power of the banks would be to destroy the balances of the Constitution, whilst the reverse of this operation would not be tolerated after it was understood. The only possible mode of preventing the union of these powers is to separate them in action and interest—an event so much to be desired that it ought to be effected even at a pecuniary loss to the people, if that were necessary. But, in point of fact, this is not the case; and the separation now proposed is relieved from the objections, whether founded or unfounded, which were raised against the other modes heretofore suggested for accomplishing this purpose.

In the first place, this system does not hoard up large amounts of capital in specie, to lie idle in the hands of the Government; on the contrary, it leaves the public funds which are not wanted for immediatedisbursement in the hands of the debtors; the Government, and not the banks, deriving the interest upon their use.

Secondly. It does not afford the public officers the means of using these funds for private purposes; inasmuch as very little money passes through their hands, and then only for immediate disbursement.

Thirdly. It does not produce an inconvenient run upon the banks for specie, in the payment of public dues. For so large a proportion of the collections and disbursements will be accomplished by a mere exchange of credit, and the residue to be received in specie will be too small to be felt by the merchants or banks.

And, fourthly. It does not permit the use of Treasury drafts as currency, as the existing laws have been supposed to justify; because it places such conditions upon these drafts as effectually prevent the conversion of Government credit into currency, and limits its uses to the mere purposes of exchange. It merely introduces machinery to facilitate the exercise of the undoubted right of an individual to set off his claim upon the Government against a claim of the Government upon him; the right of the Treasury to draw upon its funds being more limited under the system proposed, than at present with the existing laws. As it is this feature which abstracts the Government as a disturber of the currency, and enables it to administer its revenue without injury to the banks, and unaffected by their conduct, it may be well to examine its operation a little more closely.

The pecuniary transactions of society are settled either in currency, or by an exchange of credit. Those upon short notice and of small amount are usually settled in the former mode; whilst heavy transactions, distant either in point of time or space, are most commonly set against each other. To the extent to which this exchange of credit is effected, the demand for currency diminishes in a given amount of business. Indeed, the extent of this species of exchange may almost be considered as a measure of the improvement in commercial communities. It is a general truth, to which, of course, there are exceptions, that the individuals of a society sell as much as they buy. Whenever there is a debt due from an individual, it may safely be assumed that another of equal amount is somewhere due to him. To collect and array these against each other, is a most important branch of trade. The facility for doing this will increase as the channels of trade wear deeper from use, and the course of its current can be calculated with more certainty. It is manifest that the limits are wide between which this process may fluctuate; and that the more it is extended the better for trade, inasmuch as it will then require less currency which is expensive, and in that very circumstance diminish the dangers of a change in the standard of value. If these things be true, it is clear that the same amount of trade in different states or conditions may require different proportions of currency. A community dealing in money only, (if that could be,) would require much more currency for its trade than would be necessary for the same trade in another which dealt in exchanges as well as in currency.

If the Government, therefore, were to deal only in money, the currency would ebb and flow with the tide of revenue; whilst, if it were practicable, that it dealt only by an offset of its liabilities, the variations of currency and revenue would be independent of each other. The effect of the former system would be, that the Government, through its revenue, would affect the currency by one law, whilst the operations of trade would influence it by another; and thus fluctuations in the revenue might often afford a serious disturbance to currency and commerce. There can be no doubt but that the amount of currency in any country ought to be regulated by its trade; and this can never be entirely effected, unless the demands of Government for currency either sympathize exactly with those of trade, or else cease altogether: the first it is impossible to effect; but the latter may be accomplished, to a very great extent, by an exchange of credit. The very circumstances which increase its disturbing effects, when dealing in currency, fit it for the latter operation. Its credit is good; its transactions are heavy, and may be arranged on time, from the distance between the places of receipt and disbursement. These are the favoring circumstances which have induced the belief that the provisions of the bill now reported will accomplish the end proposed. If this be so, it may be asked if the banks themselves are not interested in the adoption of such a measure. The loss of a valuable customer in the Government is undoubtedly something; but with the entire field of American trade between them, they have ample room for adventure; and the loss of the Government as a customer is not an evil to be compared with the dangers to which they would be subjected in the rude conflicts of party, so long as they maintained a political connection. Nor is this the only advantage which they would derive. Their operations would be safer, when their currency was no longer forced to ebb and flow with the Government expenditures. They have themselves attributed some of their disasters to this cause, and doubtless there have been periods when this connection was mutually embarrassing to both parties.

Having suggested the considerations which may commend the system now proposed to the attention of Congress, this report ought here, perhaps, to be closed. But there are other circumstances which impress it upon our attention, to which we beg leave for a moment to refer. It is not necessary to commend this plan to the consideration of Congress, that it should be the best in the abstract; it is enough to show that it is better than that now in operation, provided it contains nothing positively ill in itself. To say that it would be better than the present system, (if system it can be called,) would be to raise no extravagant pretension in its favor. The fragments of laws which now operate upon the subject can scarcely be said to afford a uniform rule, or to impose any limits upon the discretion of the Secretary. It is so difficult to reduce the remains of the various systems which have been wrecked, or partially repealed, into anything like order or uniformity, that it would be almost impracticable to hold the Secretary responsible, if we were to adopt his discretion as the only guide. There are various constructions of the laws now in force, by skillful combinations of which he might introduce any system he pleased, with at least some plausibility of pretext. If it be true, as some have supposed, that the joint resolution of 1816, as modified by subsequent legislation, leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to receive nothing but specie, or nothing but convertible paper, as he may please; and that the act of 23d June, 1836, is virtually repealed, from the disqualification of the banks which suspended specie payment to accept the conditions of the act, then he may introduce the Independent Treasury at his own pleasure, and that, too, without any of the restrictions which the friends even of that measure wished to impose upon him. On the other hand, if the despotic act is to be considered as functus officio, whilst that of 1789 is still in force, he may adopt the State bank agency without any of those checks by which the friends of that system would limit his authority, before they would intrust him with the power of using them. And, lastly, supposing the act of 23d June, 1836, to be still in force, so soon as banks arise which are not disqualified from acting under it by its provisions, then it is manifest that, during the progress of their creation, we have a system mixed of bank and individual agency, without any sensible limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary who administers it. Nor is this all: the law of 23d June, 1836, will then operate as a premium to the erection of new banks, which alone can enjoy its benefits under such a construction of its provisions. The effect of this bounty would probably be to call new banks into existence; and when enough of these had arisen to fulfill the provisions of the law, we should have the very system which has already failed upon our hands. In giving these various constructions of the acts regulating the Treasury Department, we express no opinion of our own in relation to them. It is not necessary to do so. We state the various opinions upon this subject, to indicate the dangerous latitude of the discretion now left in the Secretary of the Treasury. And yet, notwithstanding this immense discretion reposed in the Secretary of the Treasury, it is still almost impossible for him to administer the Department with convenience to himself and safety to the Government. So much is left to the discretion of his subordinates, that it is very difficult to enforce a strict and speedy responsibility for the public funds.

It would seem to be clear, then, that neither of the parties which divide the country upon the currency question can approve of the present state of the laws which regulate the Treasury Department. If, therefore, the plan now proposed be not the very best in the opinion of either of these divisions, it is respectfully submitted whether it may not be fairly entitled to the assent of all who think it better than the existing state of things. In consideration, therefore, of the reasons which we have presented, we respectfully submit a bill.

THE FINANCES.

SPEECH OF HON. R. B. RHETT,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 1, 1839,

On the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the state of the Finances.

MR. RHETT rose and said:

MR. SPEAKER: I am a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I trust, therefore, the House will perceive the propriety of my defending the report this committee has made on the state of the finances, and of showing, if I can, that the "magnificent blunders" and "scandalous ignorance" imputed to it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] exist rather in his fancy than in fact. So enormous and complicated, indeed, do our errors appear, in the sober estimation of that gentleman, that the usual process of amendment in the House will not do. On a motion made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. CAMBRELENG] for leave to strike out a single sentence in a part of the appendix, containing a statement from the Indian Bureau, the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to recommit the whole report, that it may undergo a thorough and laborious lustration from its manifold impurities. Fortunately, sir, the gentleman has given us an enumeration of our errors, by which the House can judge of the propriety of his motion; and the labors of the committee, if his motion prevails, may be greatly abridged.

But before I enter on these imputed errors in the report, permit me to say a few words as to the principles on which the House will recommit a report, or the members of a committee may be held responsible for its facts. It is most obvious that in a laborious and lengthy document, like that under consideration, containing thousands of facts, there may be slight inaccuracies both in fact and inferences, which the committee may overlook, and the House would disregard. But if any material fact, leading to any material principle, is misstated, the committee, the whole committee, is blamable; and if many such errors exist, so as to render it at all difficult to rectify them in the House, the report ought to be recommitment. I will add one other principle not affecting the relations between the committee and the House. "Libels" or "scandals," (as the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls them,) on individuals not on this floor, ought clearly to be stricken from a report. They constitute, indeed, good ground for contemptuously spurning the document which contains them from your table. Now, with these principles for our conduct, which, I trust, will obtain the sanction of every gentleman who hears me, let us examine the errors imputed to the committee by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The first—and, if it exists at all, I trust I will show the only error—in fact made by the committee, is that with respect to the pension laws, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has quoted in his speech, now in my hand.

"Prior to 1836," says the report, "there was no departure from the ordinary pension rules, except as to revolutionary soldiers; but in that year, provision was made generally for pensions in ordinary cases of death, while in the service after the 20th April, 1818, whether of wounds or not."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends that the act of 1836 included the militia only; whereas, the statement in this clause of the report is, that it includes the regular Army also; and that this is a foul imputation on the twelve thousand men who compose it. Now, sir, I am willing to admit, that the inference contended for may be deduced from the words of the report. Certainly its language is not quite as explicit as I should desire; but the question is not whether there is room for an erroneous inference by those who may be ignorant of our pension laws, but whether there is any error in fact. Has the report stated what is untrue, as the gentleman maintains? This will turn, entirely, on the meaning of the word "generally" in the clause. Neither the regular Army, nor the militia, are expressly mentioned. Does the use of this word, necessarily include the regular Army? The gentleman admits that the whole militia are provided for by the act of 1836. Well, is it not, then, a provision "generally" for the whole militia? and when the act itself, in reference to which the committee uses this general phraseology, is specifically mentioned, and quoted as its authority, what ground can there be for misapprehension? The committee is addressing the Congress of the United States, an assembly of distinguished lawyers, and it ought not to be a very violent presumption, that they are not entirely ignorant of the act of 1836, and will, therefore, not feel profoundly puzzled with the general phrase used in describing it. The act of 1836, is a general act in favor of the militia; it would be more general, if it extended to the regular Army; it would be still more general if it embraced all the officers and retainers of the Government, whether in its civil or military employment. But because legislation, extending to the militia and regular Army, or all the officers of this Government, would be general, it does not follow that legislation, with respect to any one of these great departments of service, may not, with propriety, be termed general also. To maintain the contrary would involve us in an absurd calculation of quantities.

But there is another clause on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania relies, to prove that the regular Army was included in their general phraseology. "If," says the committee, in concluding their remarks on the subject of pensions, "we continue to grant pensions in cases of ordinary death, in peace or in war, to the representatives of all who are employed in the military service, whether in the regular Army or not, and to all in the naval service, we shall soon follow the example of some monarchies," &c. Here, again, is loose phraseology; but there is no assertion that the innovation spoken of actually extends to all the services enumerated; for if so, then the suggestion that we shall soon follow the example of some monarchies, is absurd. We are actually following their example. The clause is merely hypothetical. It supposes a state of things not existing, and points to their example to be avoided.

But I am willing, Mr. Speaker, to admit, if the gentleman wishes it, that the regular Army are included in the general phraseology the committee has used; what harm is it? The committee is arguing upon grave matters of principle and policy. It says that a departure from the principle of pensioning only the families of those who fall in battle, or die of wounds received in the service, has been made, and they quote the act of 1836 to support their assertion. That such legislation exists with respect to the militia and the Navy, is not denied. Of what consequence, sir, is it to the principle against which they are contending—of what consequence can it be to the House in legislating on these great principle—if, in their general phraseology, they do imply or assert that the regular Army is favored by similar legislation? Certainly the intelligence of the House can be but little perverted by so harmless an error. But then it is a foul wrong to individuals—it is an atrocious slander on the regular Army, who, not being here to defend themselves, the gentleman from Pennsylvania generously steps forth to shield them from the imputation. Sir, we have suddenly become very chary on the subject of pensions. I like this tone of high disdain, as being supposed to be pensioners on this Government; but I fear the gentleman has it all to himself, and that there is but very little participation in his feelings by those whom he supposes himself defending. If such a noble spirit of independence existed, there would be some hope that our whole pension system, not exceeded in profligacy by that of any people on earth, would some day or other come to an end, instead of growing young with years, and accumulating with every exhaustion. Your army of forty-two thousand pensioners might then be disbanded. The propositions pertinaciously made here every session, to extend your pension laws to new objects, might then cease; and no more pension bills would be smuggled through this House unobserved at the close of the session, absorbing millions. But I fear, sir, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is greatly mistaken in supposing that he represents correctly on this subject the feelings and wishes of the regular Army. What he considers a foul slander, they would hail, if a reality, as a blessing. What he eschews for them in proud disdain, as an imputation on their honor, they are urgently seeking. I have seen elaborate essays in the papers, vindicating their claims to this very boon from Congress; and last session the subject was brought before the Military Committee, and is again at this session, I understand, pressed on their consideration. A huge wrong, truly, to imply that, die where they may, in peace or war, in a barrack or on the battlefield, their families are provided for! A grievous slander to suppose that the regular Army is put on the same footing with the militia and the Navy, in the kind beneficence of this Government! Sir, if the report is erroneous in making such assertions, it has put forth neither a slander nor a wrong. It states only what ought to be, if your present legislation is to continue. Why should an exception be made of the regular Army, in either your justice or folly? Is it less useful, or patriotic, or brave, than the militia or Navy? I hesitate not to say, that unless you repeal your acts by which your pension system has been extended to the families of those who die neither of wounds, nor in battle, in your militia and naval service, you are bound to extend these provisions to the regular Army. Sir, I go a step further—on the same principle, you are bound to extend your system to all who die in your service, either in the civil or military departments of the Government. What is the difference between the case of a soldier who dies in a time of profound peace quietly in a barrack, without perhaps having even seen the smoke of an enemy's camp, and that of a clerk who dies in your service, in any of your bureaux? Indeed, the poor clerk may have worked harder at a more unhealthy occupation, and probably for far less compensation. You are bound to carry out the principle, if just, fairly to all. In my opinion, the principle of your whole pension system is wrong. It sprung from a vicious state of your Treasury, resulting from the still more vicious principle of the protective policy, and has not one particle of justice or patriotism to support it. Neither the soldier nor the civil officer is exempted from the common fatality of death; and he knows when he enters into the service of the Government what it requires him to perform, and the compensation he is to receive. He enters it voluntarily, and voluntarily he can leave it when he pleases. In private life, who would think himself bound to support the families of all who die in his employment? And what would be thought of a Legislature which should pass a law imposing such an obligation on individuals? The wildest agrarianism never advanced a project so fatal to the rights of property and individual independence. Yet that which is the silliest extravagance, or the most flagrant iniquity, when enforced on individuals, becomes patriotism, and justice, and honor, when enforced on the people.

The next error the gentleman from Pennsylvania has detected in the report, is an error of omission merely. The committee does not state, as he supposes they ought to have done, that the Navy pension fund originated from prizes taken during the last war, and contributions from the officers and seamen. It merely speaks of this fund as one over which Congress has extended its legislation, and destroyed by its unwise provisions. Sir, are we to presume that this body knows nothing? Ignorant as we may be, in the estimation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, are we to suppose the Congress of the United States to be still more ignorant? Must we mention everything, at the peril of having it charged upon us that we know nothing? And if the committee has spoken as if the Government of the United States was responsible for this fund, have they greatly erred? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania not see, that so far as the future operations of Navy pensions are concerned, it is perfectly immaterial from what source the former exhausted resources of the Navy fund may have originated? We have kindly taken the fund under our paternal care, and have divided it out indiscriminately to the families of all who die in the service. It is nearly consumed. What is to be done? Will we not be bound to make good our own improvidence, and supply the means we have exhausted, to carry out our own legislation? Will not the gentleman himself, and his friends, hold this Government responsible, and strenuously claim, in future, a quiet anchorage of the whole Navy pension system, as it now exists, on the Treasury of the United States? We will see, sir—we will see.

The Finances—Mr. Rhett.

HO. OF REPS.

But an inconsistency is detected in the report—a mighty inconsistency, on the subject of steam navigation and steam batteries. In the first part of the report, the committee suggest that "the improvement in steam navigation seems to promise a revolution in the mode of conducting maritime war;" which the report says, "will be noticed hereafter." The subject is noticed afterward; and the committee expresses the opinion, that "the recent improvement in steam batteries, renders it certain that a very important revolution is about to be effected, not only in harbor and coast defenses, but in the whole system of maritime war." Here are the sentences; and I am compelled to ask, where are the inconsistencies they contain? A "magnificent blunder," although always, I suppose, exciting to the imagination, ought at least to be visible.

The last key on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania struck is, however, the most delicate; and probably the cause of all the discord in the report. The tariff—the document is against the tariff, with all its train of abuses and corruption. Is not this the true cause of the gentleman's dissatisfaction? and does it not extend to the whole report? Would he not strangle it, if he could, by recommitting it, or by any other means his hostility could invent? The causes of legislative extravagance it discloses, and the methods of economy and retrenchment it advises—are not these detestable in his estimation? He does not say so. He holds himself uncommitted on the subject of the protective policy—but he denounces the report, for expressing the opinion, that this policy originated from the last war, and the high duties rendered necessary, from the enormous debt in which we were involved; and to prove our error, he quotes one of the first acts passed by the Government, in which the encouragement of manufactures is mentioned; and contends, in its recital, that the protective policy is coeval with its existence. Sir, this sign may be as equivocal as some of the language of the report; and the gentleman will pardon us, if we misapprehend him. If it may not be too presumptuous, however, I would suggest, that what he charges in his eager hostility as an error in fact, may be only a difference in inference—a difference in opinion. The committee think, mauler its preamble, that the act of 1789 was strictly a revenue act; and that prohibition, to the injury of revenue, was neither intended nor effected by its operation; and in this opinion they certainly appear to have the great mass of intelligent thinkers in the Union with them. If the protective policy commenced then—how comes it that a distinguished statesman, then a boy on the green hills of Virginia, has the reputation of its paternity? How is it that another distinguished statesman from South Carolina, from the support he gave to the tariff act of 1816, has been also repeatedly charged—charged but last winter in the other wing of the Capitol—with having originated it? The first act passed nakedly and simply for protection, was, I think, an act passed in 1820, affecting hardware and cutlery. The first occasion on which the principles of prohibition for the benefit of manufactures on the one side, and free trade on the other, were broadly and distinctly opposed, was on the tariff bill of 1824. We fell then, as I fear we will never fall again, with the best blood of

New England by our side, contending bravely for the great principles of justice and liberty. With profound deference, therefore, I would submit—the committee have misstated no fact. They have only ventured to differ from the gentleman in inferences, as I suppose they have done in the whole scope of their opinions. If those opinions are wrong, take the vote, and disagree to the report; but the catalogue of errors the gentleman has exhibited, will hardly justify any action by this House, much less the strong measure he proposes. But it is time to leave the gentleman, and turn to the report itself.

It has been objected to the Administration party on this floor, that they are republicans in profession, but the rankest Federalists in practice—that whilst they proclaim economy with their lips, they vote for the most extravagant appropriations. The distrust inspired by these charges now constitute the only barrier to the triumphant success of the Republican party in the South, and consequently, in the Union. Whilst I believe this charge to be untrue, so far as the mass of the party at present is concerned, (I have nothing to do with the past,) truth compels me to admit that the charge is not without foundation; from the conduct of many of its members on this floor. On all questionable objects of expenditure, this appears to me to be the position of parties here. The Opposition from the North and West go, on principle, en masse, for these appropriations. The supporters of the Administration from the same regions, go also generally for them, but against the principles of their party, under the strong pressure of local interests. The South alone consistently and uniformly speaks and votes against them. It is one of the inevitable effects of undisputed power, to forget general principles, and to go for temporary expedients, in subserviency to local interests. But, sir, the chastening hand of adversity is come. The day of reckoning for the Republican party is at hand, and every departure from their principles—every abuse that undisputed sway and imaginary irresponsibility has tempted them to commit, is now brought out in fearful array against them. And they must meet and answer the account. And how shall they best answer? By professions merely—by loud calls to the people for assistance? No, sir, by conduct—by action, such as this report recommends. Be true to the people, and they will be true to you. Meet the enemy on the old battle-fields of 1798 and '99—where the monuments of former victories rear their proud heads all around you. Rally faithfully on your ancient, unconquered, and unconquerable principles—and the proud bird of conquest will again spread its wings over your standard, and fly from victory to victory; until your free institutions shall be coexistent with our race—and nations shall rise up and call you blessed. But if you basely belie your own principles—ride over your own banners—and seek refuge in the ranks of your opponents for the sake of some paltry local interest—what fate awaits you?—What doom do you deserve? May you not see it in the bitter taunts and stern menaces of your opponents? May you not hear it, in anticipation, in the murmuring wrath of a betrayed and ruined people? You will fall without honor—without regret—disgraced—spurned—trampled on, with an overthrow that shall hardly be retrievable. I speak, sir, plainly; but in no spirit of hostility. Where my sympathies and friendship lie, no one here can misapprehend.

Mr. Speaker, a distinct issue is presented by this report for the action of the House. The committee has made an exhibit of the state of the Treasury, which, if true, presents this alternative: You must suspend your appropriations for harbors, light-houses, and fortifications, or you must effect a loan, and create a new debt, to carry on these projects of improvement. We have nearly eight millions of Treasury notes now in circulation, unredeemed. If these branches of expenditure are to be carried on, Congress must make a debt of six millions more, making an aggregate of some fourteen millions of dollars. As a matter of expenditure, the question which arises in this state of things, is no longer what it has heretofore been, when your Treasury was overflowing, and it was thought to be patriotism to exhaust it.

It is not a mere question of appropriation at all, for we have not got the money to appropriate. But it is a question of debt—not a temporary indebtedness like that authorized at the last session of Congress, being a mere anticipation of funds which we possessed but could not render available—but of naked debt, to support and carry on these great branches of expenditure. Now, sir, at the extra session, when the question of the postponement of the fourth installment to be deposited with the States, was under consideration; at the last session of Congress, when the Treasury note bill was under consideration; at the present session, on all occasions, the Opposition on this floor, North, West, and South, have been denouncing the Administration for its extravagant appropriations. Yes, sir, the very men, from the North and West, who ever move in solid column for every expenditure—by whose united votes all these prodigal appropriations they denounce were mainly carried—these men rail at the Government for its lavish waste of the public treasure, and talk loudly of economy in our disbursements. Now here is a practical test, by which they can vindicate their patriotic horror of extravagance. Here is an instrument by which the mask may be torn off from all political hypocrites, whether of the Administration or Opposition. We daily hear, also, unremitted and violent denunciations, of executive power, patronage, and corruption, and reform in these great essentials, seems to be the only shibboleth of the Opposition. Here, now, is reform, proposed by this report, going to the root of executive abuses. From what source does all executive patronage and corruption originate? Is it not in the appointment of officers, and the application of money? And who creates the offices, and raises the money, intrusted to executive discretion? You, sir,—the members on this floor. Not an office can be created—not a dollar to be drawn from the Treasury, but by your legislation. And is it not therefore strange to hear gentlemen grow hoarse with declaiming, in swelling pathos, against executive power and corruption, as fatal to the liberties of the people, and ere their voices are cold on the air, to see them voting millions upon millions away upon the most questionable objects of expenditure, to be administered by this very executive? Do they believe what they say, or are they deceiving, to betray the people? Here, again, is an opportunity presented by this report, which they should hail with gratulations, by which the sincerity of their professions may be tested. They can now demonstrate to the people, who are in favor of practical economy and reform. Will they go with the report, or will they propose to raise, by a debt, $6,000,000, to be expended by the Executive, in addition to the $29,000,000, recommended by the committee for the ensuing year? The signs are already breaking forth in stormy dissatisfaction; and I trust, by their full glare, the true characters of the contending parties, will ere long be clearly seen.

Mr. Speaker, there is yet another question than that of economy or extravagance in expenditure, involved in the recommendations of this report. If by unnecessary and prodigal appropriations, you exceed the means in your Treasury, and create a debt by which they may be supported, how can the tariff act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act, be carried into effect? There are two ways by which that act may be violated—by directly altering the rates of duty it contains, or by accumulating a debt, by which the duties in 1842 cannot be reduced, in the words of the act, "to the wants of an economical administration of the Government." The latter method, because the most insidious, will probably be resorted to by those disposed to set this act aside. Now, sir, I beg gentlemen distinctly to understand that, as one of the Representatives from the South, I have not the smallest objection to their violating its provisions. Under a most reckless system of expenditure, begotten by its detestable excesses, $28,000,000 deposited with the States has already been unrighteously raised from the people, beyond even the imaginary wants of the Government, merely for the benefit of manufacturers. For myself, I regret that the circumstances under which that act was passed will prevent me from disregarding its provisions. Until 1842, to which period the reductions under this act extends, the manufacturers have a moral right to expect that the protection it affords will be continued. I should, in private life, respect the terms of an arrangement made under the circumstances which produced this act; and I have no political distinct from my private honor. But if gentlemen will set aside its enactments, they shall have my cordial good wishes in their enterprise. My constituents, at least if they are still actuated by their ancient free spirit, will lose nothing by its repeal. I am ready at all times—ready now—this moment—to meet the issue such legislation would present. It cannot be far off; and the sooner great principles of constitutional liberty are settled, the better for the people—the better for the oppressor and the oppressed. When that great controversy comes, if I shall still occupy the seat amongst you I have of late so inadequately filled, I shall not turn aside to take up the challenge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I shall seek no gladiatorial strife. I shall touch no knightly shield. I shall attempt to perform no feats of intellectual warfare by which I may earn the meed of personal renown from the fair or brave. No, no. The questions then arising may be too deep—too vitally affecting the liberties of the people and the existence of this Union, for us to think of our personal appearance amidst its fierce agitations. We should rather endeavor to sink ourselves in the mighty interests, and still more mighty principles they may involve—affecting, perhaps, the destiny of our constituents and their posterity to all time to come. My position and participation in that conflict, come when it may, if unfelt, shall not be unknown. As I have ever been, so shall I then be, found striving, although feebly, against privilege and monopoly—contending for the rights of the many against the oppression of the few—for the Constitution as our fathers gave it to us, unperturbed to the infamous purposes of sectional aggrandizement, or prostituted to the still more degrading influence of manufacturing and moneyed corporations. In such a cause the weakest may be strong—the most fearful, brave. Although gentlemen affect not to see, they feel and know that the principles of this great controversy are implicated in your action on this report.

A little longer, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of expenditures by the Government, and I have done. The subject has been considered rather with a view to the immediate objects for which appropriations are made, than in its bearing on our free institutions. Permit me to present a few observations on the tendency of profuse and profligate expenditures to destroy our republican forms of Government.

The question of expenditures may involve all other questions. It involves, as I have shown, the question of executive power and patronage. It involves the tariff. It involves the great question whether this shall be a consolidated or a Federal Government; and thus may engulf the Constitution itself. From the origin of this Government there have been two great parties—the Federal and Republican parties—struggling for ascendancy in its councils. Their principles have been fixed, although each, when in possession of power, has occasionally swerved from their principles. The one fears—the other trusts in the people. The one consequently seeks to establish a strong Government, and a weak people—the other a weak Government, and a strong people. The one has been endeavoring to extend the arm of the Government into every man's pocket, and every man's fireside. The other, striving to keep it off, and confining it to the simple purpose of protection from injustice and violence abroad and within. Hence the different action of these two great parties, when faithful to their principles, on the subject of expenditures. The more expenditure and the more debt, the stronger the Government and the weaker the people. It is through the taxing power, the receiving and disbursing of money, that the liberties of this country can alone be overthrown. Violence to the person of the citizen is gone with the feudal times, and will no longer be attempted or perpetrated by the Government. Our danger lies in enlisting other principles than those of patriotism and the love of liberty in support of the Government. By practicing on the hopes and fears, the selfishness and personal interests of individuals, through the instrumentality of the money power, all regard to the general good may be lost in the prospect of personal aggrandizement of the Government present; and thus there may be gathered around it all the meanness but not the least powerful principles of our nature, in defense of all its measures. Of course, the interest of the few, thus banded together, is at the expense of the many. Government can only give by taking. If it favors one, it is by oppressing another; and the very knowledge of this partiality and injustice breeds devotion to the Government and contempt or hatred towards those whom it oppresses for their emolument. All taxation and expenditure is, therefore, an evil with those who want as little government as possible. All taxation and expenditure is a blessing to those who want as strong a Government as possible. It has been under the influence of this latter class of politicians that all the efforts have been made to strengthen this Government and enlarge the sphere of its operations. The funded debt, by which enormous profits were reaped by the speculators and capitalists from the revolutionary soldier, was established to enlist them in support of the Government. From the same source originated the establishment of banks by this Government, and its alliance with banks. From the same source your system of internal improvement—your protective tariff—your whole course of profligate expenditure and unjust taxation. The whole scope of their policy has been, by bringing the Government to bear on individuals and great sectional interests, to build up here a great, consolidated Government, by which the people may be controlled and ruled. It is no imputation, therefore, on these gentlemen to say that they are usually found against economy and retrenchment in expenditures, and are in favor of debts, banks, tariffs, and any and every expenditure ingenuity or avarice can invent. It is their system—their policy—their faith; and not a single barrier in the Constitution has been found strong enough to impede their designs. The ready weapon of construction cuts through the parchment.

If these politicians have hitherto failed in enforcing their views of government on the people of the United States, they have been far more successful in England, from whence indeed they have learned their policy. We there see it in full operation, under the national debt of seven hundred and eighty-seven millions of pounds, accumulated on the country. In its first stages this debt might have been the accident of misrule; but, to the younger Pitt, I think, is due the credit of building up to its perfection this artificial and stupendous fabric of corruption and dependency, by which alone the Government of Great Britain is now maintained. History, it appears to me has not done justice to this profoundly sagacious man. To suppose that he did not see through the fallacies of his funding system, which he only designed to facilitate loans; to suppose that in his continental expeditions, which all failed; and his subsidies to continental Powers, which all failed of their object also, he looked only to their operation abroad, is to conceive him a very weak instead of a very great man. He was nothing more than a skillful parliamentary tactician, or a mere orator, without any of those high attributes of wisdom, which seemed to constitute the genius of his command over the minds of other men. His views throughout the whole French war, if I do not mistake his character, were far deeper and wiser than have been ascribed to him. His chief object in that contest was, not to conquer France, but to conquer the people of England. He feared the people; and the hideous spectacle of popular misrule, which France presented, made it the object of his life to ward off a similar catastrophe from England. To accomplish this end, he deliberately plunged the country into debt, that he might enlist the property holders and capitalists of the country in support of the Crown. Certainly he had no objection to his military enterprises proving successful; but that was the secondary object which guided his policy. Mark with what readiness he broke the treaty of Amiens and renewed the war with France. Why did he borrow the whole capital of the Bank of England, and thus make it lean upon the Government? To strengthen the Crown, to support the Aristocracy, to prevent the people of England from reforming or changing their Government, was his first great object. And admirably has he accomplished it; for the dull heads who followed him were obliged to beat on in the path he left them. The national debt of England has been, and will long continue to be, the chief obstacle to all reforms in her Government; the great bulwark of the Crown and the Aristocracy against popular innovations. If, in spite of its influence, great reformatory have been made, and the people have gained a greater influence in the councils of the country, what now, without it, would have been the state of this great nation? A revolution would long since have swept over her destinies before the example of popular governments, and the influence of popular principles abroad in the world. I express no opinion, whether such a revolution would have been advantageous to the people of England; for when revolutions begin, no one can tell where they will end. I express no opinion as to the best policy to be pursued in the present complicated state of the political affairs of England; but of one thing I feel assured, that the Queen of England owes her crown, and the Aristocracy of England their privileges, to the profound sagacity of William Pitt.

WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

REMARKS OF HON. ELI MOORE, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 11, 1839,

On an amendment to the Purser's bill, attaching thereto the Warrant Officers' bill.

MR. MOORE said that it was not his intention to detain the committee by any lengthy remarks of his on this subject, for, so manifestly just was the claim of this class of officers to the additional compensation provided for by the amendment, that an attempt to enforce it by either argument or exhortation, could but be regarded by the committee as unnecessary and uncalled for. He would beg leave to remark, however, that this subject was before the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last session, when it was fully examined, and that the committee instructed their chairman to report a bill, which embraces the substance of this amendment; and that the committee, at the past and present session, were unanimously in favor of the increase of pay herein provided for. For (said he) it is undeniable that the pay received by the warrant officers at present is totally inadequate for their services, it being but five hundred dollars per annum when employed on board small vessels and in navy-yards; and at those stations where quarters are not provided for the officers, it is notorious that they have to pay from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars a year house rent, which leaves them but the small sum of about three hundred dollars to support and clothe themselves and their families. With permission of the Chair, said he, I will read a single paragraph of a letter from one of our oldest and most experienced naval officers touching this subject, (Commodore Barron.)

"The importance of efficient warrant officers in our Navy has been a matter of deep solicitude with me from its commencement to the present day. I cannot believe that any man of war ever has, or ever can be, in a condition to render the services required of her, if the persons who fill those stations are inadequate to the performance of their duties. They are, in fact and in truth, the sole dependence for the mechanical condition of the ship for service; they are the mechanics and store-keepers, and, of course, accountable for the state of preparation in which she may be found on any emergency; and, if they are not qualified and trustworthy, how can they be depended upon."

The sentiments expressed (said Mr. M.) in the extract I have just read, I believe to be in coincidence with those of all the naval commanders in the United States service.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

SALT DUTIES, AND FISHING BOUNTIES AND ALLOWANCES.

SPEECH OF HON. T. H. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

IN SENATE, January 24, 1839.

Mr. BENTON rose to ask the leave for which he had given notice some days ago, to bring in a bill for the repeal of the salt tax, and for the abolition of the fishing bounties and allowances which were dependent upon that tax.

Availing himself of the parliamentary privilege which belonged to the occasion, (Mr. B. said,) he should take the liberty to give his reasons for offering to bring in the bill, and would remind the Senate of what he had said when he gave his notice, that, this being the short session, and one half of it already gone, there was no time for pursuing mere forms, or practicing courtesies which led to no results; that he should speak to the merits of the bill on its presentation, and would wish to be answered in the same way; and that he should prefer that the vote on giving the leave which he requested, should be the vote which every Senator would give if the vote was on the final passage, instead of the introduction of the bill. He wished the vote on the question of leave to be the test vote on the merits of the bill.

The bill which he should offer was a copy of that which had been brought in when Mr. Jefferson was President, and which was passed into a law by the general vote of the Republican party of that day. The bill he should offer was drawn to take effect on the 30th day of April next; for the object was to enable the country to obtain a supply of salt from New Orleans, free of duty, for the ensuing fall and winter, so that the great business of curing provisions might be entered upon at that time, without the double curse which now afflicts it, of increased price and stinted quantity, arising from the monopoly of domestic salt which the tax on the foreign article allows to be effected. The fishing bounties and allowances are permitted to be paid for the whole year, because they would be partly earned before the period fixed for the bill to take effect.

Preliminary to the main argument (Mr. B. said) there were two subordinate objections, not going to the merits of the bill, which required a brief answer. The first of these was, that the Treasury was not now in a condition to dispense with the product of this tax; and the next, that the tax was now in a gradual state of reduction under the operation of the compromise act, as it was called. The answer to the first of these objections was, that the Treasury would be little or nothing affected by the bill; that this was a tax carrying money out of the Treasury, as well as bringing money into it; and that the income and outgoing from this source would be about even for the years 1839 and 1840, and the outgoing would much exceed the income for the years 1841 and 1842. The fishing bounties and allowances were bottomed upon the salt duties, and dependant upon them; and these bounties and allowances were now taking about $250,000 annually from the Treasury, while the tax on which they were bottomed would only bring in about $300,000 for the next two years, and much less for the two years after. The Treasury, therefore, had but little interest in the question; it might lose a few thousand dollars in 1839 and 1840, and gain largely in 1841 and 1842. The second of these objections was equally susceptible of a satisfactory answer. It is true that the salt tax is in a course of reduction under the operation of the compromise act as it is called; but it is equally true that that act neither abolishes the tax nor abolishes the fishing bounties and allowances which are bottomed upon it. It still leaves an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. upon the salt, and it leaves the whole amount of the fishing bounties and allowances untouched and undiminished. The tax of twenty per cent. will be as onerous on the salt consumer as the old tax of twenty cents on the bushel; for it is not the amount of the tax, but the monopolies which it engenders, that does the mischief. Any tax at all, no matter how inconsiderable, will throw the whole foreign salt trade into the hands of regraters—into the hands of monopolists in the sea-port towns—who will either advance the tax for the importer, or go his security, and, in either event, get possession of the whole of the salt, and put up the price to what they please. To answer any beneficial purpose, the tax must not be reduced, but abolished in toto. It must be abolished entirely, as was done in Mr. Jefferson's time, and as has been done in England. Foreign salt should come as free as air. It is nothing but ballast in the ships which bring it, and should be treated as common ballast. It should be sold out of the ship. It should be handed over from the sea vessel to the river vessel—from the ship to the steamboat—without the necessity of being landed, warehoused, carted, bonded, taxed, or passing through the hands of those who stand between the importer and the country dealer or consumer. One cent on the bushel will be sufficient to throw the imported salt into the hands of regraters, and make it a monopoly to undergo extortionate prices, and to be loaded with all the costs and charges incident to landing and warehousing, to finding securities or advancing ready money, and to carting backwards and forwards. The compromise act is faulty and defective in being a reduction instead of an abolition; and it is wholly indefensible in permitting the fishing bounties and allowances to continue in full after the foundation of them was nearly withdrawn—to permit $250,000 to be taken annually out of the Treasury under the assumption of refunding a tax, which tax had nearly ceased to exist.

Having answered these two subordinate objections, Mr. B. went on to say that the salt tax was a curse and an abomination within itself; that it was a tax on the beneficence of God, and on the preservative principle which saves the animal and vegetable kingdom from putrescence—that it was a tax at war with the first principles of political economy, unjustifiable in any country at any time, and particularly unjustifiable in this country at this time—that it was a tax which ought never to have been imposed; which, being imposed, ought long since to have been suppressed, and the suppression of which was now called for by the afflictions and the sufferings of the country. At this instant—at the present moment—now while he was speaking—the whole West was suffering under the double curse of a stinted supply and a doubled price of salt. Regraters in the sea-ports, and monopolizers in the interior, had deprived the country of a supply, and extorted double, and, in some instances, treble or quadruple price for the little that was to be had. At the Kanawha, the old game of monopoly, with paying wells and furnaces to lie idle, that the few that worked might get double price, has again been renewed; and the astonishing spectacle has been seen, that as the price of pork was rising through all the month of November in New Orleans, it was falling during the same month in the States which supply that market, and notoriously falling because salt could not be had to cure it! The market opened in Ohio at $6 50 per hundred and fell to $4 50 per hundred; while mess pork rose to $27 in New Orleans; and the same took place, more or less, all over the West. The loss on the pork of the West alone, during the present year, for want of adequate supplies of good salt, far, far exceeds the product of the tax for many years together. This, then, is the right time to move in the business. An odious monopoly is now in full force; the country is smarting and suffering under the effects of the tax; every farmer feels the oppression; Congress is in session—it can provide now for preventing similar oppressions the next season, but it cannot act in time for the next season if the subject is put off until Congress meets again, near twelve months hence. The present time, therefore, is the time for suppressing this odious, oppressive, and iniquitous tax. It should be suppressed at this session, that the great steamboats returning from New Orleans in May and June may bring supplies to the whole valley, to the center, and to the uppermost parts of the valley of the Mississippi.

Mr. B. regretted that the papers on the salt duties printed by the British House of Commons, and which had been so effectual in Great Britain in abolishing the salt tax, and which had contributed so much to improve the stock of that country, had not been reprinted here. Their reprint in this country would have superseded the necessity of any speech against the salt tax, and would have carried improvement into every branch of rural economy. It would have been an invaluable present to the country. With its aid the salt tax would have fallen here as it fell in Great Britain; without its aid the abolition of the tax must be an arduous struggle, and may be a prolonged contest. It may still be a long time before the people of this Republic can obtain from their representatives what the people of England have obtained from their Parliament—the privilege of using the fine, pure, sun-made salt of the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean sea, at the prices of four, five, six, and seven cents a bushel. If the tax was abolished, the pure alum salt of Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sicily, Trieste, &c., would be purchased in the ports of the United States at those rates, and that of the Bahamas and Turk's Island would be purchased for nine, ten, or eleven cents a bushel. If foreign salt was admitted duty free, the country would soon obtain an adequate supply of salt; it would have an ample supply, instead of being, as it now is, stinted to the one fourth, or to the one fifth part of what was necessary. The whole supply of the United States at present is but about ten or eleven millions of bushels—one half imported, the other half made at home—and this ten or eleven millions is exactly one third less than the annual quantity which the English give to their sheep alone! They have thirty millions of sheep, and give to each one half a pound of salt per week, making half a bushel to each per annum, and fifteen millions of bushels per annum to the whole. All the rest of their stock get salt in ample quantity, and almost all the food for their stock is as regularly salted as are the vegetables which we cook and prepare for our own eating in this country. Hence the great improvement in their stock, an improvement which we shall in vain emulate unless we follow their example—break down the barrier to the introduction of foreign salt, and, by getting the article pure, cheap, and plenty, have an ample supply for every animal, and for its food besides.

Mr. B. deemed it proper, in proof of what he had said, to submit a table of the import of salt for one year, showing the countries from which it came, the quantity and value from each country, and the original cost per bushel. He would take the last year to which the custom-house returns had been made up and printed—the year ending the 30th of September, 1837. The following is the table:

Mr. B. commented upon this table, the number of countries from which we obtained salt, and the low price which it originally cost. From three and a half to twelve and a half cents was the first cost of all the alum salt which came to the United States; the Liverpool blown, which came from England, cost seventeen cents, but was no way comparable to the other, and was wholly unfit to cure fish, beef, bacon, pork, butter, or cheese, as was all salt that was made by the process of boiling. Natural, sun-made salt, crystalizing under solar evaporation, was the only salt that was free from poisonous ingredients; it was the only salt in which the muride of soda became unmixd with any foreign ingredient; all other contained slack and bittern, which promoted instead of prevented putrescence; and, therefore, provisions cured with such salt could never bear long keeping, nor approach a southern climate. Looking over the table, it was gratifying to see the number of countries, and the great extent of the line, which sent us the pure alum salt. Commencing in the West Indies, it ended at Constantinople, having embraced Spain, Portugal, Italy, and the Islands of the Mediterranean sea. The quantity of salt made by the sun in these countries was as unlimited as was the supply of sunshine and sea-water. It could be obtained from them to any possible demand, or conceivable amount, and it was an almost incredible instance of the patience of the people under oppression that, with this boundless supply of pure alum salt, to be had for a few cents a bushel—the measured bushel weighing eighty-four pounds—at New Orleans, if free of duty, they should suffer it to be excluded by an odious tax, and themselves thrown upon the tender mercies of monopolizers for an inadequate supply of base salt at fifty pounds for the bushel, and at double, treble, and quadruple prices! The tax was odious, infamous, and unjust. It had not even the plea of a protecting quality to recommend it; for there was too little alum salt made in the United States to merit the idea of a competition with that which came from abroad. Alum salt was indispensable in the provision trade; it is not made at home; and we drive off that, by taxation, which would come from abroad!

But why disguise or blink the question? Why avoid the true objection to the suppression of this odious tax? We all see where the objection lies, and why avoid or deny it? The fishing bounties and allowances are the real objection; they constitute the real obstacle to the suppression of the salt tax; the receivers of these bounties and allowances are the firm opposers of the repeal of the salt laws, and that, because the bounties and allowances are bottomed upon the salt tax, and cannot remain if that tax is abolished. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] has denied this position, and claimed for these bounties and allowances an independent existence, as an encouragement to the fisheries for a nursery of seamen, and therefore entitled to a continuance even though the salt duties shall be abolished. I differ with him in toto in this opinion. I maintain that these bounties and allowances originated in the salt tax; that they were at first a simple drawback of the amount of duty paid on the salt which was used in curing exported fish; that this drawback afterwards, at the special request of the fishermen, took the form of an allowance on the tonnage of the fishing vessel "as an equivalent for, and a commutation of the drawback;" and that to obtain these allowances, it was just as necessary as ever to prove the use of the foreign salt upon the exported fish, and that the duty upon it had been actually paid, or secured to be paid; that these bounties and allowances were originally just as applicable to beef and pork exported as to fish; that they rose in amount exactly with the increase of the salt duties; were declared by law to exist only as long as the correspondent duties existed; that they fell with the salt tax in Mr. Jefferson's time, were revived with it at the commencement of the late war with Great Britain—and, in fine, that the allowance grows out of the tax, and has nothing to rest upon when that tax is withdrawn. These are my assertions; and, almost apologizing to the Senate for undertaking to prove positions which every member knows to be so well founded, I proceed at once to try the issue which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] has forced upon me; and, taking the thing from the beginning, I shall follow it up through its legislative history from the year 1789 to the present day, and verify, by indubitable evidence, every assertion which I have made.

The fishing interest was one of the first, perhaps the very first, which was ever brought before Congress after the adoption of the present Constitution. The new Government went into operation in March, 1789, and in February, 1790, a meeting of the owners of fishing vessels took place at Marblehead, in the State of Massachusetts, and prayed the interposition of the general court of Massachusetts to obtain from the Congress of the United States the relief and the aid which they believed the fisheries to require. The general court memorialized Congress accordingly, and specifically asked, 1. A remission of duties on all the dutiable articles, of which salt was the chief, which were used in the fisheries; 2. A preference, or monopoly, in the home market, for the sale of their fish by effectual duties to exclude foreign fish; 3. Improved markets abroad by treaty stipulations with foreign Powers for the favorable admission of our fish into their ports; 4. Premiums and bounties out of the Federal Treasury to the fishing vessels, in imitation of the bounties and premiums given by England, France, and Holland to the vessels engaged in their fisheries; 5. That the bounty in lieu of the drawback of the duty on the salt used in carrying exported fish, should be paid to the owners of the fishing vessel, instead of being paid to the exporter of the fish. These were the aids and relief prayed for; and of this I hold the proof in my hands, and will now exhibit some papers to establish what I say. Mr. B. read:

"We, the subscribers, being a committee appointed by the owners of fishing vessels, in the town of Marblehead, to take into consideration the many grievances and burdens the cod-fishery now labors under, and to make a statement of them, which statement so made to be handed to Colonel Glover, by him to be laid before the committee of the general court appointed to consider the same, do report the said statement as follows, viz:

- "1. Impost duties on salt.
- "2. Impost duties and excise on rum, sugar, and molasses.
- "3. Impost on hooks, lines, and leads.
- "4. Impost on coarse woollens.
- "5. Impost on duck, cordage, and cables.
- "6. Impost on hemp, iron, and twine.
- "7. Impost on tonnage and naval duties.
- "8. Impost on the ineffectual duties on foreign fish.
- "9. Impost on the duties our fisheries pay at foreign markets, while the fisheries of France and England receive large privileges and bounties from their Government.
- "10. Impost on the heavy poll tax laid on the fishermen.
- "11. Impost on excise on New England rum.

"It appears to the committee, from an exact investigation, that the earnings and expenses of fishing schooners of this town, for the years 1787, 1788, and 1789, were to the earnings of each schooner, viz:

'For the year 1787.....	£145
'For the year 1788.....	137
'For the year 1789.....	82

"and that the annual average expenses of these vessels, inclusive of insurance was £124

"It also appears that the number of schooners employed in the Grand Bank fishery, for the year 1789, was one hundred and twenty-four, nineteen of which, were property of persons not belonging to the town, and of which number thirty-three sail have been taken out of the fishery from the declension of the business, exclusive of the aforementioned disadvantages.

"That the bounty granted to the fishery by Congress as a compensation for the duty on salt, this committee humbly conceive will not operate to that purpose so effectually, as if paid direct into the hands of the owners of the vessels, instead of the shippers of the fish.

This is the list of grievances presented on the 1st day of February, 1790, to the general court of Massachusetts, by the owners of fishing vessels in Marblehead, and by the general court immediately communicated to the Congress of the United States, then holding its first session under the new Constitution, accompanied by a memorial in behalf of the petitioners. This memorial was referred by the House of Representatives to the then Secretary of State, (Mr. Jefferson,) and by him a report upon the whole subject of the fisheries, foreign and domestic, was made to the House at the next session, distinguished by the depth, precision, and comprehensiveness of knowledge which characterized all the productions of that great man. Coming to results, after a lucid historical view of the fisheries of England, France, Holland, Spain, and Portugal, and of the United States while colonies of Great Britain, and showing that our fisheries possessed great inherent advantages over all others, which must ultimately give them the mastery in any fair contest, he recommended aid to our fisheries in three different modes, to wit: drawback of the duties paid by them on the articles used in their calling, a preference in the home market by duties on foreign fish, an extension of the foreign market, by amicable negotiations or retaliatory exclusions; and he expressly rejected and condemned the idea of extending support to the fisheries by paying bounties out of our Treasury, as was done in England and other countries. These aids, he argued, with the natural inherent advantages of our situation for carrying on the fisheries, would give us the mastery in that branch of industry; and the event has proved that he was right. The foreign fisheries have declined; ours have flourished; our fishermen have the monopoly of the home market, and they share largely in the markets of other countries. An extract from Mr. Jefferson's report will present these points with a clearness which will show to all that our fishing bounties and allowances are wholly bottomed upon the salt duty. He says:

"It will now be proper to count the advantages which aid, and the disadvantages which oppose, 'us in the conflict, (between our fishermen and 'those of foreign countries.) Our advantages are,

- "1. The neighborhood of the great fisheries, 'which permits our fishermen to bring home their 'fish to be salted by their wives and children.
- "2. The shore fisheries, so near at hand as to 'enable the vessels to run into port in a storm, 'and so lessen the risk, for which distant nations 'must pay insurance.
- "3. The winter fisheries, which, like household manufactures, employ portions of time 'which would otherwise be useless.
- "4. The smallness of the vessels, which the 'shortness of the voyage enables us to employ, 'and which consequently require but a small 'capital.
- "5. The cheapness of our vessels, which do 'not cost above the half of the Baltic fur vessels, 'computing price and duration.
- "6. Their excellence as sea boats, which decreases the risk, and quickens the return.
- "7. The superiority of our mariners in skill, 'activity, enterprise, sobriety, and order.
- "8. The cheapness of provisions.
- "9. The cheapness of casks, which, of itself, is said to be equal to an extra profit of fifteen per cent. These advantages are of such force, that, while experience has proved that no other nation can make a mercantile profit on the Newfoundland fishery, nor can support it without national aid, we can make a profit, if vent for our fish can be procured.

"Of the disadvantages opposed to us, those which depend on ourselves are,

"Tonnage and naval duties on vessels employed in the fishery.

"Impost duties on salt.

"On tea, rum, sugar, molasses, hooks, lines and leads, duck, cordage and cables, iron, hemp and twine, used in the fishery; coarse woollens, worn by the fishermen, and the poll tax levied by the State on their persons. The statement No. 6 shows the amount of these, exclusive of the State tax and drawback on the fish exported, to be $5 25 per man, or $57 75 per vessel of sixty-five tons. When a business is so nearly in equilibrio that one can hardly discern whether the profit be sufficient to continue it or not, smaller sums than these suffice to turn the scale against it. To these disadvantages add ineffectual duties on the importation of foreign fish. In justification of these last it is urged that the foreign fish received is in exchange for the produce of agriculture. To which it may be answered, that the thing given is more merchantable than that received in exchange, and that agriculture has too many markets to be allowed to take away those of the fisheries. It will rest, therefore, with the wisdom of the Legislature to decide whether prohibition should not be opposed to prohibition, and high duty to high duty, on fish of other nations; whether any, and which of the naval and other duties may be remitted or an equivalent given to the fisherman in the form of a drawback, or bounty; and whether the loss of markets abroad may not, in some degree, be compensated by creating markets at home; to which might contribute the fish constituting a part of the military ration in stations not too distant from navigation, a part of the necessary sea stores of vessels, and the encouraging private individuals to let the fisherman share with the cultivator in furnishing the supplies of the table. A habit introduced from motives of patriotism, would soon be followed from motives of taste; and who will undertake to fix limits to this demand, if it can be once excited with a nation which doubles, and will long continue to double, at very short periods."

"Of the disadvantages which depend on others are—

"1. The loss of the Mediterranean markets.

"2. Exclusions from the markets of some of our neighbors.

"3. High duties in those of others; and,

"4. Bounties to the individuals in competition with us.

"This brings us to the question; what relief does the condition of this fishery require? And the answer is:

"1. A remission of duties on the articles used in their calling.

"2. A retaliating duty on the foreign article.

"3. Free markets abroad."

And he concludes the report with the explicit recommendation that the fisheries are not to draw support from the Treasury.

These recommendations of Mr. Jefferson were adopted by Congress, and became the basis of all the legislative and diplomatic action of our Government in relation to the fisheries. What he recommended was done, and nothing more than he recommended was done. The salt duty being the principal burden arising from the imposts which the fishermen complained of, that duty was abolished in their favor; that is to say, they were at first allowed a drawback of the duty on the salt used in curing so much of the fish as was exported to foreign countries; which drawback was afterwards commuted into an equivalent in the form of an allowance on the tonnage of the fishing vessel. The other articles subject to impost, presented in the list of their burdens by the fishermen, were left on the same footing for them, as to the rest of the population. Duties were not released to them on tea, rum, coarse woollens, molasses, sugar, &c., but they have fared in the use of these articles as the rest of the community have done. Retaliatory duties were laid upon foreign fish, by which a monopoly of the home market has been secured to our fishermen; advantageous markets have been procured for our fish and oils in foreign countries; so that this branch of trade is largely in our favor. We export much, and import but little, in this line. This has been our course of legislation and of diplomacy on this subject; and now I will refer to the acts of Congress which prove it, and will afterwards show the beneficial results which have ensued.

1. The first act is that of 1789, the same which imposed a duty of six cents a bushel upon salt, and which granted a bounty of five cents a barrel on pickled fish and salted provisions, and five cents a quintal on dried fish exported from the United States, "in lieu of a drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt employed and expended therein."

This act (said Mr. B.) is decisive of the whole question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis.] It explodes the idea of this bounty being an encouragement to the fisheries as a nursery of seamen; for it gives the same bounty to the exporters of beef and pork as to the exporters of fish; and certainly mariners were not expected to be created among the raisers of hogs and cattle.

2. In 1790 the duty on salt was doubled; it was raised from six to twelve cents on the bushel; by the same act the bounty in lieu of drawback of the duty on salt used in curing fish and provisions exported was also doubled; it was raised from five cents to ten cents a barrel on pickled fish, beef, and pork, and to ten cents a quintal on dried fish. Act of July 4, 1789, vol. 2, chap. 2, Laws United States.

3. An act of 1792 repeals the bounty in lieu of drawback on dried fish, and in lieu of that, "and as a commutation thereof, and equivalent therefor," shifts the bounty from the fish exported to the fishing vessel, and authorizes an allowance to be paid to vessels in the cod-fishery at the rate of $1 50 a ton on vessels of from twenty to thirty tons burden; of $2 50 on the tonnage of vessels above thirty tons; and $1 a ton on vessels between five tons and twenty tons, with a limitation to $170 for maximum allowance to any one vessel. (Act of February 16, 1792, vol. 2, chap. 107, Laws United States.) This act was in exact compliance with the request of the owners of fishing vessels in their application to the general court of Massachusetts, in February, 1790, and by the general court laid before Congress. The act of 1789 had given a bounty to the shipper of fish in lieu of drawback of duty; the owners of fishing vessels prayed that this might be paid to the "owners of the fishing vessels instead of the shippers of the fish." Congress granted the request; and to exclude the possibility of considering it as a bounty out of the Treasury, expressly declared it to be "a commutation of, and an equivalent for, the bounty in lieu of drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt used in curing the fish and provisions exported." The idea of making mariners is also wholly contradicted by extending the bounty down to five-ton boats.

4. In 1797 the duty on salt is raised from twelve cents to twenty cents a bushel; a corresponding increase is immediately made in the bounties and allowances to salted provisions, fish, and fishing vessels. The bounty in lieu of drawback to salted provisions was raised to eighteen cents a barrel; the bounty on pickled fish was raised to twenty-two cents a barrel; and thirty-three and a third per cent was added to the allowance in favor of the cod-fishing vessels. Act of May 2, 1792, vol. 2, chap. 128, Laws United States.

5. The act of April 12, 1800, continues the salt duty, and all the bounties and allowances to salt provisions, fish, and fishing-vessels, for the term of ten years, and then adds this proviso: "That these allowances shall not be understood to be continued for a longer time than the correspondent duties on salt, respectively, for which the said allowances were granted, shall be payable."—Vol. 3, chap. 176, Laws United States.

6. In 1807, Mr. Jefferson being President, the salt tax was abolished, and with it the fishing bounties and allowances, and the bounty on exported salted provisions, which were dependent upon it. The act had but three years to run at the time it was repealed; but the Republicans of that day would not leave the odious tax to die a natural death. They extinguished it by law. They cut off its three years' life. The first section of the act repealed the tax; and the second applied to the bounties and allowances, and ran in these words: "That from and after the first day of January next, so much of any act as allows a bounty on exported salt provisions and pickled fish, in lieu of drawback of the duties on salt employed in curing the same, and so much of any act as makes allowances to the owners and crews of fishing vessels, in lieu of drawback of the duties paid on the salt used by the same, shall be, and the same hereby is, repealed."

This is the end of the first salt tax. It is the legislation of near twenty years upon the subject—from 1789 to 1807—and it shows that beef and pork exported received the same bounty which went to the fisheries; a fact which is itself full proof that the fishing bounties were not given for the purpose of making mariners, unless mariners were also expected to be made of the herdsmen who were employed in raising cattle and hogs.

This (said Mr. B.) brings us to the end of the first salt tax ever imposed in the United States; and also to the end of the bounties and allowances on the exportation of salted beef and pork, and on exported fish and fishing vessels which were dependent upon it. The tax and all its dependent provisions fell together; they fell under the Republican Administration of Mr. Jefferson. The Journals of Congress and the votes of the two Houses show that the repeal of the tax was pretty nearly a party measure, the Republicans being for the repeal, and the Federalists against it. Doubtless it was never expected to be revived under a Republican Administration; but the financial embarrassments of the war with Great Britain caused it to be resorted to in the second year of that contest, but only as a war tax, expressly limited to the duration of the war, and one year thereafter. This is the act now in force, and a recurrence to its provisions will prove and establish every position for which I now contend. I will show these provisions, beginning with the title, and will afterwards show the continuation of the act and the alterations which may have been made in it. The title of the act is this: "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels engaged in the fisheries."

The first section of the act revives the salt tax of twenty cents per bushel, to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1814. The second section revives the bounty of twenty cents per barrel on exported pickled fish, and also the allowances to fishing vessels, at the rate of $2 40 per ton for all vessels of twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty; and $1 60 per ton on all vessels of less than twenty tons, and above five, and of $4 for all above thirty tons, with a limitation of $272 to any one vessel; these bounties and allowances to take effect on the same day the salt tax went into operation. The third section then contained a provision in these words:

"That no bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be made under the authority of this act, unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the collector that the pickled fish for which the bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be claimed, was wholly cured with foreign salt, and on which a duty shall have been secured or paid."

Such is the third section of the bill, not at all necessary to show that the fishing allowances were dependent upon the salt tax, but superadded by way of making assurance doubly sure.

The concluding section of the bill is in these words:

"That this act shall continue in force until the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, and for one year thereafter, and no longer."

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

This concluding section of the act (continued Mr. B.) proves, first, that the salt tax was a war tax, limited to the exigencies of the war, and to cease within one year after its termination; second, that the fishing bounties and allowances were the appendage of the tax, and came into renewed existence with it; third, that the whole act was to cease together; so that, if the law had expired according to its limitation, all the fishing bounties and allowances would have ceased at the same time, without a particle of legislation being required to abolish these allowances.

Having made these remarks upon the act for the revival of the salt tax and its appendages, Mr. B. went on to point out to the attention of the Senate the fact that this law totally omitted the enactments in favor of exported salted beef and pork, which began with the salt tax in 1789, and continued with it until 1807; this act of 1813 omits that provision, and why? For the obvious reason that the revived act was limited to the war, and the farmers not expecting to carry on any foreign trade during the war, either to import foreign salt or to export beef and pork, made no provision for securing to themselves the bounties on these articles; but the fishing interest of the northeast, more provident than the farming interest of the northwest, looked to the possibility of going on with their trade during hostilities; and in this, as was proved by the event, they were not mistaken!

The war with Great Britain ceased the 17th of February, 1815; the act then reviving the salt tax and the fishing allowances should have ceased one year thereafter, to wit: on the 17th of February, 1816. But the war left a great debt behind it; provision for the payment of that debt was indispensable; duties upon imports was the source looked to for the payment of that debt; and on the 5th of February, 1816, the heavy war duties were continued on goods, wares, and merchandise generally; on the 9th of the same month, the salt tax and its appendages were also continued. This latter act ran in these words:

"That the act entitled 'An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels engaged in the fisheries,' passed the 29th of July, 1813, shall be, and the same hereby is, continued in force, anything in the said act to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding."

Thus (continued Mr. B.) the act of 1813, instead of expiring twelve months after the war, was continued without specification of time, but evidently to meet the war debt; so that this act of 1813 is now the act by virtue of which the fishing bounties and allowances are paid. Several acts have since been passed on the subject, but none to vary the principle of the act of 1813. The only differences introduced are to increase the allowances to fishing vessels, so as to give to the small boats from five to thirty tons, $3 50 per ton; to vessels above thirty tons, $4 per ton; with a limitation to $360 in favor of any one vessel.

Mr. B. said he had now traced the acts allowing these fishing bounties and allowances from the year 1789, to the present day. He had traced all the leading acts through all their main features; and the result was, that those bounties and allowances are the offspring of the salt duty; and they grow out of it; have risen and fallen with it; are dependent upon it; and cannot live one day without it. These bounties and allowances are now great; they are about a quarter of a million of dollars per annum; they have taken about six millions out of the Treasury; and the receipt of this sum is too comfortable a thing to the fishermen to be willingly relinquished by them. They mean to retain it, if they can; and to retain it, it is indispensable to retain the salt tax; and hence, like clear-sighted men, who understand their own interest, they set up an unflinching, uncompromising opposition to the repeal of the salt duties.

Mr. B. then exhibited a table showing the progressive increase of the fishing allowances and the salt duty from 1789; how they had risen together and fallen together until 1807; and how, since that time, these bounties had been increased without an increase of the salt duty, and was now at its highest, although the salt duty was two thirds reduced, and those allowances ought to have been reduced in the same proportion:

In the year 1828, an act passed for abolishing a part of the duty on salt; and in 1833 the famous compromise act made provision for a further reduction of the duty; but neither of these acts made any provision in relation to the fishing bounties and allowances, although these bounties and allowances, should have been reduced in proportion to the reduction of the tax on which they were bottomed. The late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ingham, noticed this omission in the act of 1828, and called the attention of Congress to the necessity of remedying it. His notice was contained in his annual report on the finances for the year 1830, and was in these words:

"The reduction of the duty on salt, made at the last session, which will take place on the 1st of January, 1831, and 1st of January, 1832, respectively, would seem to render it proper to make a corresponding reduction in the drawback allowed on the exportation of pickled fish, which is fixed by the act of 29th of July, 1813, at twenty cents per barrel, that being, at the time, the duty charged on one bushel of salt. Unless the law allowing the drawback shall be previously modified, the exporter will begin to receive, after the 1st of January next, a greater amount of drawback than the duty previously paid on the salt."

—Ingham's annual Treasury report, December, 1830.

This recommendation produced no effect; and the compromise act, as it is called, which afterwards passed, and made further reduction of the salt duty, was entirely silent on the subject of the fishing bounties and allowances. The salt tax itself, although a war tax, expressly limited to the war, and one year thereafter, "and no longer," was yet continued longer to pay the war debt; and although that debt has been many years paid, and all the other war taxes abolished, yet this most unjust and most execrable and detestable of all taxes, is still permitted to survive. Even by the compromise act, it is to be reduced no lower than to twenty per cent. on the value; a sum which will be just as bad as twenty cents on the bushel, because it will throw all foreign salt into the hands of a few, and will establish a monopoly in the seaports as well as monopolies in the interior. Total abolition of the tax is the only thing that will bring an adequate supply of salt into the country, and enable it to be sold at first cost by the measured bushel. To effect this total abolition, is now the great object of the South and West; and this great object is strenuously resisted by the northeast, because upon the continuance of the salt tax entirely depends their continued receipt of a quarter of a million of dollars per annum out of the public Treasury for fishing bounties and allowances. The overthrow of these allowances is, therefore, a preliminary work; and all that are opposed to the tax on salt, must join in removing from under it this main pillar, which props and supports it. This is the object of my labor; and having shown, by a careful review of our legislation for upwards of forty years upon this subject, that the tax and the allowances are indissolubly connected, and must rise and fall together, I now take a higher and more sacred ground, and undertake to say that an allowance to the fishing vessels as a mere bounty from the Treasury to encourage a branch of industry which creates mariners, is an UNCONSTITUTIONAL use of the public money; and besides, is a most INEXPEDIENT, DANGEROUS, UNNECESSARY, and UNFAIR use of it. These, sir, are not phrases to round off a period, to fill up a sentence, or to supply the want of argument, but they are well considered and tenable positions, the truth of which I now proceed to demonstrate:

I. Unconstitutionality.—Gratuities from the public Treasury to sustain any branch of industry is a thing unknown to the Constitution; and the power to make such gratuities cannot be derived from any clause in that instrument. The attempt was made at the commencement of this Government and entirely failed. General Hamilton was in favor of fostering manufactures by direct bounties from the Treasury, but the idea was entirely repudiated by the friends of a limited Government, and the whole scheme was successfully resisted. In the case of the fisheries themselves it was asked and denied. The memorial from the general court of Massachusetts, presented at the first session of the first Congress under the present Constitution, prayed for aid in four different ways to the fisheries; 1. A remission of duties on the articles used by the fishermen; 2. A monopoly of the home market by prohibitory duties on foreign fish; 3. Improved markets abroad by amicable negotiations with foreign Powers in favor of American fish; 4. Premiums and bounties in imitation of the system of England, France, and Holland. Of these four varieties of aid, the Government granted the three first, and denied the fourth. The Constitution was victorious in that movement against it, and the Constitution is the same now that it was then. It refused bounties and premiums to the fisheries in 1789; it cannot grant them in 1839.

II. Inexpedient.—Because it cannot be granted to one branch of industry without being granted to others. If gratuities once issue from the Treasury to prop up and sustain any one pursuit or occupation, every other pursuit or occupation will have an equal claim to like gratuities in its favor. Combinations will take place among different pretenders to the new species of pillage; and the public Treasury will be exhausted, the people taxed, and the nation run into debt to raise the sums which their demands will require.

III. Unnecessary.—I hold these bounties as a gratuity from the Treasury to be unnecessary to the fisheries, either in the way of profit to the fishermen, or as encouraging the creation of mariners. The fisheries are now in the most flourishing state, and other vast nurseries for seamen have sprung up. The natural and inherent advantages of our people for carrying on these fisheries, with the benefit of the home and foreign markets secured for them, as proposed by Mr. Jefferson, have given them the mastery in the business, and totally freed them from the rivalry of France and England, which was the very foundation of their application to Congress in 1790. Then the English largely shared our home market, and nearly monopolized the foreign; now this is exactly reversed. Now our fishermen have the monopoly of the home market, and largely share the foreign; and a comparison of different dates, and a late return to the Massachusetts Legislature, show the business to be in a most flourishing condition. The exports from our fisheries for the year ending the 30th September, 1837, stand thus:

	Exports.	Imports.
Dried fish, or cod fisheries.	$588,506	$13,528
Pickled or river fish, (herring, shad, salmon, and mackerel).....	181,334	83,952
Whale and other fish-oil....	1,271,545	564
Spermacei oil.....	151,875	7,008
Whalebone.....	223,682	none.
Spermacei candles.....	294,510	832
	2,711,452	105,884
	105,884

Balance in favor of U. S. $2,605,566

Here is an export of $2,600,000 worth of fish and oil, and an import of only about $100,000, and two thirds of that consisting of salmon and herring, which do not conflict with our northern fisheries; while in 1790 the export of the same articles was only $1,194,000, and the import was 6,343 barrels pickled fish and 3,701,220 pounds of dried fish. A report made to a recent General Assembly of the State of Massachusetts shows that the fisheries of that State alone, for the year ending the 30th of March, 1837, amounted to near $10,000,000, to wit: whale, cod, and mackerel, $7,509,290; refined whale and other oil, $2,030,321. Upon so large a business as this, the amount of the bounties and allowances can have but little influence; and even if gratuitous bounties had been necessary in 1790, as prayed for by the fishermen, and the event has proved that they were not necessary, it is clear and indisputable that they are not necessary now.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

Gratuitous bounties are not necessary, even if they were constitutional, to promote the success of the fisheries, so far as the profit of the fishermen are concerned. They have a profitable business without a gratuity from the Treasury. Still less are they necessary to keep up a nursery for seamen, and to prevent our fishermen from going into the service of the English, as was so much apprehended in 1790. The English fishing service has no attraction at present for our fishermen; they have declined, and have ceased to be an object of competition, of fear, or of interest to us. Other great nurseries of seamen have grown up, which leave the fisheries, formerly the first, now a secondary resource for the creation of mariners. In 1790 we had three nurseries for seamen, namely, the fisheries, the coasting trade, and the carrying trade; we have the same three now, all of them greatly augmented, and a new one besides, which we did not then possess. The fisheries are far greater now than they were then; the coasting trade is increased, not merely in the ratio of increased population and wealth, but the double of it on account of the increased extent of the coast itself from the acquisition of Florida and Louisiana; and from the vast trade and fishing which has grown up in all the northern lakes, and which add so many thousand miles to our coasting trade; the carrying trade is prodigiously augmented, not merely by operation of the laws which give the monopoly of that business, nearly, to our own shipping, but also from the production of cotton, an article unknown to our exports forty years ago, and now employing infinitely more ships and mariners than ever the fisheries did. If a gratuity is to be given out of the Treasury to the pursuits which create mariners, the cotton planting of the South will now stand at the head of the occupations which merit that bounty. Besides all these vast augmentations of our former nurseries for seamen, we have a new and a great one in the Navy, which has since been built up, and which not only employs many thousand seamen, but finds time and opportunity, from our peaceful policy, and the extended protection which we give to our commerce, to prepare them in time of peace for service during war. In no point of view, then, neither for the profit of the fisheries, nor as a nursery of seamen, is a gratuity from the Treasury necessary to the support of our fisheries; and all the arguments in favor of such gratuities in 1790, and proved by the event to have been mistaken then, are obsolete, inapplicable, and wholly out of date now. But, why argue? It is not a case for argument, since the same encouragement was given to beef and pork curers as to fishermen; and certainly no mariners were expected to be created by raising cattle and hogs!

IV. Unfair.—This is a head which admits of several specifications. It is unfair towards the curers of beef and pork, both of which articles were put on the same footing with respect to the bounties and allowances in lieu of the drawback of the salt duty by the act of 1789; continued on the same footing through every act to the year 1807; and then shared the same fate, and were abolished together. They rest upon the same principle, and cannot fairly be separated. The allowances to beef and pork exported were not revived in the act of 1813—the act reviving the salt tax, and with it the fishing bounties and allowances; they were not then revived, because the new act was a temporary measure, limited to the war, and the curers of beef and pork did not expect to have any foreign trade during its continuance; and, therefore, made no provision for the revival of the bounties which they had enjoyed before, in common with the fisheries. The act of 1816, which continued the act of 1813, was also understood to be temporary. It was continued for no definite period, but merely continued in force generally with the rest of the war duties; and was expected to be discontinued in a short time. For these reasons the friends of the farming interest made no effort to save to the great provision trade of the South and West the large pecuniary advantage which they had formerly enjoyed in common with the northern fisheries. They remained silent; they put in no claim for their equal privilege; and the consequence has been, that while these fisheries have received, since 1813, between three and four millions of dollars out of the public Treasury, the farming interest has not received a cent upon their beef and pork. This is unfair, it is unjust; it is indefensible, and now that the injustice is brought to the notice of the Senate, and the question is fully presented, I hold it to be impossible that the injurious discrimination is to be longer continued. It cannot be tolerated that these fisheries, after the exclusive benefit which they have already enjoyed since 1813, are to go on indefinitely to enjoy the same benefit, to the prejudice of the beef and pork trade. This cannot be tolerated; the agricultural interest of the South and West cannot be expected to put up with this injustice any longer. Bounties to them rest upon the same principle as the bounties to the fishing interest, and henceforth they must share the same fate. The question now is, what shall that fate be? And here, I apprehend, it would be no difficult matter for the two interests to make a bargain together, and agree to support a bill to restore the beef and pork trade to its lost advantage, and to continue indefinitely the bounties and allowances to each. But this, in my opinion, would be a bad bargain on the side of the agricultural interest; and an unconstitutional and dangerous bargain on the side of both. The agricultural interest wants salt for the living stock still more than for the slaughtered; it wants salt for the provisions used at home, and within the limits of the United States, as well as for that exported; and a mere restoration of bounty on the exported beef and pork would be no indemnity for the stinted supply, and increased price, the inseparable consequence of the salt tax. To continue the tax, and restore the bounty to exported provisions, would then be a bad bargain for the farming interest, and a worse one for the Treasury, which would find itself called upon for a much larger annual amount of bounty than the annual amount of the tax would ever meet. To repeal the tax, and still continue the bounties and allowances to both fish and provisions, would be to grant naked bounties—direct gratuities—from the Federal Treasury in favor of two branches of industry; a grant which I hold to be as unconstitutional as it would be inexpedient and dangerous. To all the other fisheries carried on in the United States, a continuance of these allowances to the northern fisheries, without being extended to them, would be too unfair to be tolerated. The fisheries of Lake Superior and the other lakes; those of the bays and rivers of the Atlantic board—the Delaware and Chesapeake bays, the Potomac river, the Albemarle sound, and other places—had the same right to these allowances which the northern fisheries had. Whether granted as a commutation and equivalent for the drawback of the salt duty, or whether continued as a naked gratuity, the case of these interior fisheries cannot be separated from the others. They use salt as largely as the others do; they use vessels fully a match to the five-ton boats which now draw bounties and allowances. If granted to these, bacon cannot be excluded. Fish is the bacon of the northeast; and this fish is exempted from the salt tax. The bacon of the South and West and Middle States has a right to the same exemption; and gentlemen may rest assured that the time has now arrived when all these interests must be placed on the same footing—when beef, pork, bacon, the lake, the bay, the sound, and the river fisheries, must be exempted from the burdens of the salt tax, as well as the cod and mackerel fisheries of the northeast.

Mr. B. concluded with saying that he had fully made out his proposition that the fishing bounties and allowances were founded upon the salt tax—were coeval with it—indissolubly connected with it—reducible and extinguishable with it; that these bounties and allowances could not survive the fall of the tax one instant; that the salt tax was kept alive to keep up this issue from the Treasury; and that, to abolish the tax, it was indispensably prerequisite to demolish the pretensions of the fishing interest, to a continuance of their exclusive bounties and allowances. This was what he had attempted to show ought to be done. He had confined himself in this opening speech to this single branch of the subject. He had said but little on the subject of the execrable tax itself, its oppressions upon the agricultural class, and its fostering of monopolizers and regraters. He left that branch of the subject for a future occasion; and when he came to touch it, he should avail himself freely and largely of the transcendent papers on the uses of salt and the evils of the salt tax which a British Commons printed for the use of Britons, and before which the British salt tax fell, and by which British stock and agriculture has been incredibly benefited; which papers he had twice obtained an order of the Senate for printing, which order had twice been rescinded. When he came to speak on this branch of the subject, he should avail himself fully of these invaluable papers.

IN SENATE, January 28, 1839.

MR. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, having replied to MR. BENTON,

MR. BENTON expressed his regret that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] could not have concluded his argument without an attack upon General Jackson, and especially an attack going back to the veto of the bank charter, the removal of the deposits, the specie circular, the suspension of specie payments—which formerly figured in party controversies, had lived out their brief day, and now quietly reposed in the tomb of oblivion. To resuscitate these old topics would seem to be in bad taste; to debate them over again seemed to be getting up a discussion flat, stale, and unprofitable. But the Senator from Massachusetts had gone into this work; he had commenced the business; and he has given us a new edition of the old panic speeches of 1832, 1833, 1834, 1836, and 1837. We have been again informed of commerce ruined, confidence destroyed, manufactories stopped, the laborer without work, shops shut up, distress universal, misery in every house, and despair in every bosom; and all this mischief the sad doings of one wicked, wanton, and ignorant old man! We have had a new edition of all this served up to us, as unexpectedly to me as if it had all fallen from the clouds, and as repugnant to my feelings as could be the disinterment and exhumation of the dead. But since the Senator had chosen to revive the memory of scenes on which the curtain had long since been dropped, and has characterized them in a way to suit the purposes and the feelings of himself and his party, I must be permitted to say to him that I have lately read a history of the very events which he has been describing, written a long time ago, in a foreign land and a foreign language, but so accurate in its details and so just in its representations that every reader would immediately recognize it to be the true history of what has been done in our own country during the exhibition of the domestic manufactured distresses, the performance of the artificial panics, and the enactment of the bloodless and sabbathless revolutions with which the public sensibilities have been so much excited of late. This piece of history is found in Vertot's History of the Portuguese conspiracy in the year 1640, by which the Spanish dominion in Portugal was overturned, and John, Duke of Braganza, was restored to the throne of his ancestors. The politicians and merchants were in the conspiracy—there were no banks in those times; but politicians and merchants were not sufficient to carry it on; they could not perform the manual labor of attacking the Spanish guards and garrisons. They wanted other hands for the manual labor part, while they confined themselves to the headwork part of the revolution. To obtain these operatives the merchants of Lisbon fell upon a plan which you shall have in the historian's own words: I say in his own words; for, while the Senator from Massachusetts was speaking, and bringing this piece of history to my mind, I dispatched one of our little messengers with a note to Mrs. Benton, to send me the book, "L'histoire de la conjuration de Portugal;" and here it is; and now the historian shall speak for himself. I read in French first, and then in English, that those who understand both languages may know that the translation is just. At page 332 he says:

"Ils avaient même congédié plusieurs de leurs ouvriers, principalement les plus mutins, sous prétexte que le commerce étant ruiné, ils ne pouvaient plus les entretenir; mais en effet afin que la misère et la faim les portât plus aisément

“à se soulever; et cependant ils les assistaient de temps en temps, afin de les avoir toujours à leur dévotion.”

“They [the merchants] had even discharged, on purpose, many of their laborers, principally the most malicious, under the pretext that commerce being ruined, (by the tyranny of the Spanish Government,) they could no longer employ them; but in fact to the end that misery and famine might carry them more easily to insurrection; assisting them from time to time to retain them in devotion to themselves.”

This (continued Mr. B.) is the true history of our panics and home-made distress, and wants nothing but a change of names to be written of the United States during the scenes of which the Senator from Massachusetts has so unexpectedly revived the memory. For Lisbon, read any or all of our large cities; for the year 1640, read 1833-’34; for the Spanish Government, read Jackson’s administration; and the history of our own great panic bloodless revolution is complete. The body of the working people of Lisbon could not be trusted with the secret of the conspiracy; still it was indispensable to have their services. Starvation could drive them to revolt; by charging this starvation to the tyranny of the Spaniards, they could be excited against the Spaniards; and, by a hypocritical distribution of alms to those whom they had deprived of bread, they could make the victims of their policy the instruments of their conspiracy. All this, even down to the crocodile distribution of alms, was done in our own cities; done against General Jackson, and to excite a deceived, outraged, and wronged population against him. It was not quite so successful in our cities as in Lisbon; but the virtue and morality of the conduct was the same in both countries, and history will record them in the same language. Yes, sir, history will record that the working people, discharged from their employments during our panics, under the pretext that commerce was ruined, were, in fact, discharged from political motives, and to make them instruments in a conspiracy against the Jackson administration, with the secret of which they could not be trusted.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) these are disagreeable reminiscences; but they are forced upon us; and when forced upon us we must answer; and it must be in the style which truth and justice demands. Truth and justice, then, demands of me to denounce the fictitious distresses which have been made in this country during the administration of General Jackson as sheer imposition, so far as the Bank of the United States, and politicians were concerned, and as sheer delusion, so far as masses of the people were concerned. They were as much imposition and delusion as the discharge and insurrection of the workmen were in Lisbon in 1640; they were as much imposition and delusion as the famous witchcraft hallucination of Massachusetts was in 1690. The pretexts of the banks, merchants, and politicians, for stopping business, dismissing laborers, and making distress and panic, were just as preposterous as were the pretexts of the bewitched imposters in New England one hundred and fifty years ago. Our panic and distress-makers of the nineteenth century attributed the ruin of all business to the removal of the deposits, and to the specie circular; the bewitched subjects of 1690 attributed their calamity to the looks of the witches; and, in both cases, one pretext was just as true as the other; and a trial in one case would stand for a fac simile of a trial in the other. Here is a history of one of these trials, had before the Honorable Thomas Danforth, Deputy Governor of Massachusetts, at Salem, the 11th of April, 1692. It runs thus:

“Deputy Governor.—John, who hurt you?”

“Answer.—Goody Cloyse hurt me.

“Deputy Governor.—How did she hurt you?”

“Answer.—She looked at me.”

And thereupon (says the historian) Hutchinson, the aforesaid John, fell down, kicked, uttered horrible cries, and began to vomit crooked pins: whereupon Goody Cloyse said to him, “Oh, thou art a grievous liar.” I quote no more of the trial, (said Mr. B.) but say that Goody Cloyse was right in what she said to John, and is so admitted to have been by all New England now, though disbelieved and punished at the time. Goody Cloyse was right; and a history of her trial, with a mere change of names, dates, and places, substituting President Jackson for Goody Cloyse, and the Bank of the United States and its confederates for John, will serve for the future history of the panic scenes of General Jackson’s administration.

Mr. President, I hope that this is the last time, for the present session at least, that any attack will be made upon General Jackson on this floor. He has retired from public life; he is reposing under his own vine and fig tree; he is now in no man’s way; he can be an object of fear to none, and should not be an object of hate to any. He has rendered service to his country, and certainly is entitled to peace in the closing moments of his life. I do hope there will be no more attacks; I do hope there will be a truce to this war upon a retired man; but if we are mistaken, if attacks must be continued, gentlemen must rest assured that defense will follow.

I now return to the appropriate subject of debate, and shall reply with all possible brevity and precision to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis.] That argument rests upon two grounds: 1. Protection to the salt manufacture, for which purpose he insists the duty, if not laid, was at least continued; 2. Encouragement to the fisheries as a nursery for seamen, for which purpose, he contends the fishing bounties and allowances were granted. I deny both these positions, and shall state my reasons, in addition to the reasons given in my opening speech, for believing them to be unfounded.

I. As to the protection to the salt manufacture.

The first answer to this argument is, that the act now in force for this salt duty, is the act of 1813, an act notoriously and professedly passed for revenue alone, and that limited to the war with Great Britain, and to one year thereafter. This extinguishes the idea of protection in the original laying of the duty. But the act was continued after the war! Certainly it was, and continued, with all the rest of the war duties, for the express purpose of paying the war debt! The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] says the act was made perpetual. This is a great error. The act was continued, generally, as the other revenue acts were, without saying for what time, but for the known purpose of paying the war debt; and as for perpetuity, so far from being perpetual, the one half the duty was taken off ten years ago, and the remainder is now in a course of reduction to a point entirely and avowedly below the protection limit. This is one answer to this argument. Another is, that the compromise act, as it is called, provides for the reduction of the salt duty to twenty per cent. on the value. This explodes protection; so that, so far as the argument is concerned, the law has already passed which annuls it. Protection to the salt manufacture has already ceased by law; and the passage of the bill which I propose to bring in, cannot annihilate the protection to the salt manufacture more effectually than now done.

Then why continue this duty, reduced as it now is to six cents per bushel, and as it soon will be to twenty per cent. on the value? Why continue it? As a protective duty it is nothing; for it will sink below the protecting point. As a revenue duty it will be contemptible; for the revenue derived from it will be too inconsiderable to merit a thought. Its continuance will be nugatory for protection and for revenue, and will only be effective for oppression on the country—for fostering regraters and monopolizers—for creating an intermediate set of salt dealers in the sea-port towns; standing between the importer and the retailer—between the ship which imports the salt and the steamboat, or wagon, which carries it into the country; and which intermediate set of dealers will monopolize the article, double or quadruple the price, and make common cause with the monopolizers in the interior of the country in stinting the supply, increasing the price, subjecting the country to their impositions, and practicing all the arts for extorting money by a monopoly of a necessary of life with which the people have been so long acquainted.

Then why continue the duty? And the answer to this question brings us to the second argument on which the Senator from Massachusetts relied; namely, the allowances to the fisheries. I say these allowances rest on the salt duty; that they are too large to be willingly parted with; that the abolition of the duty is resisted because it must carry with it an abolition of these bounties and allowances; he, on the contrary, maintains that the fishing allowances are for the encouragement and rearing of mariners. I come, then, to this second point.

II. Encouragement to the fisheries as a nursery for seamen.

I deny this position out and out; and without going over the forty years’ history of our legislation on this subject, with which I occupied the time of the Senate some days ago, I limit myself to some practical, and, I believe, pointed observations, growing out of that history, and which will fully show the fallacy of this pretension.

1. The very first idea, Mr. President, which presents itself in a scheme for raising up mariners for national purposes is, that the scheme must embrace the features of fixed legislation and permanent duration. There must be a system of legislation, and not occasional laws; there must be a permanency of continuance, and not limited and contingent duration. Now, how stands these fishing bounties, tried upon this test? Lost, overthrown, exploded by it! All the acts which grant them are of the limited, occasional, and contingent kind. The first one, of 1789, was to continue only seven years; it was to expire in June, 1796. The second one continued them three years, to wit: until June, 1799; the third one continued them ten years, to wit, until 1809; and that one was not allowed to live its time out; it was repealed in March, 1807. Some of these limited acts, Mr. President, were enacted while the friends of a navy were in power; when the elder Mr. Adams was President, and when a naval force was the policy of the Government; yet they made no attempt to give permanency or perpetuity to these allowances; and the main act, that for continuing them ten years, barely got through the House of Representatives, with that House composed of a large majority of Federal gentlemen devoted to the creation of a navy and to the extension of our commerce; it passed by a majority of six votes, which was only a difference of three men! So much for the earlier acts. The later ones, and those now in force: That of 1813 was limited to the war, and to one year thereafter; and during this time there was no way for our fisheries to go on except by the permission of the British; the continuance of the act in 1816 was for no fixed time, and was known to be for a coming and contingent event, to wit: the payment of the war debt.

2. The next remark which I will make is, that if encouragement to seamen was the object in nurturing these fisheries, then that branch of this business which did most towards creating mariners should have had the best part of the allowance. This is clear reason; yet how stands the fact? Why, the fact is, that the great branch of the fisheries get nothing; the small branch gets the whole! The five-hundred-ton whale-ship, with her numerous crew, doubling Cape Horn, sailing twenty thousand miles before she reaches her field of action, remaining out three years, and encountering the perils of a naval combat in her conflict with the mighty monsters of the deep—this vast and real nursery of mariners and combatants gets nothing, while the five-ton boat of the angler, with its hooks and lines and a few men, out three or four months, and hugging the coasts, or getting no further than the banks of Newfoundland, and drawing up cod and mackerel, gets its full share of the allowance. This brings ridicule upon our legislation, if the creation of mariners was the object; but this is not the case; our legislation is not ridiculous; it is the argument only of the Senator from Massachusetts which would make it appear so.

3. I merely name another omnipotent answer heretofore given to this pretension; namely, that by all the acts previous to the late war, the exporters of beef and pork were put upon the same footing with the fishing vessels and the fishermen; so that, if mariners were to be nurtured among the fishermen, they were also to be nurtured among graziers and herdsmen.

4. I barely remind the Senate, Mr. President, that when the allowance was changed from the exporter of the fish to the fishing vessel, it was done at the request of the fishermen, as a better means of securing the allowance to him who earned it; and that, to prevent the possibility of a misconstruction, the act making the change expressly declared the allowance on the tonnage of the vessel to be in commutation of, and an equivalent for, the bounty in lieu of the drawback on salt.

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

5. I barely remind the Senate also, that in the main act of 1799, which raised the salt tax thirty-three and a third per cent. and at the same time raising the fishing allowances thirty-three and a third per cent. the act expressly declared that this additional allowance to the fishing vessels should only continue so long as the additional duty on salt was continued, on account of which the additional allowance was paid.

6. I also repeat, Mr. President, that to receive this allowance every vessel was required to catch, or to prove it had caught, and to export, or prove it had exported, a quantity of fish the duty on the salt used in curing which was intended to be about equal to the allowance granted.

7. The Senator from Massachusetts has laid out his main strength in arguing from phrases and detached passages in different acts, especially those parts which relate to the division of the allowance among the fishermen, the size of the vessel, the four months she was to remain at sea, the later additional allowances without an increase of the salt duty, &c. All this would amount to nothing, even if the passages would bear the construction which he would give to them. We know that these details, being considered local and sectional, would be left to the members from the section interested; that the increases in the allowances, without corresponding increases in the salt duty, would readily pass without being observed by that part of our members who come under the English classification of "country members;" and that in all the acts there are controlling clauses which fasten and tie down the allowance to the salt duty. Of this character are numerous clauses in the different acts; but for my present purpose it is sufficient to show one—the one which is in the act which is now in force—and which was put there on the motion of the wisest, purest, most sagacious and best of men—by Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina.

The third section to the act now in force contains this enactment:

"No bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be made under the authority of this act, unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the collector that the pickled fish for which the bounty, drawback, or allowance shall be claimed, was wholly cured with foreign salt, and on which a duty shall have been secured or paid."

When I saw this cardinal section, (said Mr. B.) I was struck with the ease with which it cut off all unfounded pretensions to these allowances as bounties for the creation of mariners; I looked into the Journals of 1813 to see who it was that had moved that omnipotent little section; I found it to be the venerable patriot and sage who has been named; and now I conclude, and rest my argument upon the plain and simple enactment of which he was the author.

IN SENATE, January 29, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate on the bill. Having concluded,

Mr. BENTON rose and said, that he did not rise to reply to that gentleman—that he agreed with him in so many things which he had said, that he was pretty well satisfied with his speech—and that his object in rising was to continue his reply to the Senator from Massachusetts; [Mr. Davis,] and to bring into the debate some fresh matter which he had discovered in the course of the last night, and which would not only bear directly upon the issue joined with that Senator, but would place him (Mr. B.) on New England ground—on Massachusetts ground, especially—in opposing the continuance of the salt duties and fishing bounties and allowances.

The law now in force, (continued Mr. B.) and by virtue of which this duty exists, and these allowances are paid, is, as it has often been shown in this debate, the act of June, 1813, passed in the second year of the war with Great Britain. I have had the curiosity to examine into the history of that act, and have found that, in the first place, it was simply a revenue measure, brought in with a long list of revenue bills; that it contained nothing as brought in but the duty on the salt, the fishing bounties and allowances being added afterward; and that in every stage of the bill, and in every form it could assume, the New England delegation, headed by Massachusetts, were its most determined and thorough-going opponents. Now, granting that these gentlemen voted upon the general motive of leaving the Government without revenue to carry on the war with Great Britain, yet it is impossible to suppose that they looked upon that act in the light now presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, without looking upon them not merely as enemies to Mr. Madison's administration, but also as enemies to a Massachusetts manufacture—enemies to commerce—enemies to a navy—enemies to their own fishermen!

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] represents this salt duty and these fishing bounties as a protective duty to encourage the manufacture of salt, and as a national bounty for the creation of mariners for our commercial and military marine; and he has dwelt with great feeling on the injury to the manufacturer of salt, the injury to our commerce, the injury to our ships of war, and, above all, on the injury to the fishermen themselves, if this duty and these allowances should be discontinued. But in all this he must be mistaken, or the New England gentlemen who were in Congress during the war, must have been not only enemies, but gratuitous enemies, to all these interests. I say gratuitous enemies; for the amount of income which could be derived from the salt duty during the war was next to nothing! Foreign trade was suspended; and little or no revenue could be derived, or was derived, from that source. As crippling the Government, then, in its conflict with Great Britain, the withholding of this salt revenue was nothing; while to the manufacturers of salt, the commerce, the navy, and the fishing interest, the bill was, according to the views now taken of it, of the most momentous and vital importance—a real life and death measure! It is impossible to conceive that the New England delegation of that day, though inimical to the Administration, could have been so inimical to it as, for the sake of withholding the insignificant amount of the salt tax, could have been willing to inflict upon salt manufacturers, upon commerce, upon the navy, and upon the fishermen themselves, the misfortune of losing all the benefits with which this act of 1813 is now alleged to be fraught. The Senator from Massachusetts must be mistaken; and I will now proceed to trace the history of this act, and to show him that I now stand, in relation to this bill, on the ground on which all New England stood, with the exception of a few Republicans, at the time the act was passed.

This act, sir, made its first appearance in the House of Representatives on the 10th day of June, 1813. It was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by Mr. Eppes, in company with nine other bills, to raise revenue for the support of the war; and it was, as introduced by him, merely a bill to lay a duty of twenty cents a bushel on salt. The bounties and allowances were not in it, either to beef and pork or to fishing vessels; and this omission was upon the obvious ground, that there could be no foreign trade during the continuance of the act, and, therefore, there could be no drawback of the salt duties, or any bounties and allowances in lieu of drawback. On being brought in, the bill went into the Committee of the Whole, in which state no journal is kept of the yeas and nays; but on being reported from the committee to the House, questions are taken on all the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and on these questions the yeas and nays are taken, and the vote of every member is shown and preserved. I take up the history of the bill at the commencement of the proceedings upon it in the House, and proceed to show that the whole of the New England members present, with the exception of a few Republicans, headed by Massachusetts, opposed the bill in every shape, and would have prevented it from ever becoming a law if they could. This will be shown by a rapid review of the motions made, the questions taken, and the votes upon them.

The bill was taken up on the 13th of July, and the first motion was on the part of Governor

Wright, of Maryland, to postpone it indefinitely; and on that motion the vote stood 55 yeas, 88 nays. The yeas were Messrs.—

Having read the list of yeas, Mr. B. went on to say, that the gentlemen whose names made up the fifty-five who were in favor of indefinite postponement were, first, the whole body of the New England delegation, with the exception of a few Republicans; secondly, the Federal gentlemen from other States who were opposed to the Administration; and, thirdly, a few unyielding Republicans, headed by Mr. Macon, who could not be brought to vote for a salt tax on any consideration, and who knew, besides, that putting on and taking off taxes was like Virgil's description of a visit to hell—easy to go down, hard to come back—the tax easy put on, hard to be got off, as the event has proved in this case. These made up the fifty-five who voted for the indefinite postponement of the bill, and who stood together on every subsequent vote against it.

The next vote was to defer the commencement of the operation of the act for about six months—to the 1st day of January, 1814. Fifty-seven members voted for this delay; being the same, with the addition of two more, who voted for indefinite postponement.

The third vote, to delay or defeat the bill, was on the motion of Mr. Macon to postpone the consideration of it until the 1st day of November ensuing; that is to say, to a day beyond the end of the session. On this question the vote in favor of the postponement was 51; being the same as before, with the exception of a few absent.

The fourth vote was on the motion of Mr. Yancey, of North Carolina, to reduce the duty from twenty to twelve and a half cents per bushel. On this the vote in favor of reduction was 69, beginning with Mr. Baylies, of Massachusetts, as usual, going on to include the phalanx of 55, and gaining as many more from the Republicans as made up 69.

The fifth vote was on the motion of Mr. Wright, of Maryland, to reduce the duty from twenty to fourteen cents per bushel. On this vote the yeas were 55; consisting mainly of the same 55 who regularly mustered against the bill.

The sixth attempt to defeat the bill was on the motion of Mr. Murfree, of North Carolina, to postpone the consideration of it until the 1st day of December ensuing; that is to say, to a day beyond the period of the session. On this question the vote stood—62 yeas to 87 nays; the 62 including the original and standing 55.

The seventh main vote was on the passage of the bill; and the yeas stood fifty-five to yeas ninety. These fifty-five were the same who had voted against the bill, from the beginning to the ending; Massachusetts furnishing a larger number of the fifty-five than any State in the Union, and every New England State backing her with the majority of its votes.

Having gone over the history of the enactment of the bill, Mr. B. said he felt that he had made good his declaration, that he stood on New England ground, and especially on Massachusetts ground, in showing a determined hostility to this act. It is certain that Massachusetts, and all New England, except a few Republicans, opposed the act, at its passage, in the most determined manner. Granting that a part of this opposition was to deprive the Government of revenue, yet it is impossible to suppose that the delegation of New England would have so acted, if the protection of the salt manufacture, and the encouragement of the fisheries as a nursery of seamen, had been any part of the object of the bill? It is certain that these objects were no part of the intention of the bill, and is equally certain, therefore, that the Senator from Massachusetts is now wholly mistaken in attributing such intentions to it.

But the delegation of New England, in the greater part, and Massachusetts especially, is now in favor of the act which they so much opposed at the time of its enactment! It is certain they are for it now! and the question is, to account for this change. That is easily done. The salt duty and its appendages was no source of profit—was not a money-making business—at the time of the enactment of the bill; it is now a source of profit—it is now a money-making business; and, therefore, the fishermen and their friends are unwilling to repeal the bill, the enactment of which they so much resisted at its passage. Great abuses have grown up in this business, some of which have been detected, some of which are now apparent, others of which are pretty well known to exist, although the proof is not on the record; and thus an allowance which was intended in 1813, to be nothing but the refunding of a tax, is now at least seven or eight times as much as the tax itself, even supposing it to be paid. A late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ingham, during the short time of his administration of the Treasury Department, detected above $30,000 of illegal payments to these fisheries, which he reported to Congress. Some salt manufacturers in Massachusetts, in their report to the Secretary of the Treasury a few years ago, reported that their salt was used in the fisheries! and from the gross amount of the allowance, and the quantity of fish exported, it is impossible that the quantity of salt has been exported upon the fish which the large amount of the allowance supposes.

But there is one point of view in which we have data to make an accurate calculation of the amount unduly received by the fisheries at this time: it is by comparing the amount which was formerly paid, with what is now paid, and comparing these amounts with the duty on salt at the respective periods of comparison. Thus, by the act of 1792, when the salt duty was twelve cents per bushel, and when the bounty in lieu of drawback on exported fish was shifted from the exporter to the fishing vessel, the allowance was fixed at $1 per ton for vessels from five to twenty tons; $1 50 per ton on vessels from twenty to thirty tons, and at $2 50 per ton on vessels above thirty tons, with a limitation of the maximum allowance to any one vessel of more than $170. This was the allowance in 1792, when the duty on salt was twelve cents a bushel. But now, when the duty is but six cents a bushel, these same allowances are respectively swelled up into two or three times their original amount; the $1 a ton on small vessels is raised to $3 50; the $1 50 and $2 50 on larger vessels are raised to $4 a ton, and the $170 maximum allowance is augmented to $360. Reduced to their proper amounts, these allowances would be the one half of what they were in 1792; that is to say, fifty cents per ton for vessels from five to twenty tons; seventy-five cents per ton to vessels between twenty and thirty tons, and $1 25 per ton on all vessels above thirty tons, with a limitation of the maximum allowance in favor of any one vessel to $85. At these rates, the allowances would now be about forty or fifty thousand dollars instead of about $250,000. This is an abuse—a great and palpable abuse—by which the Treasury loses near $200,000 per annum, and the fishermen gain that much more than they have a fair right to receive. And in this lies the secret of the change which has taken place; a change which makes the friends of the fishermen, formerly the enemies, now the friends of the salt tax! The Treasury has paid, in the whole, upwards of $6,000,000 to the fisheries under the idea of refunding a salt tax, a large part of which has been unduly paid. It is now paying about $250,000 per annum, four fifths of which are unduly paid. Surely it is time to stop these abuses; and the abolition—total abolition—of the salt duty, is the way to stop them.

While a vestige of that duty remains, the allowances and the abuses will continue.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] speaks of the increase of foreign seamen in our service, and from that circumstance draws an argument in favor of the encouragement to our own mariners to be derived from these fishing bounties. Why, sir, does he not know that these allowances go to foreigners as well as to citizens? That, previous to 1817, the whole allowance might have gone to foreigners, and that it is only since that time that this allowance is limited to one fourth foreigners? The previous acts made no difference in the national character of the fishermen to whom the allowance was paid; it might all have gone to foreigners; the act of 1817, after we had had a war upon the subject of impressment of seamen, was the first that introduced the distinction between aliens and citizens; and that act only went the length of requiring three fourths of the fishing crew to which the allowance was paid to be citizens of the United States.

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I thank the gentleman for mentioning his subject of foreign seamen; it reminded me of a main argument which I had omitted against this position, that these allowances were granted to foster a nursery of American seamen. What more conclusive against that position than that these allowances might have gone, by law, in toto, to foreigners, up to the year 1817? and that since that time one fourth of their amount may still go to them. Yes, sir, $60,000 per annum—the one fourth of $250,000—may now, by law, be paid to foreigners in our fisheries, and, no doubt, is actually paid to them, for they are obtained cheaper than our own citizens. But it is sufficient for the argument that it may be paid to them. That shows that it is no part of the policy of the act to foster American seamen. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for pronouncing that word foreigner; it reminds me of my best argument. And now, granting the fact that there is a great increase of foreigners in our commercial and naval marine—that we are employing seamen from foreign climes, who cannot even speak our language; grant all this, and what is it but the counterpart—the parallelism—to our late importation of wheat from the Bosphorus and the Vistula? What is it but the same thing in another form of our late importation from Europe, of hay, oats, butter, eggs, beef, pork, bacon, lard, tallow, barley, rye, and other necessities of life? What is it all but the effect of our paper system—the effect of our nine hundred banks, which are to be one thousand before this year is out, all issuing currency, and all going on swelling and expanding, and raising the price of all articles until they reach the bursting point? Our paper system has brought these foreign mariners into our service by giving them so much higher wages than they can get at home. It has brought, also, the foreign ships, which now get so large a share of our carrying trade; it has put up the wages of the mariners to the high rates which the Senator from Massachusetts mentions; and high as those rates are, he may expect to see them higher before they are lower, for the cause which raises prices is now in full and growing force; the paper balloon is now rising and distending. It will continue rising and distending until it bursts again, and with its ascent and distension will go up the prices of all articles—mariners' wages and ship freights inclusive.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] speaks of the depressed state of the fisheries—their small product—the little profit attending them, &c., and on this account claims a continuance of the allowances. I deny that these considerations, admitting them to be well founded in point of fact, could have any weight in the decision of this question. It is an argument which may be used, at times, in favor of every possible trade, pursuit, or occupation. It may be used, at times, in favor of any branch of agriculture, manufactures, navigation, or commerce; and if Congress is to help out any one branch of business with bounties when it is in a depressed and unprofitable state, it may prepare itself to help out all, and, in the end to become the insurer of all undertakings and the indemnifier of all losses. But, sir, are the fisheries in this depressed state? are they really at the low ebb, and profitless point, at which the Senator from Massachusetts would present them? Is this their actual condition? Let facts answer; and above all, let the Massachusetts General Assembly answer. Look to the report on the manufactures of that State for the year ending the 31st of March, 1837, just published by order of the Legislature, and by which the product of the fisheries alone for that State, refined whale oil included, is returned at near $10,000,000!—to be precise, $9,822,611. Why, sir, this is near double the amount of the whole export of tobacco from the entire United States! It is nearly four times the amount of the whole exported rice crop of the South! It is more than the total export of beef, pork, bacon, lard, hides, tallow, live-stock, flour, corn, cornmeal, all put together, from all parts of the United States, amounted to for the same year! No, Mr. President, the fisheries are doing very well, and there is another way to prove it. Compare, for example, the number of persons employed in the business, with the product of their labor, and see how the account will stand. Looking, then, to that same report from the Massachusetts Legislature, I see that the number of persons engaged in her fisheries, refining whale oil inclusive, is two thousand one hundred and seventy. Now divide the proceeds of the fisheries among this number, and it is close upon $500 a year to each person engaged in the business! the fishing year, except for whales, being three months and a half! Five hundred dollars for three and a half months, and that without counting the allowance which they get from the Government. This is one view to prove the prosperous state of these fisheries, and a very conclusive one it is; but it is not the only view to that effect, nor even the most conclusive one. Another view results from a comparison of the capital invested in the business, and the annual amount of its product, the year for the cod and mackerel fishing being three and a half months. This capital, for Massachusetts, as seen in the report which I have mentioned, amounts to no more than $13,617,578; so that the product of the business for the season is only about one third below the amount of the capital invested. It is actually near sixty-six and two third per cent. on the amount of the capital employed. No; these fisheries are not at a low ebb; nor is their state dependent upon the bounties and premiums from the Government. Though a large amount to issue from the Treasury, they are but a small item in the value of the fisheries. This value in Massachusetts alone amounts to about $10,000,000 per annum. I do not know the product of the other New England States; but I do know that they all have a protection and encouragement, under our laws, such as no other branch of industry receives, and compared to which the bounties and allowances are nothing. They have a monopoly of the home market, and a good share in the foreign market. They have the exclusive supply of our own sixteen millions of people with the produce of the fisheries, and they export largely besides. This I proved a few days ago, when I showed, from the tables of imports and exports of these articles, that the import of fish, formerly large, is now reduced to nothing; the export, formerly inconsiderable, is now large. All this was proved, and this is the real encouragement and protection to the fisheries; this monopoly of the home supply, and this share in the foreign trade; this it is that puts up the product of the business to $500 a hand for three months and half. And now what other branch of industry has the same protection, or the same profit? What other branch of business has the monopoly of the market of the whole Union? Has any one? No, not one! Not even bread; for we buy bread often from abroad. Our farmers are often deprived of our own flour market, by importations of wheat from the Vistula and Black sea; and yet they have no bounties and allowances. They have no drawbacks of duties paid. They have not even salt free of tax!

Several Senators object to taking up the subject singly; they object to proceeding on the salt duty alone; and they demand, why not join other articles with it, or wait for a general adjustment of the end of the so called compromise in 1842. I will give these Senators my reasons for proceeding separately on this article, and I will give them a dozen different reasons, either of which will be sufficient to justify my proceedings: 1. Salt is now, at this moment, an article of monopoly and extortion in the West. As high as two, three, or four dollars have been extorted for it for the nominal bushel of fifty pounds. The works at Kenhawa are notoriously a monopoly from which the double curse of a stinted supply and an increased price is inflicted upon the country. 2. This salt duty is the pretext for keeping up an annual drain from the Treasury of about $250,000 for the fishing bounties and allowances; three fourths of which is now proved to be unduly paid. 3. Salt is an article of universal and prime necessity, standing next to bread, and without which bread itself cannot be well made, and therefore ought to be free of duty. 4. This bill applies to alum salt, that is to say, sun-made salt, which is indispensable in the provision trade of the United States, which is not made at home. 5. The free use of salt is necessary to the great stock-raising and provision-curing region of the West. 6. A salt tax is fundamentally wrong in itself, and contrary to the first principles of political economy, and is so admitted now to be in England, where the duty on foreign salt is totally abolished. 7. The duty on salt does infinitely more mischief to the community than it brings revenue to the Treasury. 8. This duty fosters regraters in the sea-ports, and monopolizers in the interior. 9. It is already too low to answer the purpose either of a protecting duty, or of revenue; it answers no purpose but to keep up the fishing allowances, and to foster the extortions of monopolizers. 10. It is a duty which has always been laid on, and taken off separately. It was abolished by a separate act in Mr. Jefferson's time. It was renewed by a separate bill at the commencement of the war; it was continued by a separate bill at the end of the war. 11. It was a war tax, brought in with nine other taxes to support the war, the whole of which have long since ceased, except this single one, which ought to have been the first to cease. 12. The whole product of the salt works are but about six millions of bushels, after fifty years of encouragement; a quantity which is barely sufficient to salt the sheep of the United States as sheep are salted in England; and of a quality to unfit it for the great purposes of curing provisions. 13. We are obliged to obtain all the good salt from abroad, and, therefore it is tyranny to tax it. 14. The war argument has no force. We have had but three years' foreign war in near sixty years; and there is no wisdom in taxing ourselves during our long seasons of peace by keeping up a duty on foreign salt, under the delusive idea of getting a home supply in time of war. These, sir, are reasons, for proceeding separately upon the article of salt; and as for the compromise, so called, I answer, first, its obligatory force has been denied by a vote of this Senate, on the bill, two sessions ago, to reduce duties on many articles, of which salt was one; secondly, that that act was defective in not providing for a reduction of the fishing allowances in the same degree in which the salt duty should be reduced.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

Having now finished his reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Davis,] on the issue joined between them, Mr. B. would next give some attention to another branch of the subject, namely, the importance to AGRICULTURE and to MANUFACTURES in having a total repeal of the salt duties, and a free use of that article. On this head he would avail himself of the celebrated papers on the salt duties printed by order of the British House of Commons, and would read from the volume which contained them. Mr. B. then read:

1. From Sir JOHN SINCLAIR'S Evidence.—Extract.

"I was once at the farm of a great farmer in the Netherlands, a Mr. Messelman, at Chienoi, near Wavre, where I was surprised to see an immense heap of Cheshire rock salt, which he said he found of the greatest use for his stock. He said, first, that, by allowing his sheep to lick it, the rot was effectually prevented; secondly, that his cattle, to whom he gave lumps of it to lick, were thereby protected from infectious disorders; and the cows being thus rendered more healthy, and being induced to take a greater quantity of liquid, gave more milk. And I saw lumps of this salt to which the cows had access in the place where they were kept. He also said, that a small quantity powdered was found very beneficial to the horses when new oats were given them, if the oats were at all moist." "He gave them great lumps, that they (the cattle) might lick when they chose." "One of the most important uses of salt, as connected with agriculture, is, that it preserves seed, when sown, from the attacks of the grub." "In a communication to me from Sweden, by Baron Schultz, he says, the salt destroys the different sorts of worms found in the bodies of sheep, but in particular the liver worm."

2. ARTHUR YOUNG'S Testimony.—Extract.

"Did you ever try salt in the feeding of your cattle?" "Yes; but chiefly with sheep; and I found the sheep astonishingly fond of it."

"Do you think that it would be beneficial in preventing the rot in sheep?"

"I found it so in the years when my neighbors' sheep were generally affected with the rot: my sheep escaped, and my land was quite as wet as my neighbors'."

"Do you think, considering the advantages in health, fattening, and the power of using inferior food in the feeding of cattle and stock in general, and the free use of salt, would be an advantage equivalent to seven shillings a head to the farmer?"

"I should think it would be worth a great deal more. I think it is invaluable. In short, let my answer be what it would, it would be under the mark."

Dr. Young then gave his opinion that the stock in England would be increased in value above three millions sterling, nearly fifteen millions of dollars, by the free use of salt. He estimated the stock in England to be—

Horses.....	1,500,000 head.
Cattle.....	4,500,000 do.
Sheep.....	30,000,000 do.

3. Testimony of WILLIAM GLOVER, superintendent of the cattle of the Hon. Mr. Curwen, M. P.—Extract.

"This deponent began to give salt to the cattle under his care 19th November, 1817, and from that time till now the cattle have had salt, as follows: 40 milch cows and breeding heifers, each 4 ounces per day; 30 oxen, 4 ounces each per day; 27 young cattle, each 2 ounces per day; 26 calves, 1 ounce each per day; 48 horses, each 4 ounces per day; 444 sheep, 2 ounces each per week. The advantage of salt for sheep appears to this deponent to be great; as he says none of the stock have died in the sickness since they commenced giving salt; and they have had none in the rot; in other years they lost some of the ewes and wethers in the sickness. And this deponent says that he has now kept the cattle at Schoose farm ten years, and they were never so long without sickness."

4. The Affidavit of thirty-two Farmers.

"We, the undersigned, being farmers, and the owners of land in the neighborhood of Workington, do hereby certify, that we are acquainted with and witnesses to the fact, of Mr. Curwen giving salt to his cattle and horses, with their food, at the Schoose farm and at Workington; and that we are desirous of using the same for our live-stock if we could obtain it without difficulty, and at a cheap rate."

5. Testimony of Mr. CURWEN, M. P.—Extract.

"In regard to cattle, I have underestimated the quantity; because if salt could be had at a moderate price, there is no animal I would give less than six stone (fourteen pounds to the stone) each per annum." "I believe if salt were in general use for cattle it would amount to 340,000 tons—about 14,000,000 of bushels."

"The importance of the free use of salt to AGRICULTURE can scarcely be estimated too highly. Salt contributes not only to the health of cattle and sheep, but accelerates and promotes the quantity of milk given by milch cows. [In another place Mr. C. says that the use of salt prevents the ill taste which the feeding on certain weeds and vegetables imparts to the milk.] It prevents the rot in sheep, and the effect of hooving, when stock are fed on turnips or clover."

"Salt renders damaged hay palatable and nutritious; and, if applied in difficult seasons, prevents an undue fermentation and heat in the stack. Chaff and straw would be rendered available to a much greater extent than at present by the application of salt. It would be a most valuable ingredient in the preparation of warm food for stalled cattle in the improved system of soiling; and, from my experience of its salutary effects, I should consider the free use of it as a condiment, the greatest boon the Government could bestow on the husbandman."

"I consider the advantage from salt, in feeding my stock, on a farm of 800 acres, worth about 1,000 pounds per annum, would exceed 300 pounds per annum [that is, add a third to the annual value of the farm.]

"The probable consumption of salt for sheep and cattle may be taken as follows, to wit:

Per Annum.	14 lbs. the stone.	Stones.
30,000,000 sheep.....	2 stone each.....	60,000,000
1,421,000 cows.....	6 do.....	8,526,000
2,000,000 young cattle.....	4 do.....	8,000,000
1,100,000 fattening beasts.....	6 do.....	6,600,000
1,200,000 draught cattle.....	4 do.....	4,800,000
300,000 colts and sad. horses.....	3 do.....	900,000

6. LORD KENYON'S Evidence before the Committee.—Extract.

"By the information which I have been able to collect, I am induced to consider salt, when sparingly applied, as an admirable manure, especially for fallows and arable land; and when mixed up with soil out of gutters, or refuse dirt or ashes, to be very valuable also on grass lands. My own experience convinces me that it is very powerful in destroying vegetation if laid on too thick, having put a large quantity of refuse salt on about one fourth of an acre of land, which, after two years, still remains quite bare. A land surveyor of high character in my neighborhood considers that the use of salt would be likely to be very valuable in destroying the slug, wire worm, snail, &c., which often destroy whole crops. He also remembers that salt was used largely in the neighborhood of the Higher and Lower Wiches in Cheshire, before the duties were raised to their present height. With respect to its value for cattle, horses, and sheep, I am informed that it is very highly thought of both as nutriment and as used medicinally, internally, and externally. Its value also is extremely well known for rendering bad and ill gotten hay more nourishing and more palatable to cattle than even good hay."

7. Evidence of Mr. KINOSTON.—Extract.

"In reply to your queries, as an agriculturist, I have no hesitation in saying that salt, if freed from duty, would become one of the most useful and general articles of manure that ever was thought of, if properly composed, by mixing it with mud of any kind, the cleanings of ditches and ponds, the surface of coarse ground thrown into heaps to rot, blubber, &c. I am also persuaded that if it could be afforded to be sprinkled on the layers of hay, when making into the rick, in catching weather, it would prevent its heating and getting moldy. I had once some small cattle tied up to fatten, which did not thrive, owing, as the balliff said, to the badness of the hay, of which they wasted more than they ate; but by sprinkling it with water in which some salt had been dissolved, they returned to eat greedily. I am free to say, a proper quantity of salt would prevent cattle from being hoven by an excess of green food."

8. Mr. THOMAS BOURNE'S Examination.—Extract.

"The committee understand you are a merchant, residing at Liverpool?"

"I am."

"Can you speak as to the probable effect of the repeal of the salt duties on your trade?"

"It would be a good thing, in my opinion, for the country at large, and also the manufacturers."

"Have you any knowledge of its being used in food for animals?"

"Yes, to horses in particular."

"Has it a good effect?"

"Yes."

"Then do you not suppose, if the restrictions were taken off, it would come into more general use among the farmers, for stock of all kinds?"

"It would in that instance. We used to have five horses in our rock-salt mine, and those horses always appeared in good condition, though very much worked."

"Were they liable to less disorders than those out of the mine?"

"Yes; much less."

"Do you happen to know whether they were in the practice at that time of receiving salt with their food?"

"Yes; to my knowledge they were."

"In what quantity?"

"About a handful to a quartern of oats."

9. Evidence of Mr. W. HORNE.—Extract.

"There are very few farmers who are not aware of the importance of salt in preserving hay, and restoring it when damaged. Many of those whom I have conversed with on the subject have used it for these purposes, and it would generally be resorted to to the extent of ten or fifteen pounds to the ton of hay, if the duties on salt were repealed. Lord Somerville has furnished most satisfactory information on this subject; and I know from respectable authority that it is a common practice in the United States of America to sprinkle salt upon hay when forming it into ricks. We also learn from Lord Somerville that Mr. Durke, of Brecon, one of the most celebrated graziers in the kingdom, mixed salt with his flooded moldy hay, and that his Hereford oxen did better on it than others on the best hay he had; and he was convinced the hay had all its good effects from the salt."

"I have learnt from Mr. Sutton, of Eaton, in Cheshire, that he would give thirty tons (120 bushels of 56 lbs. each) of salt a year to his cattle, being fifty cows, if the duty were repealed."

"In many parts of the United States of America, salt is generally given to cattle."

"The excellent condition of the horses in the rock pits of Cheshire, may be added in favor of its benefit in fattening cattle, and keeping them in health. Many counted that they can attribute the longevity of their horses to the good effects of salt. Mr. Hadfield, of Liverpool, furnishes an instance in his horse, thirty years old. He constantly gave it rock salt to lick, placing it in his manger. Mr. Young has furnished us, in the annals of agriculture, with a most interesting and satisfactory statement (obtained from the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris) on the effect of salt in fattening cattle. From this report, it appears that to the UNLIMITED USE of salt was to be ascribed the circumstance of FOUR TIMES the number of sheep having been reared on a STERILE COMMON than would otherwise have subsisted on it; and that the wool of these flocks is not only the finest in the whole country, but bears the highest price of any in France. The fineness of the wool of the Spanish sheep is also attributed, in a great measure, to the free use of salt. It is not, therefore, I presume, an extraordinary position to say that by a proper use of common salt, the same quantity of forage might, on many occasions, be made to go twice as far as it could have done, in feeding animals, had the salt been withheld from them!"

10. Mr. CHARLES G. COTHILL examined.—Extracts.

"What is your profession?"

"A bacon and provision merchant, residing in Judd street, Brunswick square."

"What is the nature and amount of your business, and how far has it been affected by the salt duties?"

"About fifty years ago my father established a manufactory in Vine street, and expended £10,000 in adapting the premises for the curing of bacon and the salting of pork. Our annual returns were about £50,000. It is now diminished to less than £1,000 annually, in consequence, as I apprehend, of the very high duties on salt, as our trade has diminished progressively as those duties have increased."

Salt Duties—Mr. Benton.

SENATE.

"Do you not consider that the breed of hogs has also diminished, in consequence of this increase of duty on salt?"

"Very materially; and as a further proof of what I state, we had a very extensive trade of £200,000 a year in hogs; now not £10,000."

"What effect, in your opinion, would a great reduction of the salt duties produce in your business?"

"I conceive it would restore our trade. We should then be able to supply the West India markets, and other colonies, with salted pork, cheaper and better than any other country."

"What is the quantity of salt used upon 100 weight of pork, to make bacon?"

"In a manufactory of bacon, about 12 pounds; to cure a small quantity, about 17 or 18."

11. Testimony of Sir THOMAS BERNARD.—Extract.

"I ventured to suggest that a tax on salt was fundamentally wrong in principle, because it presses most on the class least able to bear the weight: because of its immoral tendency; and because it deprives the nation of benefits beyond measure greater than the whole produce of the impost. The salt duties are about a million and a half sterling per annum, (about seven millions of dollars.) The poor use most salt in proportion to their wealth; a cottager in the country ten to one in proportion to a nobleman in town. But the benefits of which the nation is deprived by the salt duties are not easily appreciated, or even numbered. In agriculture and rural economy alone, the loss in feeding cattle, sheep, and hogs, in restoring damaged provender, in manure, and in the effect on wages, may, without extravagance, be supposed to exceed the whole value of the tax. Equal, perhaps, would be the gain to our manufacturers of woolen, linen, glass, earthenware, soap, &c., &c., by the unrestrained use of muriate and carbonate of soda and muriatic acid, of which our salt mines and ocean afford supplies absolutely inexhaustible."

Mr. B. having read, or stated, these extracts to show the use of salt in agriculture, said there were many other witnesses examined, to prove that alum salt, which the English usually called bay salt, because it was made by solar evaporation, out of sea water in the Bay of Biscay, and other bays, was indispensable to the curing of provisions, for long keeping, or for exportation, other articles connected with agriculture, as cheese, butter, bacon, pickled beef and pickled pork; and that the English Government permitted alum salt, under the name of bay salt, to be imported both into England and Ireland duty free, for these purposes, even when the domestic manufacture of common salt in England far exceeded the home demand, and furnished millions of bushels for exportation. He also stated that the committee of the House of Commons had examined the first physicians of Great Britain to prove the effect of a deficiency of salt in the provisions of the poor on their health, and that these physicians uniformly testified that many diseases of the poor, and especially in children, were the effect of using vegetables not sufficiently salted, and fish and meat not sufficiently cured. He also stated that the committee had extended their examination to the use of salt in various manufactories, and had established, by proof, that a variety of useful manufactories required the abolition of the salt duty. On this point, he read extracts from the examination of Samuel Parkes, Esq., an eminent chemist of London, as follows:

12. Examination of SAMUEL PARKES.—Extract.

"What is your profession?"

"I am proprietor of the chemical works in Goswell street, London, and of other chemical works in Maiden Lane, Islington."

"Can you acquaint the committee what are the manufactures most affected by the salt laws?"

"The manufactures of mineral alkali, crystallized soda, muriatic acid, hard soap—distinguished from soft soap—Glauber salt, Epsom salt, magnesia, and sal-ammoniac, are all materially affected by the duty on salt; but as common salt, or one or other of the component parts of common salt, is made use of in the composition of a great variety of articles that are employed in our manufactures, it is difficult to answer that question with precision." * * * "Respecting soap, I have only to observe, that common salt is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of hard soap; for however plentifully potash may be produced, large quantities of common salt must be employed with it, or the soap will be only temporary hard; it will have no lasting consistency."

"Salt is employed largely in the preparation and manufacture of a great number of other articles that might be enumerated; and in a short time I have no doubt they would all be benefited by the reduction of the duty on salt."

"How does the price of salt affect the soap boilers?"

"As it affects all other trades in which salt is employed."

"State the way in which it affects them."

"The cheaper it is, the cheaper they will have it, if they buy it."

"Do you know any other (manufacturing) purposes for salt?"

"Yes; it is used in very large quantities by dyers, when it can be had cheap; and in a great variety of other ways."

"With respect to the salting of hides, I learn from further inquiry, that the butcher usually applies five pounds of salt to every ox or cow hide which he has occasion to lay by, or to send to the tanner at a distance."

"Crystallized soda (made of salt) is much used in washing. Four hundred tons are annually made at the Long Benton works only."

"You have stated that, during the last seventeen years, it has increased from one to four hundred tons?"

"Yes."

"This at the Long Benton works only?"

"Yes."

"Which is made from salt duty free?"

"Yes. They have an exclusive privilege."

When Mr. B. had read these extracts, he closed the book, and regretted that he could read no more without encroaching too much on the time of the Senate. He said the whole volume was replete with the most instructive information on the qualities of salt, the difference between that made by solar evaporation, and that made by boiling, and on its uses both in agriculture and manufactures. The living stock in England was believed to be advanced thirty-three and a third per cent. in value from the free use of salt; and for this purpose fire-made salt would answer sufficiently well. To fish, beef, bacon, pork, and butter, the sun-made salt was indispensable, and was admitted duty free by the English for these purposes, even while making a superfluity of common salt at home, and exporting to the United States. In manufactures, it was proved that there were nearly fifty varieties of manufactures in which salt was used either in its proper state, or in its chemical preparations of alkali, muriatic acid, oxy-muriatic acid, sal-ammoniac, or some other form. The extent of this demand for salt in manufactures might be judged of from a single example in England, that of hard soap. It was computed that the manufacture of hard soap alone in England required two thousand tons of mineral alkali per annum. This alkali is obtained by a chemical process, either from salt of from barilla or kelp. The barilla only yields seventeen per centum of alkali; and kelp only six per cent. The decomposition of salt itself is the cheapest mode of procuring the alkali; but to make it the cheapest mode, the salt must be duty free. From this single example it might be judged how much manufactures required the free use of salt. In England it was computed that manufactures alone were annually injured by the salt duty to a greater amount than the whole product of the tax; and accordingly, for the joint benefit of agriculture and manufactures, the salt duty was totally abolished in that country after the publication of the transcendent papers from which extracts have been read.

Mr. President, the small amount of this tax is an argument also used by gentlemen against its repeal. They say it is too small to be felt, and that after 1842 it will be still less. I admit it is too small to answer any of the purposes of a tax; that it is too small either for protection or revenue. It answers no purpose in either way, but it is large enough to do great mischief. First, it is large enough to keep up the fishing bounties and allowances; and while any part of it remains, that drain of a quarter of a million per annum will be kept up from the Treasury. Secondly, it is large enough to amount to nearly one hundred per cent. on Turk's Island salt, to about one hundred per cent. on Portuguese and Spanish salt, and to near one hundred and fifty per cent. on the salt from the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas. It is large enough to amount to an enormous tax upon the value of this salt, the only kind that will cure beef, pork, bacon, butter, either for long keeping or for southern markets. But they say it is to come down to twenty per cent. on the value; that the compromise act, as it is called, is to reduce it to twenty per cent. on the value. I answer, first, that this reduction is not to be attained for near four years; and when it is attained, it is not to remain at that point for one instant. This famous act, sir, expires upon its own limitation at the moment when the clock strikes twelve on the night of the 30th of June, 1842. It is an act which provides for carrying all duties down to twenty per centum by a given day, and which does not provide for keeping them there one moment after they get there! They may all be raised on the morning of the 1st of July, 1842, to any amount that the Congress pleases; and this any person may see who will take the trouble to read the last section of the act. It is then four years before the duty is to sink to twenty per centum on the value; and after it gets there, it is not to stay there a single moment; and so of all the duties reduced by that act. They are to go down to a certain point, but they are not to remain there! and thus this famous act becomes the sheerest piece of humbuggery which ever deluded and bomboozled the understandings of a rational people!

The obligatory character of that act, which assumed to be a sort of sub-constitution, controlling and silencing the actual Constitution for nine years, and now invoked to arrest our legislation, was scouted at the time; and among other declarations against it were a set of resolutions submitted by a Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] not now in his seat, one of which ran in these words:

"That no law ought to be passed on the subject of imposts containing any stipulation, express or implied, or giving any pledge or assurance, direct or indirect, which shall tend to restrain Congress from the full exercise, at all times hereafter, of all its constitutional powers, in giving reasonable protection to American industry, countervailing the policy of foreign nations, and maintaining the substantial independence of the United States."

This resolve, Mr. President, was offered on the 14th of February, 1833, while the compromise act, so called, was depending, and was expressly directed against that act. It contained the sentiments of many, besides the mover, and has since been sanctioned by a decided majority of the Senate in a solemn vote, and after full debate. It was in the passage, through this body, in the session of 1836-7, of the bill to reduce duties to the amount of three millions of dollars on a great variety of articles, of which salt was one, and which passed the Senate by a majority of 27 to 18, mauling all the invocations upon the sanctity of the so called compromise act. The yeas were: Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Wright.

This vote Mr. President, settles the question of the obligatory force of that sub-constitution, which was arranged by two Senators in secret, the knowledge of which, as it went on, was learnt in this body from the letter-writers—settled in secret meetings, from which a then Senator from New Jersey, (Governor Dickerson,) representing a large manufacturing interest, was excluded; in the formation of which, he told me that he was not consulted, and also told me that a Senator from Massachusetts, representing the largest manufacturing interest in the country, [Mr. WEBSTER,] told him that he was not consulted, and had no part in the making of the bill. For one, I then protested against the binding force of such legislation, concocted in secret by two members, brought into the Senate at the last moment, when all was cut and dry, and rushing it through under a groundless cry of dissolution of the Union. Such legislation had no sanctity for me, and the vote just read proves that it has no sanctity for the Senate. Then why invoke it now?

Sir, I devote myself to the extirpation of this salt tax, and its appurtenant abuses. I care not how long the tax may be reduced; I go for total abolition, and will stop at nothing short of that point. Twenty per centum would, of itself, add twenty dollars in the hundred to the cost of the article, which is something to a farmer; but it is not the nature of a duty to add nothing but its own amount to the cost of the article on which it is laid. It adds, also, to it the merchant's profit upon that duty, and all the expenses of wharfage, storage, warehousing, carting backwards and forwards, wastage, losses by bad debts or accidents; and, in case of some articles, of which salt is one, it creates an intermediate set of dealers in the sea-port towns, who get all the article in their own hands, and put up the price, in seasons of scarcity, to what they please. I hold 20 per centum to be nearly as bad as twenty cents on the bushel, and go for total abolition, and a free trade, in this prime necessity of life.

Sir, I totally object to the manner in which some Senators undertake to calculate the burden of this tax. They take the naked duty, add it to the lowest price of the salt, then make a division, and show that it comes to but so many cents a head on a population of sixteen millions of souls. This is a counting-house view of the question; it is the view of a young clerk, standing behind a counter, with a quill over his ear. It is not the view of a statesman; it is not the view which a Senator, charged with the duties of legislation, should ever take. He should look more at the nature than at the amount of the tax—more at its effects upon the community than at its tribute to the Treasury. He should consider what effect it has on the business of life, on the pursuits of industry, on the great avocation of the agriculturist and the manufacturer; he should look at it under these comprehensive aspects; and, if found prejudicial to these great interests, the tax should be abolished, whether great or small. Tried in this way, and this tax must cease—not merely be reduced, but cease entirely.

EXPENDITURES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

SPEECH OF HON. J. L. MURRAY, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 31, 1839,

On the Army Appropriation bill, (the House being in the Committee of the Whole,) pending the amendment of Mr. Mason, of Virginia, to increase the item for National Armories from $300,000 to $360,000, the amount in former years.

Mr. MURRAY commenced by observing that he had intended, for some days, to occupy the first suitable occasion with a very brief review and examination of the expenditures generally of the Government. He had felt the more anxious to do so since the very able and excellent report of the Committee of Ways and Means had been published—a document which appeared to him to be so obviously correct in all its financial suggestions, that he sincerely hoped it would receive the unqualified support of at least every friend of the Administration. He was against the amendment proposed to the bill under consideration. The Committee of Ways and Means, by whom the bill was reported to the House, had charge of the public service, and knew better than the House could know the amount of money necessary to be appropriated for its support. He warned gentlemen, friendly to the Administration particularly, to beware of appropriating more money than was recommended by the committee, lest they might render themselves obnoxious, in a greater or less degree, to the reiterated charge of extravagance with which their ears had, almost without intermission, been saluted since the commencement of the present Congress. These charges, as far as he knew, or believed, were made and repeated without justifiable cause, and he thought they were so considered by the country; and it therefore behooved those gentlemen with whom he had acted heretofore, not to put weapons in the hands of those whose business and policy it was to use them to the best advantage. He was willing that Opposition members should, in a fair manner, make the best of their case; but as every wall had two sides to it, one to cover the defense, as well as one to breast the onset, it was the duty of those in defense to vigilantly guard against the making of any breach sufficiently vulnerable to admit the enemy. For one, he was not afraid of any injury resulting to the cause of the Administration from the charges which had been preferred by the Opposition. The disproportion was so great between the charges, and the alleged grounds upon which they were sought to be based, that their very violence disarmed them of the harm intended by those who fomented them. They had been too indiscriminate in their character, involving merit as well as demerit, and innocence alike with guilt, to have the effect intended upon a discerning and disinterested public. He thought there was more danger of the satiety of public inquiry, from being fed on political food, which is generally either bitter or distasteful, so much so as to threaten a disrelish in future, to such as might be necessary to the health, or inviting to the appetite, of the body-politic. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) I do not say so merely to play upon words, but would earnestly ask if the course pursued by the party here, who wage and keep up an indiscriminate warfare against the Administration, is not well calculated to destroy the wholesome effect of well-merited exposure of the party in power, whenever their official conduct may be such as to merit exposure? Sir, there was much in the suggestion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] the other day, that the terms corruption, corruption, &c., had been so long and incessantly repeated here, without meaning, and without foundation, that they had ceased to have effect on the public ear, by which they were little more regarded than if uttered by a starling, taught to repeat them day after day, without being conscious of their import. And this must necessarily continue to be the case so long as the people see that the chief object of gentlemen here is to obtain in their researches food for invective, rather than truth to enlighten the public mind. That their object is to procure, in advance, the condemnation of the Administration, rather than to give it a fair trial before the country. That their object is not to do justice to those "in power," as they so denominate them, but to eject them from their places, whether just or unjust. That they seldom spare either the national honor, or the national faith, when, by so doing, those who administer the Government are likely to merit or receive commendation; and that their object, in fine, is more to advance their own political prospects than the good of the country. A political course, so notoriously unfair, is much to be deprecated by every friend of a just responsibility on the part of those in power. Such responsibility is the chief security we can have against the misconduct of our public officers, and nothing is more likely to destroy it than a continual indiscriminate attack upon those officers, without reference to the merit or demerit of their official actions, the attack being no less virulent when unfounded than when elicited by palpable violations of public duty. The greatest sensibility becomes blunted and destroyed by overaction; and thus it is with the public watchfulness which, if we may credit gentlemen, has already become reprehensibly careless, betraying no unusual emotions or symptoms of alarm, at any charge, however grave, though thundered forth in the usual manner,

"With a thousand mouths, a thousand tongues,
And throat of brass inspired with iron lungs."

And hence it is that gentlemen who are always sounding the tocsin of alarm, and who piously "pray without ceasing" for their "kingdom come on earth," are generally rewarded with the greatest indifference on the part of the people. This may be seen in the history of the late elections, as given by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] in the most recent of his published works on that and other subjects, from which he showed us, some days since, that the previous anticipations of the Opposition had been most woefully overthrown, notwithstanding the warnings, the ragings, and wailings of the two last sessions of this Congress, which were not for one moment permitted to cool on the public ear. This is absolutely insufferable. It is past all endurance, that so much labor, and zeal, and noise should vanish into "thin air."

"Is it for this you gain those meager looks,
And sacrifice your dinner for your books?"

What is the cause of such indifference? It is that the cry of corruption, extravagance, &c., in this House is not supposed to furnish much evidence of its existence. It is that panics are ceasing to have their wonted effect, and because the people have heretofore so often been started by the vexatious cry of wolf, when no cause of alarm was to be seen or felt.

One of the standing charges against the Administration is that of extravagance in the expenditures of the public money; and of all the charges made, it is perhaps the most plausible when addressed to those who are ignorant of the many items of which the aggregate of the annual expenditure is composed. The charge seems to be founded mainly on the difference between the amount of the annual expenditure under Mr. Adams's administration, and the expenditures of the last few years under General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. From the table of annual expenditures, which I shall hereafter submit, (said Mr. M.,) the difference would seem to be considerable; and when we recur to the amount alone of the money expended, without reference to the objects to which it has been applied, or with an entire ignorance of those objects, an impression is left on our minds which vanishes on explanation.

Before proceeding to examine the manner in which large amounts of money have been expended within the last few years, it may not be amiss (said Mr. M.) to premise that the mere circumstance of the expenditure of a large amount of money is not itself evidence of extravagance or wastefulness. Extravagance does not consist in the amount expended, but depends on the means, the manner, or the objects of expenditure. One of the sayings of Dr. Franklin's Poor Richard is, that "he that buys an article which he does not need, because it is cheap, pays very dear for it." And thus it is we often see large amounts of money invested or paid out which may be said to be well, and even economically expended. A man who gives a dollar for a cane he does not need, has been extravagant to the amount of a dollar, whilst he that gives five, ten, or twenty thousand dollars for a valuable farm, worth as much or more than the amount given, cannot be said to be extravagant. The same rule is good when applied to the Government. There may be much economy and good policy, too, in the application of a hundred thousand or a million of dollars; and there may be great extravagance in the expenditure of one hundred. I should also premise that within the last ten years there has been a vast increase in the territory, the improvements, the business, the wealth, and the population of the United States, and consequently a corresponding increase in the amount of expenditure has become necessary. Nor should we forget that with the growth of the country, the means of expenditure have increased. The number of post offices in the United States, in 1828, was 7,651. The number on the 1st of December, 1838, was 12,533. In 1828, the number of miles of transportation of the United States was 10,100,240. This is increased to 34,580,202 miles in 1838. These facts, of themselves, speak volumes. They also bear witness of the faithful and energetic manner in which this Department has been administered by its present able and enlightened head. All must accord him the greatest credit, when we compare its condition now with that in which he found it, and reflect that since his appointment he has, in its management, brought order out of confusion, and redeemed it from a large debt with which it was incumbered, without the aid of any extraneous resources. In 1825 the aggregate value of our imports and exports was $195,815,000. This amount was swelled against 1836 to $318,643,000. During the past year, 1838, our imports amounted to $112,000,000, and our exports to $109,136,000. It is estimated that fifty per cent. may be added for the year ending September 30, 1839, which will make the former $168,000,000, and the latter $154,704,000. Our tonnage, American and foreign, entered from abroad in 1828, was 1,018,604. In 1837 it was 2,065,423. In 1825-'26, the productions of the great valley of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, which were transported to the New Orleans market, amounted in value to some eight or nine millions dollars. In 1838, they amounted to $25,000,000. There is, besides, a large portion of these productions sent to other markets than New Orleans. The valuable live-stock of Upper Kentucky, consisting of horses, beef cattle, mules, and hogs, is generally driven to the South, whilst a large amount of provisions from the States north of the Ohio river is transported to the North and East by the way of the lakes and New York canals. In 1831 the number of tons that passed through the Louisville canal was 76,323, and the amount of tolls collected $12,750. In 1837 the number of tons had increased to 242,374, and the amount of tolls to $145,424. The amount of tolls collected on the New York canals in 1828, was $838,444, which increased to $1,293,129 in 1837. The number of steamboats on the western waters in 1826, amounted only to a few dozen, and the flat and keel boats to a few thousand. In 1837 the former numbered 638, and gave employment to 15,950 hands. The latter numbered 6,000, and furnished employment to 25,000 or 30,000 hands. A still greater increase has taken place on the northern lakes, and a corresponding one in many other places in the Union. At the last census (1830) our population numbered 12,866,920. According to the average ratio of increase for the last fifty years, which has been about thirty-four per cent. for every period of ten years, our population will, at the next census in 1840, number about seven-teen and one quarter million of souls.

Within the last ten years, two States and two Territories have been added to the Union, and are already far in advance on their march to greatness. Their sudden growth and change of condition are unexampled, and passing wonderful to the beholder. They have, as it were, leaped into existence with the energy and strength of giants. Witness Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa. They have risen before our eyes like enchanted visions, or the morning mist. But we have also extinguished the Indian title to 116,000,000 of acres of land, which we have added to our territory. What an immense quantity! More than one third of the whole quantity of the public lands ceded to the Government in all the nine new States, including Ohio and three Territories, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, the whole quantity being 319,536,232 acres.

These facts, with others I might cite, (said Mr. M.,) all go to show the wonderful growth of this mighty nation within that time. Considering, also, that during this period a large public debt has been paid off, and the gold and silver circulation of the country increased from twenty to one hundred millions of dollars, it would certainly require much credulity on the part of a disinterested community to believe that the Government of the country under which these desirable, nay, more than looked for, results have taken place, had been either oppressively or unwisely administered.

We must keep another fact in view, (said Mr. M.,) in proceeding to examine this charge of extravagance. All money expended must first be appropriated by Congress, who should alone be responsible therefor. The Executive is responsible for its application only; but he cannot touch one dollar, even of his own salary, until it is first appropriated by law. For extravagant appropriations, therefore, Congress, and not the Executive, is responsible. Appropriations are of two classes. The one ordinary, for the payment of the current expenditures of the Government; the other extraordinary, for purposes other than the payment of the current and necessary expenditures of the nation. Which of the parties in Congress (said Mr. M.,) is most blamable, (if either be so,) for having voted for extraordinary appropriations, I may have occasion to examine hereafter; but, for the present, I shall pass that subject.

Few extraordinary appropriations were made by Congress till after the payment of the national debt. Whilst that debt was being paid, the annual average of the ordinary and necessary expenditures of the Government, under Mr. Adams, was $12,625,477, and amounted to but little more during the first term of President Jackson. The annual expenditures for the same purposes have to this time increased but little, as I will presently show; not more, perhaps, than would become reasonably necessary, from the increased growth of the country, and general augmentation of the public service. The large amounts of money lately expended, belong, therefore, to the class of extraordinary appropriations, which I will now proceed to examine. The first, and one of the greatest drains upon our financial means which I shall notice, (said Mr. M.,) is that which has grown out of our Indian relations for the last ten years.

The number of Indians of indigenous tribes west of the Mississippi river, on the 1st December, 1837, was..... 231,806
Of this number, humanity has to regret the destruction, by small-pox, during the past year, of..... 17,200

Which reduces their number to..... 214,606
The number of Indians (of tribes east of the Mississippi) who had, previous to that date, emigrated west of that river, was..... 51,327
The number then east of the Mississippi, was..... 49,365

Which makes the whole number of Indians 315,293

About one half of those Indians east of the Mississippi at the above date, (1st December, 1837,) composed principally of eighteen thousand Cherokees, have since emigrated west, whether the last remaining few of these unfortunate people must soon be sent.

Since the 4th of March, 1829, the commencement of General Jackson's administration, there has been purchased by Indian treaties, of some fifty bands or upwards, of land ceded by them to the Government, the quantity of 116,557,877 acres. For which the Government has paid, and stipulated to pay, in lands and money, sum of $72,609,056

In addition to this, Congress appropriated, by the act of the 12th of June, 1838, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War, for the removal and subsistence, and as a further compensation for their improvements, &c., the sum of..... 1,147,067

Also, by act of the 7th July last, for temporary subsistence of such Indians west of the Mississippi as might be unable to subsist themselves, owing to removal or disarrangement of their territory by the Government..... 150,000

Making altogether..... $73,905,123

Here, then, is an expenditure of $73,905,123—enough to pay the current expenses of the Government for some four or five years; and if the greatness of the amount be full evidence of extravagance, then is the Government guilty of the charge.

But, sir, (said Mr. M.,) can we condemn either the policy which superinduced these appropriations, or the application of the money expended for these lands, as unprofitable or impolitic? It is properly an investment of the money, and not an expenditure. The immense quantity of land we have received in exchange will, after payment of all expenses, more than remunerate us for the money paid to the Indians, with interest. The lands are said to be of the best quality. If so, they are an immense treasure to the nation. They would be amply sufficient to support three million of inhabitants; a number equaling the population of all the thirteen Colonies during our Revolution. In their acquisition, we reclaim an immense wilderness from the occupancy of savages and beasts of prey, and convert them into fruitful fields, thereby facilitating the march of improvement and dispensing comfort and happiness to civilized man. That philanthropy cannot be right which regrets the transformation of the wide extended and gloomy forest, which buries within its own bosom the rich stores of its dormant wealth, into a land of cultivation and fruitfulness, teeming with millions of active and enterprising freemen, who are developing its great resources, and thus making it the theater and the scene of man's highest destiny on earth. That humanity is ill-born and sickly, which, under such circumstances, would stop whilst witnessing the creation of so much grandeur and happiness, to weep over the fate of the transplanted savage, and protest against the act that expelled him to give place to a civilized community. It deserves not a place among the manly virtues of the human heart. For as the Almighty, in ancient days, dispersed the inhabitants of Canaan, that the land might be better occupied by his more favored children, so in like manner did he destine this, his most favored land, to be held in reserve until delivered to his most favored people of these latter times, of whom he is making a great nation. But the policy is not more wise for the white than it is generous and humane for the red man. So far from disparaging, it brightens the escutcheon of the national honor. Instead of exterminating, by the bloody hand of war, the remnant of an unfortunate race which still lingered in our way and claimed our protection, we have paid them for their lands, and transplanted them to a land we give them beyond our limits, where they will be secure against the future encroachments of the overreaching grasp of the white man. But on this part of the subject I will here introduce the present intelligent Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Crawford, whose story is entitled to more weight than anything I could say, it being not only official, but derived from a source where knowledge on this subject may be looked for. In his report at the commencement of the present session, he says:

"The most striking feature of the peculiar relations that the Indians bear to the United States is their removal to the west side of the Mississippi—a change of residence effected under treaties, and with the utmost regard to their comfort that the circumstances of each admitted. The advance of white settlements, and the consuming effect of their approach to the red man's home, had long been observed by the humane with pain, as leading to the speedy extinction of the weaker party. But it is not believed that any suggestion of the policy now in a course of execution was authoritatively made prior to the commencement of the present century; since, it has repeatedly, and at various intervals, received the sanction of the Chief Magistrates of the United States, and of one or the other House of Congress, without, however, any definite action previous to the law passed eight years ago. Treaty engagements had been previously made for their removal west, with several of the tribes; but the act referred to was a formal and general recognition of the measure, as desirable in regard to all the Indians within any State or Territory east of the Mississippi. Whatever apprehensions might have been honestly entertained of the results of this scheme, the arguments in favor of its adoption, deduced from observation and the destructive effects of a continuance in their old positions, are so far strengthened by the success attendant upon its execution as to have convinced all, it is thought, of the humane and benevolent tendency of the measure. Experience had shown that, however commendable the efforts to meliorate a savage surrounded by a white population, they were not compensated to any great extent by the gratification which is the best reward of doing good. A few individuals in a still smaller number of tribes have been educated, and profited by the opportunities afforded them to become civilized and respectable men; but the mass has retrograded, giving, by the contrast, greater prominence to their more wise-judging brethren. What can even the moral, uneducated Indian promise himself in a white settlement? Equality he does not and cannot possess, and the influence that is the just possession of his qualities in the ordinary social relations of life is denied him. Separated from deteriorating associations with white men, the reverse will be the fact. A fair and wide field will be open before him, in which he can cultivate the moral and intellectual virtues of the human beings around him, and aid in elevating them to the highest condition which they are capable of reaching. If these views are correct, the reflection is pleasant that is derived from the belief that a greater sacrifice of feeling is not made in their removal than falls to the lot of our fellow-citizens, in the numerous changes of residence that considerations of bettering their condition are daily producing. Indeed, it cannot be admitted to be so great; for while the white man moves West or South, accompanied by his family only, the Indians go by tribes, carrying with them all the pleasures of ancient acquaintance, common habits and common interests. It can scarcely be contended that they are more susceptible of suffering at the breaking up of local associations than we are; for, apart from their condition not favoring the indulgence of the finer feelings, fact proves that they sell a part of their possessions without reluctance, and leave their cabins and burial places, and the mounds and monuments which were the objects of their pride or affection, for a remote position in the same district. For whatever they have ceded to the United States they have been amply compensated. I speak not of former times, to which reference is not made, but of later days. The case of the Cherokees is a striking instance of the liberality of the Government in all its branches."

The honorable gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] entered on an examination of the origin of this policy some days since, in order, as he said, to correct the President in a "historical error," in dating its commencement as far back as the administration of Mr. Jefferson. I have not critically examined this subject, nor do I think it a matter of much moment as to where or when it originated. But the supposed discrepancy alluded to by the gentleman does not appear to me to be so great as he would make it. From the extract of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1834, cited by the gentleman himself, it appears that "the project for removing the eastern Indians west of the Mississippi may be 'referred, for its origin, to a proposition of a part 'of the Cherokee tribe, in 1808, to remove across 'the Mississippi river on some vacant lands of 'the United States.'" It is very certain that so much of the policy as relates to "an extinction, for a fair consideration," of the title to all the lands occupied by the Indians within the States and Territories of the United States, commenced as far back as Mr. Jefferson's administration, if not before that time. It was the policy which succeeded that of wresting from them their possessions by the forcible hand of war. Thus much of the early origin of the policy is certain, although no general or digested "plan for the removal and 'civilization of the Indian tribes may have been: 'pressed upon the attention of Congress prior to 'Mr. Monroe's administration."

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Expenditures of the Government—Mr. Murray.

HO. OF REFS.

But whoever may have been the author of this wise and philanthropic plan for the preservation of the aborigines, it seems, at any rate, to have received no "definite action previous to the law passed eight years ago" upon the pressing suggestions of President Jackson. It is clear that, although sanctioned by preceding Administrations, the policy was permitted to pass, nevertheless, without definite action, until General Jackson took hold of the subject, and made effectual work of it, as he has usually been remarkable for doing with everything he has ever undertaken. This one act must give to his administration a luster sufficient of itself to shed upon his name "imperishable renown."

Mr. MERCER rose to a point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky was surely discussing matters irrelevant to the subject before the committee.

Mr. POPE hoped his friend from Virginia would not press his objection. He was not sure but his colleague was in order; but whether he was or not, he was not taking a wider range in debate than had been usual for other gentlemen.

The CHAIR (Mr. BANKS, of Virginia) could not discriminate between the policy of appropriations and the appropriations themselves. The gentleman from Kentucky had a right to discuss the good or bad policy of the Government expenditures.

Mr. MURRAY proceeded. He had always known that certain honorable gentlemen were never easy when this subject of our Indian policy was alluded to, but he had not supposed the very able and experienced gentleman from Virginia to be one of them.

I know (said Mr. M.) that the Opposition generally have opposed the whole course of this policy, so wisely suggested, and so successfully executed. Many of them are opposed to every constituent part of it. They are opposed to the purchase of the lands from the Indians, because it extends and quickens the growth of the new States. They are opposed to it because they calculate, from the past legislation of Congress, that those of them who come from the eastern sea-board, and from the districts where great improvements have been made by the Government, would, but for the purchase of these lands, obtain themselves all the money paid to the Indians therefor, in addition to the large amounts they now receive. They are not satisfied with half, they want all the money the Government can spare. They are opposed, moreover, to the removal of the Indians, because many of them think the white and the red man ought to reside in the same neighborhood, and commingle in the same society. To such as entertain these sentiments, the money appears, no doubt, to have been worse than wasted.

Mr. M. then adverted to our relations with the Cherokees. He regretted that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] had thought proper to bring forward again in review the former difficulties interposed by Georgia, which, for a time, interrupted our relations with that tribe. He highly appreciated the worth of that gentleman's services as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Having been heretofore united with him as a co-member of that committee, he was able to bear testimony to the value of his services, which entitled him to the thanks of the House, and the gratitude of the Indians. Never had the Indians a more faithful sentinel in this House to watch over their interest, and complain for their wrongs. He would not say there was any truth in the good humored suspicion, so often spoken of in the House, that the honorable member must be "akin" to the Indians, but he would venture to say, that he knew of no living white man to whom the Indian could so appropriately address the paternal epithet, "My father." The Government, says the gentleman, has not kept her engagements with the Cherokees, because she had guaranteed to them their lands in Georgia, by the treaty of Holston. But did not these lands belong to the sovereign State of Georgia, and could the Federal Government give the Indians a valid guarantee to the territory of Georgia? Was she not bound to respect the rights of Georgia, and to maintain good faith towards that State? But then the Government was bound, by express stipulation in the articles of cession of 1802, to "extinguish the Indian title to all lands within the State of Georgia." This was a main consideration for which she acquired the rich and extensive territory now composing the States of Alabama and Mississippi. The gentleman declined entering on the validity of this "excuse," as he called it. Suppose the Government had pursued the course to which the gentleman seems most partial; what, then, would have been the consequences? Why, sir, her whole policy of removing and settling the Indians on lands without the limits of the States would have been thwarted, while her faith and stipulated obligations to Georgia would have been violated.

But the Indians understood well the obligations of the Government to Georgia, as well as her irreversible purpose to remove all Indians without the limits of the States. It was this knowledge that superinduced the proposition of their principal chiefs (John Ross included) to sell to the President their possessions. President Jackson was willing to buy their lands, but they could not agree as to their price. At the instance of the chiefs, the subject was referred to the Senate of the United States, composed then of a majority of Opposition members—a circumstance which no doubt induced the chiefs the more readily to make this reference. Well, the Senate decided that the Government should pay the Indians $5,000,000, besides the lands they were to receive west of the Mississippi—an award with which the chiefs professed to be satisfied, and promised to recommend it to the favorable consideration of their people. How was this pledge kept by them, I will not say of my own knowledge, for I have never fully examined this point; but I well recollect of hearing members affirm, on this floor, that although John Ross called the council of his tribe, as he had promised, yet he had secretly procured the decision given by the Indians on that occasion. He then believed that more could be obtained from the Government. A portion of the tribe, however, accepted the terms by the treaty of New Echota, which treaty was subsequently confirmed by the Senate. It is true that Ross did not assent to this treaty; but it is also true that he and his co-chiefs proposed, of their own accord, to abide the award of the Senate; that they professed to be satisfied with the award after it was made; that the amount of money settled by the Senate was stipulated to be paid by the Government, a large portion of which was, in fact, paid by the Government before the execution of the treaty. But the gentleman says the Indians were forced, by the appearance of seven thousand armed men among them, under General Scott, at the time when the treaty was to be executed. But the Indians could not have been taken by surprise; they had ample time to prepare for removal; they had been warned, time after time, that the treaty would be executed; they had received every assurance that the Government would be just, and even liberal towards them, but that the treaty must be executed. If they listened to the advice of professed friends to resist the treaty, they had no warrant in the conduct of the Government for so doing. But how were they sent off? Why, sir, Congress appropriated to them $1,147,000 (in addition to what was before stipulated to be paid) for their removal, subsistence, &c., upon which the Indians, without further murmur, immediately set out for their new homes, not under a guard of armed men, but under the guidance of their own chiefs. But the gentleman says that some three thousand of these Indians died on their way to the West. It is true, they were, on the road, attacked with the measles, and perhaps other diseases, by which great numbers were lost; though the number given by the gentleman is, perhaps, somewhat overstated. But, sir, (said Mr. M.) was not this a most remarkable charge against the Administration? I own I was surprised myself, and listened to hear the Government charged next with the loss of seventeen thousand two hundred Indians, who died of small-pox on the Missouri river during last spring. I believed, however, that it has been common to charge the Administration with misfortune resulting from the act of God, or other circumstances, over which it had no control. Before reaching

Washington, I was told that the Cherokee chiefs were receiving an exorbitant amount of money for the removal of their people. This is all explained by Mr. Crawford. In his report he says: "An estimate was submitted by the Cherokee chiefs on the 31st July, which put the cost of removal of one thousand souls at $65,000, which was at length agreed to be given." "It would seem," says the report, "that the cost of removal, according to the Indian estimate, is high, but as their own fund pays it, and it was insisted on by their own confidential agents, it was thought it could not be rejected." Their removal was, therefore, at their own expense, the money being part of the $1,147,067 appropriated by act of 12th July last. It will be recollected that this appropriation was made partly to satisfy the discontent of the Indians, who were complaining of the terms of the Government, partly to satisfy some of the Opposition to this Administration, who were affirming from the house-tops that the Indians were unfairly used by the Government, and partly as a measure of policy, to induce the removal of the Indians to their new homes, and thereby prevent the effusion of blood, which was likely to ensue from the execution of the treaty. On this head the report continues: "By some the measure may be regarded as just—by others 'generous.'" "It perhaps partook of both attributes." "If our acts have been generous, they have not been less wise and politic. A large mass of men have been conciliated; the hazard of an effusion of human blood has been put by; good feeling has been preserved, and we have quietly and gently transported eighteen thousand friends to the west bank of the Mississippi."

Mr. M. then called the attention of the House to the expenditure of $22,000,000 in Indian wars under the last and present Administration, viz: For the Black Hawk war, $2,000,000; for the Creek and Seminole difficulties, $20,000,000.

This was a large expenditure from which the administration of Mr. Adams was exempt. He contended that the Administration was not more chargeable with this expenditure than was the administration of Mr. Madison with the expenses of the late war with Great Britain. He would not more than allude to the Black Hawk war, as he was not aware of any charge which had grown out of it against the Administration. As the war with the Seminoles, however, had been a leading subject, on which to found abuse of every character against the Administration, and that of extravagance amongst the rest, he would devote a few moments to its examination. By the treaty of Payne's Landing, May 9, 1832, and ratified April 12, 1834, the principal chiefs of the Seminole Indians sold to the Government of the United States all their possessions in Florida; upon condition, however, that they should, after examination, be "satisfied with the character of the country to be assigned them for their new homes west of the Mississippi, and of the favorable disposition of the Creeks to reunite with them as one people." They, at the same time, appointed a deputation of their chiefs to proceed, at the expense of the United States Government, to examine the country, and make report. After examination and return, this deputation, in March, 1833, addressed a letter to the United States commissioners appointed for that purpose, informing them that they were satisfied with their new country. Whereupon, by articles bearing date March 28, 1833, and ratified April 12, 1834, the former treaty is closed and made absolute. All this was done upon mature reflection, after the lapse of a year, and after a full examination of their new land. I am aware (said Mr. M.) that the resistance to this treaty is justified by the gentleman from Vermont, on the ground that the Creeks refused to give them a "separate allotment of their soil." But this was no part of the treaty stipulation. On the other hand, the stipulation was, that "an additional extent of territory, proportioned to their numbers, should be added to the Creek country." The only thing stipulated to be obtained from the Creeks was their consent to "reunite with them as one people." To an application for this purpose, the Creeks replied, "they were willing to receive them within their limits as a portion of the nation." This was the extent of the condition. But the honorable gentleman says it appears from the late special message of the President that the "fortune of war has placed in our hands two thousand Seminoles, whom we have transported over the Mississippi." That the "eastern Creeks have removed to, and taken possession of, the lands allotted to the Seminoles," who have no lands, and must remain in the Creek territory till we assign them others. The statement itself admits that there was an allotment for the Seminoles. Why are they not in possession of it? Because they resisted the treaty, and refused to emigrate to it. While they were engaged in war with the Government, the eastern Creeks removed to the West, and settled on the lands which the Seminoles would otherwise have obtained. And, now that they are at length removed by the "fortune of war," the Administration is reproached, notwithstanding the President recommends an allotment to them of a new tract. Sir, (said Mr. M.) there was no just cause for the refusal of the Seminoles to execute the treaty, after its final ratification, to which they had previously consented, after the lapse of a year from the first agreement. But instead of the performance of these engagements in good faith, as we had a right to expect and demand, we received the most savage treachery and murder at the hands of the Seminoles. The insolence and evident perfidy of their chief, Ocoola, soon provoked difficulties between him and the Government agent, General Wiley Thompson, who had lately been a member of this House from the State of Georgia. The difficulties were at length settled in apparent good faith, and General Thompson presented to Ocoola a fine gun as a pledge of his future friendship. Professing great friendship for Thompson, as well as gratitude for his kindness and liberality, Ocoola took the first occasion to murder him in cold blood, with this very gun. This was the signal for blood, and instantly this arch fiend led on to the slaughter. Before any steps could be taken by the Government to repress these outrages, there arose along the Florida frontier the thick smoke of the consuming cottages, accompanied with the wailings of death. It was the murderous work of Ocoola, whose fiendish spirit was reeking with the innocent blood of the frontier sufferers. The sequel is known. One after another, and in quick succession, your ablest officers, with the best disposable force that could be commanded, were ordered to the scene of action. It was not, however, a theater where glory was to be acquired.

The difficulties to be encountered were innumerable and insurmountable. The various expeditions did not want for energy or skill. Your commanders were the most able and skillful officers, men whose swords had, on former occasions, gleamed in the battle fight, and whose names were already enrolled high on the list of the nation's heroes. But no skill could surmount the difficulties interposed by the interminable swamps and hammocks of Florida. No valor could contend with the deathly blight of that noxious climate. Driven from their desolated homes, even the inhabitants of the Territory had to be supported by the Government or perish. Provisions and munitions of war, as well as men, had to be transported a great distance and at immense expense. Secure in the mazes of his own native swamp, where his path was trackless, and his home confined to no locality; where every tussock furnished him a resting-place and roots for his subsistence, the Seminole could laugh at your skill, and defy your power. Yet the Government did not falter in the prosecution of this unavoidable war, notwithstanding the many interposing difficulties, not the least of which was the accustomed opposition and resistance in this House. It was here the Government was arraigned for its alleged inefficiency, our generals and other soldiers covered with the epithets of opprobrium, whilst the deeds of the Seminole chief furnished the rich themes of penegyric. The very appropriations brought forward to relieve your suffering soldiers, who were wading the swamps and guarding the passes of Florida, sleeping on the ground and contending against all the horrors of that desolating climate, often without clothes and without food, were resisted at every step, and opposed with all the asperity of party violence. The supposed failures of success, the length of time employed in the war, and the treasure it was costing the nation, were all urged as reasons for opposing the appropriations. And now that the war has been measurably closed, and the most of the leaders and warriors of the Seminoles removed beyond the Mississippi, by the untiring perseverance of your Army, the money expended is added to the supposed list of extravagant expenditures, and paraded before the nation to break down this Administration. But it will not answer the purpose intended, (said Mr. M.) However much the people may disapprove of a wasteful expenditure of the public money, they will nevertheless have the integrity of our treaties and the honor of our arms maintained at every cost and at every hazard. They ever have, they ever will frown down every attempt to paralyze the country's arms while maintaining or defending the rights of the nation by withholding from our armies the necessary means of support. It is not a sufficient apology to tell them that the war is inefficiently conducted, or that our arms meet with defeat. They will rather expect you to redouble your energies, so as to place two soldiers in the field for every one that is lost. The enemies of the late war opposed the necessary supplies because of the alleged weakness and want of energy in Mr. Madison's administration, and the reverses which, for a season, attended our arms. The surrender of Hull, the defeat at Raisin, the capture of Dudley and butchery of his brave men, furnished the themes of complaint against the Administration, and the reasons for resisting the appropriations.

But although engaged some three years with twenty-five hundred or three thousand Indians in the swamps of Florida, yet, when all the circumstances are considered, neither our officers, nor our arms have suffered disparagement. We were at war some twelve or fifteen years with the north-western Indians, prior to the treaty of Greenville, 1795, during which time our flag had to mourn the successive disasters which befell a Crawford, a Hardin, a Harmar, and St. Clair, who were not only defeated, but whose whole armies were one after another cut up and butchered, leaving scarcely enough of survivors to communicate the disastrous intelligence. There are many historic examples of the smallest and most circumscribed communities being able, when protected by natural barriers and position, to resist successfully the most powerful nations. Witness the maroons of Jamaica, whom the power of Great Britain was unable to subdue for upwards of half a century, and succeeded at last only by the barbarous expedient of the bloodhound. The case of the maroons of St. Domingo, composed at first, like the original maroons of Jamaica, of a few runaway negroes, who took shelter in the caves and mountain fastnesses in the interior of the island, where they formed a community of outlaws which resisted successfully, for half a century, the combined expeditions of the French and Spanish colonies on the island, demonstrates the great difficulty of overcoming natural obstacles, however feeble or contemptible the enemy may be in point of strength. "The exaggerated accounts of their numbers and dread exploits during this time," says the historian, "would fill a volume;" yet, when peace was restored by negotiation, by which means only the colonists obtained security against these banditti, the wonderful discovery was made that they did not exceed one hundred and fifty in number. But the attempts of France to subdue the insurrectionary negroes of that island who rebelled against their masters, and which were repeated through a period of near twenty years, form a case, perhaps, no less striking and remarkable. Napoleon at length determined to crush the insurrectionists by one energetic blow; and the most formidable expedition was accordingly dispatched for that purpose, yet it all resulted in disaster. Fifty thousand men of the conquerors of the Nile and of Italy, including their commander, the brother-in-law of Napoleon, perished in St. Domingo. The climate and natural obstacles to invasion enabled the insurrectionists, who did not number half a million of souls, including all ages, sexes, and colors, to withstand this otherwise most formidable army.

The next item Mr. M. would allude to as having greatly increased our expenditures, was that of pensions. Four of the principal pension laws have been brought into operation since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, viz: the acts of 1828, 1832, 1836, and 1838. These several acts have increased the list of pensioners to forty-two thousand five hundred.

The average annual excess or increase of pensions from 1829 to 1838, inclusive, exceeds the average annual payments on the same account from 1825 to 1828, inclusive, $1,013,000.

The aggregate of this increase for said ten years, is.....$10,130,000

To this we must add the annual expenditure of $392,000 for pensions to widows of revolutionary soldiers, under the law of 7th July, 1838. As these pensions commence March 4, 1836, the amount for three years, up to the 4th of March, 1839, will be.....1,176,000

Making the aggregate increase, since 1828.....$11,306,000

This is an expenditure from which the administration of Mr. Adams was exempt. And as it has been incurred since the commencement of General Jackson's administration, the amount is added in, to swell the general expenditures, so as to give feasibility to the charge of extravagance. Now, sir, (said Mr. M.) for one, so far from regretting this increase of pensions, I both justify and rejoice at it. And I am satisfied that Opposition gentlemen are not disposed to disapprove it. All know that such disapproval would smack too much of the odious sin of ingratitude, not to say injustice; for I do not look upon the payment of pensions as a donation, but as the discharge of a public debt, which we are, in point of morals, not to say gratitude and humanity, as much bound to pay as any other revolutionary debt. When we used the money of others to prosecute the war of the Revolution, we were, of course, bound to repay it, with interest; and surely those who gave their personal service, and periled their lives, are as much entitled to pay as those who advanced their money. But the pensions constitute no part of the permanent expenditure; the fund is temporary, and must expire with the rapidly disappearing pensioners. A few more installments and the debt is paid forever.

In looking down the dark vista of time, we soon discover the only surviving pensioner of the Revolution. Around us and before, they are fast falling like the ripened grain before the scythe or the sickle. They have passed the long lane of life, through which they have journeyed in perils for years three score and ten. The sun of their existence is fast setting, and is already hidden below the horizon of life. They are collected at the great inn at the end of their day's journey; where, after taking their last refreshments, and being worn down with the fatigues of their travel, they are preparing to lie down and sleep the sleep of death. Already it grows late, and, amid the surrounding silence and darkness, they are seen, by the faint, flickering light of their fast expiring tapers, to be laying down their weary heads in that repose which shall only end with time. The last ones are nodding to the tomb, and must soon be laid side by side with their companions. Peace be to their manes. They leave behind them the glory of the well-fought battle, which has added a new era to the history of the past, and developed still further, to the astonishment of the world, the mighty energies and the destiny of man.

The expenditure for the South Sea Exploring Expedition constitutes another item; and, including the annual amount of $224,650, the estimated expense of the expedition for two years and a half amounts to $1,290,185 50. I shall neither enter upon any defense or condemnation of this measure, (said Mr. M.) as it is not necessary to my present purpose. At the last session I voted, it is true, with those who were considered the enemies of the measure, for the restrictive clause limiting the expenditure to a time certain, and making a reduction of $20,000 in the appropriation; but it was more from an adherence to a rule which I had prescribed for myself—that of voting for the expenditure of no money other than is required by public necessity, during the present condition of the Treasury—than from any convictions adverse to the objects of the expedition. I should, in all probability, have opposed it in its inception; yet I am far from being satisfied that it is not a measure pregnant with important results, which may be alike creditable to the nation and beneficial to commerce. But that my constituents may be able to see and judge for themselves of the merit of the interesting objects of this expedition, I will read from the Register of Debates for December, 1834, the most condensed statement of them which I have been able to find:

Expenditures of the Government—Mr. Murray.

HO. OF REPS.

"Among the petitions and memorials presented to day was one by Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, of John N. Reynolds, lately returned from a voyage of exploration in the Pacific ocean and the northwest coast, praying that an expedition may be fitted out to survey the islands and reefs in that ocean and on that coast. The petition was recommended by both branches of the Legislature of Rhode Island; and Mr. P. stated that the Legislature of several other States would join in the prayer of the memorial, as would the merchants and chambers of commerce in the principal cities in the Union. To show the importance of the object in view, Mr. P. stated that there were now engaged in the whale fishery 132,000 tons of shipping, that there were employed 10,000 seamen; and that the business, direct and indirect, employed 170,000 tons of shipping, and more than 12,000 seamen; that more than one tenth part of our whole navigation was engaged in it, and the capital invested was $12,000,000. He further stated that the annual loss of property upon the islands and reefs not laid down upon any chart, was fully equal to the expense of the expedition and survey requested."

Such were the commercial objects to be attained by this measure. There were, besides, other objects of the greatest consequence to be attained, growing out of an emulous and laudable ambition to advance the character of the nation, the reputation of our Navy, and the cause of science. But what I had intended to say in reference to this subject is, that this was a measure of which the Opposition could not complain; for, although it is of somewhat doubtful origin, yet its claims to paternity on the Opposition seem to have the better foundation. It is true that no vote ever taken upon it could be fairly said to be of a party character; yet its strongest support has been from the Opposition ranks. They are, therefore, estopped from making any complaint about the expenditure it has cost. The principal hopes of its success are founded on a desire to promote their darling interest, that of commerce, of which they claim to be the exclusive friends, because the friends of this Administration think that other interests deserve equal encouragement. Upon recurring to the yeas and nays on the first bill to bring forward this measure in 1829, we find among the yeas the names of most of the leading Opposition members in this floor who were then in the House of Representatives. There are the names of the long-tried veteran members from Virginia, [Mr. MERRICK and Mr. TALIAFERRO,] in company with the name of the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. BURGESS,] and of the representative from Boston, [Mr. DAVIS,] now a distinguished member of the other branch of Congress; and there is the name of that faithful sentinel from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] who is always at his post on the watch-tower of commerce, guarding its various interests as he would the apple of his eye. Why, sir, (said Mr. M.) the cause of commerce is to him what sack was to Falstaff. It is his breakfast, his dinner, and his supper. It is his meat and his drink; he lives on it and sleeps on it. His constituents are a commercial people, and well are they aware of the value of his services to their favorite interest. A proof of this is that they have, I believe, kept him in Congress from time immemorial, as I have no recollection of ever having read the yeas and nays without seeing among them the name of JOHN REED. But, then, I am comparatively a young man, and do not know whether the "memory" of others around me "runneth to the contrary" or not. Be that as it may, I can bear testimony to the fact that no member deserves more the confidence of his constituents than the gentleman, the politics, the pursuits, and position of those whom he represents considered.

There is another item (said Mr. M.) I must not omit to examine. It is that of $28,101,644 deposited with the States by the law of 1836. You may be surprised that I notice this matter while speaking of expenditure, inasmuch as the Government is not chargeable with this item under that head. That matter, however, is seldom considered by those whose business it is to make an array of figures against the Administration. Whether well founded or ill founded, is no matter of concern to those who only calculate in reference to the effect to be produced. Gentlemen here, when speaking of extravagant expenditures, never speak of isolated items which compose the aggregate amount. They are like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK,] when speaking in reference to another subject, they never "descend to particulars; they deal in generalities." They will tell you of all the money that has come into the Treasury, and then exclaim, "where is it?" Whether received as revenue, or expended as appropriations proper for the public service, the people are not informed. Thus, our foreign indemnities from France, Denmark, Spain, Naples, the Sicilies, and Brazil, amounting to near $7,000,000, which are received into the Treasury as a trust fund for the citizens who own it, being so much clear gain to the country, but belonging, nevertheless, to the injured citizens for whom it is obtained, and not to the Government, are all included in the gross amount of the Government receipts, as if part of the actual revenue. These trust funds, including these indemnities, and including $1,395,000 received in trust for Chickasaw Indians on the sale of their lands in 1835-'36, and $1,200,000 on the sale of their lands in 1836-'37, and invested for their benefit, amounting altogether to nearly ten millions of dollars, are included in the appropriation bills in order to invest it, or enable the owners to draw it from the Treasury; and then it is classed with the round numbers of appropriations, as part of the wasteful and profligate extravagance of the Administration. Another instance of this disingenuous mode of attack which we have often witnessed even on this floor is this: the most gorgeous description of the full and overflowing condition of our Treasury previous to the late financial difficulties is followed with therodomontade, "What now is the condition of your resources? Your Treasury bankrupt, unable to meet the demands against it, and your Government in debt from a resort to the expedient of Treasury notes." Now, the answer to all this is most destructive to this fine apostrophe, and casts back the reproach intended for others upon those who make it, with a most signal stoppel to the charge implied. The answer is, that there would have been no embarrassment nor issue of Treasury notes but for the deposit of $28,101,644 with the States, which was a most favorite measure with the Opposition; that of the money ordered by the act of 1836 to be deposited with the States, upwards of $9,000,000 was appropriated before the close of the session at which the act of deposit was passed, which threw this $9,000,000 upon the subsequent revenues of the Government, which thereby became burdened with a preëxisting debt to that amount. These appropriations, for improvements of rivers and harbors, roads and canals, for light-houses, fortifications, and for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia, (the last item being $1,500,000,) were supported by most of the Opposition, and, therefore, they have no right to say to the friends of this Administration, "you are alone responsible." That of the public money in deposit with banks in 1837, (a mode of deposit now advocated by the Opposition,) we were compelled, for their relief, and for the relief of the country, to postpone of those deposits for payment to a subsequent time $4,800,000, viz: $2,400,000 to July, 1838, and $2,400,000 to July, 1839; thereby placing beyond our reach the money paid by the people for the public service, for the benefit of the most favorite institutions of the political enemies of this Administration. We also postponed the payment of moneys due on unpaid duty bonds, amounting to $4,000,000 more. To these measures the deficit in the Treasury, which called forth the issue of the Treasury notes, is alone attributable, so far as concerns the disposal of the money by the Government; and to my own knowledge, the Opposition are wholly precluded from objecting to any one of them.

But there are other things rarely told to the people when they are lectured on the subject of the Government embarrassments. The great decrease in the public revenue—a decrease passing all precedent, and could not have been anticipated by any—is seldom spoken of or commented on.

This, it is supposed, belongs also to the credit part of the account. They are not told that the imports of 1838 were $78,000,000 less than the corresponding imports of 1836; that the proceeds of public lands had fallen from $24,877,000, received in 1836, to $3,136,000 in 1837; that the whole amount of revenues proper in 1836 was $48,000,000, and amounted from customs and lands in 1838, "excluding the amounts received from postponed bonds, which formed part of the receipts of 1837," to only about $14,500,000. Tell these, and all these things to the people, and they will not be imposed upon by the humbug epithets of "public debt," and "Treasury embarrassment."

Thus much I have thought proper (said Mr. M.) to say in reference to this deposit of $28,101,000 with the States, not for the purpose of objecting to the act that gave rise to it, or of showing that it was objectionable as a measure at the time it passed, but for the purpose of showing that the consequences resulting from it ought not to be laid at the feet of the Administration by any party in this country. I was myself in favor of this act of deposit, not from choice, but from necessity. We had an immense surplus in the Treasury, and I was in favor of its deposit for the purpose of avoiding a much greater evil likely to grow out of its appropriation by Congress. The people had paid this surplus to defray the charges of the public service. The banks were employing it in the most ruinous schemes of speculation. The people had paid it for no such purpose. If left in the Treasury, it was likely to tempt Congress into an inordinate and dangerous system of appropriations, which was desirable to be avoided, and much to be deprecated. Upon principle I was opposed to it, and am yet opposed to it. Next to a large surplus I should most deprecate this system of depositing money with the States, which is but another name for distribution. The surplus being disposed of, the object of the law is accomplished, and I shall oppose any further deposit by the payment of the fourth installment, heretofore postponed. I shall advocate that system of revenue which will hereafter bring no surplus into the Treasury. A revenue commensurate with the necessary wants of the Government is all that should ever be raised by this Government. And when I say the necessary wants of the Government, I do not mean a splendid system of improvements, either of fortifications, of light-houses, or for river and coast navigation. To some of them I am opposed altogether, and the others I would reduce to a limited and economical establishment. I have ever protested against the splendid and extensive system of fortifications entered upon by Congress during the redundancy of our Treasury means. A few necessary points, well fortified and fitted up for the shelter and protection of our soldiers and seamen, and the preservation of our arms and munitions of war, will be acknowledged by all to be indispensable. But to line our extensive frontier and coast with fortifications, to increase our armed establishments of the Army and Navy, and to cost annual millions in future to supply them with men and munitions, and repair their dilapidations, is justifiable on no ground whatever, whether our extensive territory, the genius and character of our people, or the simple and limited form of our Government, be consulted. Nor do I believe these extensive fortifications to be the best means of preparing our wide-extended country for defense in time of war. I approve much more of the policy of the great Spartan lawgiver, who ordained that his countrymen should not make walls of wood, brick, or stone, for the defense of their city, as was done by other cities of that day, but that the hearts and the courage of the citizens should defend them with a wall of men. God forbid that we should rely on fortifications and wooden walls for the defense of this wide-extended and mighty nation. Whenever the patriotism and courage of our citizens shall become unequal to its defense, then will it not be worth defending. It seems (said Mr. M.) from the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the expenditure for this establishment "has increased from something over $100,000, during the first years of the Government, to upwards of $1,000,000 annually." The appropriation last year for this purpose was $1,015,000; and now, owing to recent improvements in floating steam batteries, all our stationary works for the defense of harbors are about to be superseded and rendered worthless. Thus, after the expenditure of millions in building up the present system of defense, we are about to be called on to abandon so much of it as relates to coast defense, as useless, and to appropriate millions again to build up a system of floating steam batteries for the defense of harbors.

I will now (said Mr. M.) turn your attention to this system of harbor and river improvement, to which, as it at present exists, I am altogether opposed, as being both wasteful in the application of the public money and unequal in its operation upon the people of the several States. I will give you its history from the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which very briefly traces its progress from its origin to its present condition:

"This item was unknown in the early legislation of the Federal Government. The first appropriation was made in 1802; but prior to 1816 only $36,449 had been expended upon two works, connected directly and indirectly, with navy-yards and light-houses. A few appropriations were made in 1820-'21-'22 and '23, in the neighborhood of light-houses and navy-yards, amounting altogether to $51,750, and in 1823 two harbor surveys were authorized at an expense of $350. After we had adopted the policy of raising more revenue than was required for Federal purposes, and as the period approached for the redemption of the public debt, this was one of the new branches of expenditure resorted to in order to absorb a contemplated surplus. Accordingly, and for the first time in the history of our legislation, an act was passed on the 20th of May, 1826, for improving certain harbors and the navigation of certain rivers and creeks; and for authorizing surveys to be made of certain bays, sounds and rivers therein, mentioned. On the 2d of March, 1827, this was followed by a regular annual bill to authorize the improving of certain harbors, the building of piers, and for other purposes."

These expenditures immediately increased in 1827, to $82,500; in 1828, to $121,000; and in 1829, $505,000. In 1838 the appropriations were more than a million and a half, and the estimates for 1839, amount to $1,713,000.

"The original amount already appropriated for works is $8,919,043 66, besides canal stocks, and the debt assumed for the corporations of the District, for investments in the same, amounting to $3,383,490; making an aggregate of $12,302,533 66. The estimates for completing some of these works amount to $1,650,842 21; but judging by our experience as to former estimates, it will more probably require ten millions, besides the cost of some of the most expensive works, for which there are no estates at all. In addition to this, a bill is now pending, and would have passed the House at the close of last session, but for want of time, which, with the amendments, embraced appropriations for new works, amounting to near a million of dollars, and involving an ultimate expenditure of probably five millions more."

Verily it is time for this branch of expenditure to arrest the public attention. All this has sprung from the weakest, and as it was supposed the most harmless branch of the American system. The tariff, internal improvements on roads by the Federal Government, and the United States Bank, as the leading members of this system, were all cut down. This last member of the family was spared for his infancy and his promise, by reason of which forbearance we have paid, within the last twelve years, $12,000,000, and become liable, by works already commenced, to the payment of $10,000,000 more. It is furthermore proposed, by the bills on your table, to pledge us by new engagements to an ultimate payment of $5,000,000 more. Sir, (said Mr. M.) how are we to understand gentlemen, when they talk of extravagance. They will oppose every bill which is indispensable for the public service, and then vote the appropriation of millions to rivers, creeks, canals, bays, &c., and then come here and denounce the Administration for extravagance.

But I have said I was opposed to this system of improvements, because of its wastefulness. We have, according to this report, within thirteen years, made appropriations for one hundred and three works. Of these we have completed twenty. May complete, with existing appropriations, fourteen; of the others, sixty-one are unfinished, four suspended, one abandoned, and three never commenced. These improvements are commenced along and around our coast. The foundation is laid for the expenditure of millions. Some are badly executed, or injudicious in their structure or position, and are at length abandoned. Many of them dilapidated, and are renewed and built over again at perhaps greater expense than ever. And all this time there is a swarm of agents under different names, such as engineers, commissioners, superintendents, contractors, clerks, &c., all of whom must handle part of the cash, and be quartered at Uncle Sam's expense. Why, sir, this report itself tells us "that many of the works were built over again, and that others were rotten before they were completed."

But I am opposed to the system, because of its unequal operation on the people of the several States. On this point the report is full and conclusive.

"It is certainly unjust to apply the money collected in some States to mere local improvements in a distant quarter of the Union, simply because they appertain to the commerce of the country. If every improvement of harbors, rivers, and creeks, and the building of piers, is to be considered national in its character and benefits, as an appendage to our commerce, it is difficult to define any limit whatever to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, or to say to what purpose the common fund of the Union may not be applied. The distribution made during the last thirteen years among the States, proves incontestably the injustice of these expenditures. The whole amount appropriated and invested is $12,300,000, of which $5,190,000 has been granted to a district of country not one hundred and fifty miles from the capital. Without inquiring into the importance of the works patronized by the Federal Government, it is sufficient to remark that most of the States have been at the same time employing their own money and credit on improvements infinitely more useful and profitable, and better calculated to extend the commerce of the Union. Some of the States have not participated at all in these Federal appropriations. While four States only may be charged with $5,760,000 out of the $12,300,000, and some of the most expensive works remain to be completed in these States."

Well may this committee say, sir, (said Mr. M.) that some of the States have not participated at all in these Federal appropriations. In document No. 254, vol. 8, of Executive documents of last session, is a table exhibiting the amount disbursed in each year, and in each State and Territory, for the years 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837, for light-houses, fortifications, internal improvements, and pensions, arranged under separate heads, &c., &c., showing how much each State received each year for each object. It shows that for those years there was disbursed—

For fortifications.....	$2,789,634 77
For light-houses.....	1,020,089 03
For internal improvements.....	3,653,061 99
For pensions.....	10,848,399 28
Total.....	$18,311,185 07

For these objects, then, the disbursements in those four years amounted to $18,311,185 07. Exclusive of pensions, the sum is.. $7,462,784 79

Then follows another table showing the disbursements during the same time to the Alexandria canal.....	$150,000 00
Cumberland road.....	2,418,280 75
Chesapeake and Ohio canal.....	990 00
Ohio and Mississippi river.....	549,908 01
	3,118,178 76

Making for these objects, in four years.....$10,580,962 55

In looking over this table, every head is filled out with something in most of the States, and when I come to New York, her sum for the four years is $1,000,000. But when I come to Kentucky—oh, yes, "Old Kaintuck," whose whole energies have been disinterestedly devoted to this system—I find her, like the unfortunate wight at the lottery wheel, receiving for her every draw a blank. I read over the heads of each object of disbursement for each year, for fortifications blank, for light-houses blank, for internal improvements blank, and "blank" says echo. Yet Kentucky pays her share of all these moneys expended, and then pays for her own improvements besides, without the assistance of any other State. For, sir, she has improvements, and valuable improvements, too, which are better, and cost less, than if made by the Federal Government. If the bill for the Cumberland road, now on your table, passes, we will have appropriated altogether $7,115,683 to that one object, which will yet cost many millions. The average amount paid for each mile, between Cumberland, in Maryland, and Columbus, in Ohio, a distance of some two hundred and sixty-five miles, is between nineteen and twenty thousand dollars. The cost of one hundred miles in Indiana, it is estimated, will be $15,875 per mile, and ninety miles reported upon from Illinois, will cost $13,875 per mile. In Kentucky, we have the best Macadamized roads, graded to two and a half degrees, covered with two coats of broken rock, nine inches thick, and all well executed, for an amount varying from four to five thousand dollars per mile. Examine, sir, if you please, the history of our Federal improvements, and compare both their execution and cost with the improvements of the States, and my word for it, if you be not prepossessed in your opinions, and your State is not interested in expecting such appropriations, you will turn with abhorrence against the notorious injustice and wastefulness of the whole system. I might, sir, (said Mr. M.) say much about its demoralizing tendency upon the legislation of this House. It introduces a system of combinations and log-rolling, as we say west of the mountains, dangerous and alarming in the extreme, when we consider that our legislation binds the destinies of twenty-six independent States.

This system of improvements (continued Mr. M.) constitutes one point of the real issue between the two great political parties of this country, and it is vain to attempt to falsify the true issue by directing the attention of the people to something immaterial and delusive. When General Jackson came into power, so much of this system as relates to the improvement of roads, had just ripened, as it were, into manhood, and set out with all the extravagance of a rich and profligate heir, to squander whithersoever he would the money he had acquired from others. But he was soon arrested by the firm grasp of that hand which did not loose its hold until life was extinct. If, after strangling this young giant of internal improvement, by the veto of the Maysville road bill, "that extraordinary man," as I have heard him denominated, had throttled this twin monster, which has now grown formidable, and is attacking us on every river in the interior of our country, and at every inlet, and creek, and bay on our sea-coast, and exterminated him in his infancy, his political career would have been complete. He would then have retired to the Hermitage, with the consolation of Lysurgus, embraced in the reflection that his country's liberties were secure from all danger against the evils growing out of this question, so long as his policy should be adhered to. As it was, his services were invaluable, and he had full proof that they were so estimated by his countrymen. His return to his home from the arduous struggles of his administration against Federal encroachments (by which terms I mean the encroachments of the Federal Government) was brightened with every consoling felicitation, like the triumphal return of Napoleon from Italy, or of Marlborough from the continent. But it were next to impossible, that every evil could have been exterminated which had been engendered and brought forward under the destructive auspices of the American system; which, however much I may admire and do admire the splendid talents by which it was nurtured and sustained, I nevertheless believe to have been fraught with the most dangerous tendencies. It had become too firmly seated in the body-politic. Its roots had penetrated all the ramifications of society, and were rapidly ingrafting themselves on every branch of our national enterprise. The friends of each darling interest, which had grown up under its operation, were numerous and influential. They filled your legislative halls, and enjoyed most places of trust and profit under the Government. The monster was silently stealing into our strongest citadels of prosperity and security, and was preparing to intrench himself in their possession, without alarming the fears of the people. And although his encroachments and designs were pointed out by this true defender of his country's liberties, yet, it was not until he would firmly plant himself against the advance of this rapacious destroyer, take him boldly by the horns, and cry aloud for help, that the people would come to the rescue. Maddened like the wolf for the loss of her whelps, the friends of these numerous interests—numerous themselves as the enraged members of the disturbed hive—attacked the old hero on every side, and with frantic violence and asperity. Whilst harassed by the misdeeds of the internal improvement interest, he was suddenly called on to arrest the rapid and dangerous march of another branch of this incomparable system, the Bank of the United States. And here, again, he had to throw himself into the breach, amid the fierce onset of the bank's attack, and cry aloud to his slumbering countrymen, who awoke, and rallied to the standard of their dauntless and incorruptible chief. There could be no division of strength while engaged in this contest. The enemy had, unobserved by the people, grown strong in his power, and insolent in his vanity, setting "both God and man at defiance." The struggle was long and doubtful, the monster showing himself a match for the fame of the hero, the energy and firmness of the President, and the patriotism of the people. This leading member, however, of the hydra family was at length subdued; but he showed himself terrible in the very agonies of death, dealing thick and fast around him the most deadly blows. Even the dread lashings of his tremendous tail—of panics and suspensions—produced soreness and revulsions in our circulation and commerce, afflicting alike to both Government and people.

While the President was engaged with these relatives of the Titan family, there arrived at full age and growth another tall son of the same paternity, who began to render himself conspicuous as a fomentor of discontent, and a disturber of the equal rights of the various interests of the Union. His favorite haunts were in the East, upon which he was concentrating the showers of prosperity, which had before, with undisturbed evenness, fallen upon all the nation alike. He was a great patriot in his professions, and called himself the "patron and protector of our domestic manufactures." In this he was no doubt sincere; but in his devotion to this interest, he forgot that he was sacrificing equal or more important interests, especially agriculture and commerce, and that he was arraying the several sections of the Union against each other, in such manner as to portend the most alarming disasters. It was soon discovered that no interest could long prosper, unless its correlative interests prospered, also, at the same time. Like the fabled war between the different members of the human body, by which each was taught that it was dependent upon the healthful and harmonious coöperation of all the others, the operation of this policy soon proved that it was futile and destructive to discriminate between the various interests of the body-politic, with the view of encouraging some, when it would operate to the expense of others. True to his natural and unavoidable tendencies, however, this evil destroyer of the peace and prosperity of our people, hastened on to a crisis, the dangerous times of his power and influence. Nor do I believe him to have been less inimical to the innocence of the people and perpetuity of our Government; for the surplus revenue, his legitimate offspring, might, in a course of legislation, have undermined the one and ultimately terminated the other. But amid remonstrances the most importunate, and appeals the most fervent against the further continuance of his reign, which were as little heeded as attended to by his votaries, he alighted down in the South, accompanied with his attendant evils, to desolate her fields, and blight her prosperity. Here his destined fate awaited him. It was here he caught a tartar that unhinged all his prospects, and overthrew his ambitious schemes. Like King John of England, when Magna Charta was wrested from him at Runnymede, this king tariff saw at once that his power must be surrendered, and that he must make the best terms he could with those whose substance he was robbing, and whose security he was endangering. He yielded to his fate, and consented to be shorn of his strength, for the boon of a sickly existence till 1842, when it is calculated by the sense of the good people of these United States that he will be permitted to expire in peace, without heirs living at the time, and without a successor.

Sir, (said Mr. M.) I am no friend to nullification, yet, in this instance, I rejoice, yes, heartily rejoice, at the legitimate consequences of South Carolina resistance. Nevertheless, I hold that this remedy, in such a case, may not be used. It is, in my opinion, both dangerous and unlawful; and although, as in this case, good may result from it, yet the most destructive evils might also be its consequence. And although I rejoice at the fall of the tariff, yet, in the graduation of a system of duties for purposes of revenue merely, I should not be averse to a sound discrimination, so as to give to a reasonable extent incidental protection.

I subjoin the following graphic sketch of the rise, tendencies, and fall of the tariff, from the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

"Prior to the late war with Great Britain, our tariffs were revised, and our taxes levied, to supply the wants of Government, however they might operate incidentally on the internal industry of the country. It was never then designed to raise more revenue than was actually necessary to supply our Federal wants. During the war, large investments were made by our capitalists and manufacturers; and when it was over, the principle of our revenue laws was entirely reversed. Our taxes were no longer graduated by the wants of the Government, but by the demands of our capitalists for protection; thus substituting the incident for the principal. Our tariffs were devised without any regard to the condition of our finances, and a broad foundation was laid for a redundant revenue. The consequence was a rapid extinguishment of the public debt, funded and unfunded, of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. Anticipating this redemption, appropriations in every branch of the public service were increased; and still more extensively, to absorb a prospective surplus, new objects of expenditure were sought for, which had been before considered under the jurisdiction of the States. Surveys were authorized, laying the foundation for a Federal system of roads, canals, harbors, and other improvements, sufficient to exhaust any surplus which might possibly occur. Extravagance was deemed patriotic, as designed to perpetuate protection to manufactures. The one was indispensable to the other; and for a time the rights of the tax payer were wholly disregarded." * * * "Notwithstanding these expenditures, foreign as they are to the legitimate duties of a confederated Government, the extravagant tendency of a surplus, and the rapid redemption of our public debt, we have been already compelled to deposit eight-and-twenty millions of dollars with the States. Fortunately, however, this association of protection, surplus, and extravagance, is no longer the policy of our Government. Both Houses, by overwhelming majorities, revived our ancient principle of revenue by the act of the 24 of March 1833. The fourth clause of the third section of that act provides that after the 30th of June, 1842, 'duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government.'"

Mr. M. would now proceed to a statistical examination of the Government expenditures. He had wandered long enough, perhaps too long, though he did not think the digression would be uninteresting to his constituents. And first (said Mr. M.) I will submit a table of the annual expenditures, showing the amount expended each year, for thirteen years next preceding 1838.

Table showing the amounts expended each year, exclusive of the public debt and the Post Office, from the year 1825 to the year 1837, inclusive.

For 1825.....	$11,490,459	For 1832.....	$16,516,368
1826.....	13,063,316	1833.....	22,713,755
1827.....	12,653,095	1834.....	18,425,417
1828.....	13,296,041	1835.....	17,514,950
1829.....	12,660,460	1836.....	30,868,164
1830.....	13,929,633	1837.....	39,164,745
1831.....	13,864,069

In glancing the eye over this tabular statement, it will be seen that the two most appropriate years to be contrasted with each other, in order to account for the sudden increase of the annual expenditures, are the years 1835 and 1836. The sudden rise of the expenditures from $17,000,000, in 1835, to $30,000,000, in 1836, naturally brings up the inquiry, for what did this increase take place, and are its grounds justifiable.

And the remaining excess over 1835 is only.....$31,000

In looking over these items of excess over payments on the same accounts in 1835, it will be seen that most of them are either nominal, being, in fact, no expenditure at all, or such as cannot attach any responsibility to the Administration. Thus, the Chickasaw fund and patent fund are merely nominal. The item of $904,000 for three and five per cent. fund paid to new States is unusually large this year, because a greater quantity of land was sold in 1836 than any other year, and the amount being dependent on the amount received for lands, the Administration is not chargeable therewith. For the increase in pensions, revolutionary claims, and Virginia claims, the Administration is not more blamable than for paying a debt. The excess in the Indian department, is an investment and not an expenditure, being given for lands which will more than repay double the amount of cost. The large excess for repressing Indian hostilities, volunteers, and militia, arming militia, ordnance stores, &c., forage, subsistence, &c., of the Army, fortifications, accouterments, &c., being the results of the Florida and Creek wars, is rather attributable to the misfortunes of the nation than to the fault of the Administration. The burning of the buildings for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, occasions the excess for public buildings.

It is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to submit to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a detailed estimate of the amount of appropriations which will be required for the public service during the current year. Should large appropriations be made beyond the amount recommended in the estimates, Congress assumes this responsibility, and the Administration ought not to be held accountable for the excess beyond the estimate.

The appropriations in 1835 amounted to....$18,347,014 36
The estimates submitted amounted to.....15,660,232 73

Excess of appropriations over estimates..$2,686,781 63

The appropriations for 1836 amounted to....$39,467,844 62
The estimates for the same year amounted to 19,788,933-27

Excess of appropriations over estimates..$19,678,911 18

The appropriations for 1837 amounted to....$39,756,698 75
Amount of estimates for the same year.....22,770,107 57

Excess appropriated over estimates.....$16,986,591 18

If, after recommending a reasonable amount of money for the public service, a much greater or double the amount shall be appropriated, the Executive must see to its application, as directed by law; but, in such case, the responsibility must rest upon Congress.

A full calculation of the expenditures for 1838 is not completed, the several offices and Departments not having yet made report of the respective amounts by them expended. Judging from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the nominal amount will be....$40,000,000
This includes of public debt, or a redemption of Treas'y notes, $8,000,000
Transfer of unexpended appropriation for improvement of the navy to the years 1839 and 1840, and is nominal.....1,500,000

Expenditures of the Government—Mr. Murray.

The excess of this amount over the expenditure of 1829 is made up principally by the following items, to wit:
Florida war.....	$6,592,933
Approp'n for Cherokees..	1,147,067
Removal of Indians, annuities, etc.....	$3,060,000

	371,500
Executive, territorial, judicial, and miscellaneous..	860,000
Protection of the northern frontier.....	625,000
	16,212,406
Leaving, exclusive of above excesses over 1829.....	$14,287,594
The whole amount of expenditure from 1829 to 1837, inclusive, is $184,957,479. The average annual expenditure for the same years amount to.....
	$20,550,831
The whole amount expended from 1825 to 1828, inclusive, is $50,501,911. The average annual expenditure during the same years amounts to.....
	12,625,477
Annual average excess of the last nine over former four years.....	7,925,354
From this deduct average annual excess of certain items of expenditure during nine years, over annual sums expended on same account during said period of four years, and for which the Administration is not properly chargeable or responsible, viz:
The annual average excess of pensions.....	$1,013,758
Of expenses of Indian department.....	1,125,942
Of trust funds for Indians, and indemnities from foreign Powers.....	568,333
Of revolutionary claims, and balances due to States...	279,043
Of sums paid new States on account of three and five per cent. fund.....	184,333
Of duties refunded on drawbacks and debentures...	144,334
Of judicial department....	102,806
Of census.....	44,667
Of expenditures on account of Indian wars, Black Hawk, Creek, and Seminole, amounting in all to $15,500,000, prior to 1838,	1,722,222
	5,185,438
Which leaves the true annual excess,	$2,739,916
No reasonable man would attempt to hold the Administration responsible for the items of expenditure above deducted. Were such an attempt made, it would be futile. The Administration is no more chargeable for the increase of pensions, for payments of revolutionary claims, balances due States, or repayment of duties on drawbacks and debentures, than for the payment of the national debt. The trust funds are properly no expenditure at all; and so far as concerns the indemnities from foreign Governments, which constitute the greater portion of these funds, they are clear gains to the country, and not expenditures. By the terms of their admission the new States are entitled to a per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands given in consideration of their agreement not to tax these lands. The amount which they receive annually from this fund depends on the quantity sold of the public land, for which the Administration is not responsible. In 1836 the proceeds of public lands was swelled to $24,877,000. This item, therefore, is properly deducted. For the expenditures of the Indian department, being on account of purchases of Indian lands, the Administration is not more responsible than was Mr. Jefferson for the fifteen millions paid for Louisiana, or Mr. Monroe for the five millions paid to Spain for Florida. The census and increase in the number of judges and other officers, from an extension of the circuit courts, &c., to the new States, constitute charges of necessity, for which the Administration is not blamable. For the money expended in the Indian wars, the Administration is not more blamable or responsible than was Mr. Madison for the expenses of the late war with Great Britain. In these expenditures, therefore, there is no "profligate extravagance, no corrupt feeding of Treasury rats."

The remainder of the average annual excess of expenditure is composed in part of the average annual excess of expenditure for the same nine years over average annual expenditures for the same items during the four preceding years, to wit:

Navy establishment.....	$415,995
Armories, arsenals, barracks, and quarters.....	163,000
Ordnance and ordnance stores.....	65,166
Fortifications.....	149,116
Congress and printing for Congress...	181,777
Light-houses.....	95,000
Internal improvements, including rivers, creeks, harbors, &c., and excluding Alexandria canal and Potomac bridge	324,000

Total annual average excess for these items.....$1,399,054
Which deducted from the general annual average excess of $2,739,916, leaves an average annual excess still remaining of $1,340,862.

Another principal item of increase, that of surveys, is not included. The excess of expenditure for the various items first above cited was, in part, thrown upon the Administration by its success and good fortune, as in case of the foreign indemnities and the various purchases of Indian lands; in part by national misfortunes, as in case of the several Indian wars. But all of them either support themselves, as in case of the three and five per cent. fund paid to new States, or are temporary in their character, having already expired or being shortly to expire. The aggregate amount of excess for the last-named items for nine years is $12,067,758 greater than would be the amount of expenditure on same account in nine years, at the rate of expenditure therefore, from 1825 to 1828 inclusive. How far the people may be disposed to sanction this increase when they come to consider the wonderful growth of this mighty nation, I leave them to determine. A large portion of it is not such as I approve myself; but whatever may be the decision of the people respecting this matter, the Opposition are wholly precluded from blaming or abusing the Administration for this increase. The measures by which it has been effected have generally received their strongest support from the Opposition; and gentlemen of that party cannot with more reason hold the Administration responsible therefor than for the deposit of $28,101,000 with the States, which received the most cordial support of the Opposition. The greatest increase in these items has grown out of large appropriations for internal improvements, light-houses, and the Navy; the increase in the last being partly attributable to the exploring expedition. For light-houses and improvements on roads, canals, rivers, and sea-coast, the Opposition have always voted, and are always demanding more. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, suggested a retrenchment in expenditures for these objects, noticing, at the same time, that they were rapidly increasing every year to an extent unwarranted and impolitic. How was this responded to by the Opposition? The whole party abused him for suggesting the retrenchment, and some of them made the usual charge that he was attempting to dictate to Congress. "Our commerce must be broken down," says the party organ in this city, "but not one of the Treasury leeches of the Administration departments to be dispensed with." I quote from memory, but this is the substance of the editorial remark. How far the clerks in the several departments might be curtailed in number, or whether curtailed at all, I do not know. But one thing I do know: the augmentation of public business in those departments has been, within the last ten years, beyond all conception, and I discover that business in many of them is always in arrear. The business in the Land Office department, since the administration of Mr. Adams, from the entry of public lands alone, has increased tenfold, and there must be something like a corresponding increase in most of the other departments. There has been more than a corresponding increase in the labors imposed upon them by this and the other branch of Congress, which have now become onerous in the extreme. One of the items of annual excess of expenditure submitted in the foregoing statement is that of Congress and printing for Congress, the annual excess over average annual expenditure therefor, under Mr. Adams's administration, being $181,777. This is owing, in part, to the great number of resolutions passed by this or the other House of Congress, calling upon the departments for copies of papers, records, correspondences, &c., under the plea of information. Look at your executive documents of last session, mostly made up in this way, and reaching the enormous dimensions of twelve volumes in the House and six in the Senate; in all, eighteen volumes, each one as large as the "big hall Bible." They have to be copied by the clerks in the Departments, and then printed, (some of them several times over,) bound, and distributed. Is it any wonder that so many clerks are required, when all this is superadded to their ordinary and official duties? Instances are common of ten or a dozen clerks being at work for several months to prepare an answer to a single call. But the other day I read the published note of the Solicitor of the Treasury, stating that he had directed the labor necessary to answer a single call to be examined and estimated, and that it would take an expert clerk five years and some months to copy the papers. It is notorious that seven eighths of these calls are made by Opposition members, and that two thirds of the documents obtained in answer are scarcely ever examined even by the member making the call. Who, then, are most responsible for the increase of clerk service, and for the swollen expenditures of Congress? Why, sir, it has taken four hundred reams of paper to envelope three speeches alone of the Opposition, besides the labor of pages, messengers, superintendents, &c., in folding and preparing the huge mass for the frank. I allude to the speech of Mr. BINNEY, of Philadelphia, at the panic session in 1834, and the speeches of a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND,] during the last session. Now, sir, I am not complaining of all this; but are the friends of the Administration to be charged with all this extravagance? If we make the least show of resistance against these numerous calls on the Departments, we are instantly charged by fifty voices with an attempt to suppress information which would subject us to exposure, and that we evince a disposition to remain in the dark "because our deeds are evil."

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) until I was more familiar with the manner in which things are done here, I was at a loss to know how an argument, solely for party effect, could be made out, with all the plausibility of truth, giving facts and figures, and quoting the record with the utmost exactitude, and yet be false in effect, unfair, and unjust, to both the Administration and the people. As I am now beginning to understand this matter, I will say a word in relation to it, that the people may be warned to be on their guard, and to examine fully before they give in adhesion their belief, as it is not everything that shines in the dark that is fire in reality, but often turns out, on examination, to be fox-fire, or something else. Well, sir, to give you an example: a plain, honest farmer in the country takes up a speech made in Congress by some worthy orthodox high priest of the Opposition, and he reads that "the expenditures in 1828 amounted to $13,296,041, and that the expenditures of 1837 are $39,164,000." He sees that the latter sum is three times the amount of the former, and as the speech is replete with the high-sounding epithets of "corruption," "extravagance," "wastefulness," "public plunderers," &c.—for these gentlemen have a vein of great richness in coining such terms—he feels himself grow indignant at the manner in which the Administration is imposing on the public. Now it never occurs to the honest man, that although the Whig orator is telling the truth, he omits to tell the whole truth, and to make the proper explanations required by candor and fairness. He is not informed that the expenditure stated for 1828 is the ordinary and current expenditure of that year, and that the amount stated for 1837 is the gross expenditure, including all sums, ordinary and extraordinary, and several millions of dollars besides. He is not told that the whole expenditure of 1828, including public debt, &c., amounted to $25,459,000; and that in the stated amount expended in 1837, there is included $5,610,404 of trust funds for Indian tribes, and indemnities recovered from other Governments for our own citizens, and which are, in fact, no expenditure at all. Nor is he informed that the excess of pensions in 1837, over the amount of pensions in 1828, is $1,821,000, and that this sum is increased to about $12,000,000 by expenses of Florida war, repayments on drawbacks and debentures, three and five per cent. funds to new States, and investments for Indian lands, for all of which no reasonable man will hold the Administration responsible. Still less is he told of the necessary augmentation in our expenditures from the great increase in the growth of the country, and in all the departments of business, besides extraordinary appropriations for improvements, for the benefit of commerce, exploring expedition, &c., many of which owe their paternity to the Opposition themselves.

Now, sir, (continued Mr. M.) if implicit credence be given by the people to the oft-reiterated charges in reference to the late defalcations, which have been made to give force and spirit to the ceaseless torrent of abuse which has, without stint or mercy, been poured upon the Administration from the commencement of this session to the present time, they must have concluded that a new era of corruption and waste had taken place in the history of the Government. They could come to no other conclusion than that little or no money was ever lost by the Government until General Jackson was called to the Presidency. Surely they must have been lost in wonder, ay, horror struck, at the wastefulness and prodigality of that incompetent and reckless functionary. Still more must they have wondered at the inconceivable folly of advocating any other mode of keeping safely the public moneys, than that of permitting the bank corporations of the country to keep and manage all our financial matters, seeing that every sensible man must know that speculators are more to be trusted than anybody else. Yes, they are more considerate and righteous, coming up even to the scriptural injunctions; for when they find you a "stranger" they "take you in." Imagine, if you can, such an interesting crisis during this supposed painful suspense in the public mind, and think of the cruelty of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN] who, contumaciously and rudely, without introduction or welcome, comes forward, armed, too, with the records of the Government, and, without prelude or apology, tells the whole story, backed by the record by which the mist is dispelled, and everything put back where it was before. Yes, he had the audacity to affirm, and to prove it, also, that the "losses were fewer, and less in amount, during the Administration of General Jackson, and this Administration, so far as it had progressed, by more than one half, than the average losses of all the preceding Administrations, although the collections and disbursements were more than double, and that the heaviest losses sustained by both the late and present Administrations, were owing to the failures of banks and merchants."

He showed you that upwards of $6,000,000 had been lost to the Government by banks prior to President Jackson's term of service; that of this amount there was lost by depreciation of bank paper, under Mr. Madison's administration, $5,000,000; that $800,000 was lost by banks under Mr. Monroe's, $270,000 under Mr. Adams's, and $42,000 under General Jackson's administrations. This statement of the honorable gentleman, so far from being extravagant, is, in fact, short of the real amount lost on this account. In a letter of the Secretary to an honorable Senator in the other end of the Capitol, during last session, in answer to an inquiry made respecting this subject, he says, in speaking of the amount lost by banks, "that near $1,076,000 stands against 'old bank depositories. The loss to the Treasury, 'by taking depreciated notes in 1814-'15-'16-'17, 'is estimated at quite $5,500,000; and there is now 'on hand, of such notes then received, and never 'paid away or collected, about $50,000 more." He also speaks of large probable losses by the late deposit banks, including depreciation of their paper.

The gentleman from Ohio showed you that $1,028,000 had been lost by collectors of duties, including marshals and attorneys, since the commencement of the Government; $60,000 of which only was lost under President Jackson.

That of $403,000 lost by receivers for public lands, $200,000 occurred since General Jackson came into power, which, though equal in amount to what was lost before, is, nevertheless, one hundred per cent. less, when you recur to the fact that twice as much land has been sold since the 4th of March, 1829, as was sold previous to that time.

That of $6,500,000 lost upon merchant's bonds, $6,000,000 were lost previous to the 4th of March, 1829, and that of the remaining $500,000, part was lost upon bonds falling due subsequent to that date, but which were executed previous to that time, and for which the Administration was not responsible. By turning to Senate document No. 503, you will there find a list of forfeited unpaid duty bonds to the number of many thousand, with the name of each delinquent, and the amount lost on each bond. The money lost on the bonds of a single man, [Edward Thompson,] nearly all of which were executed in 1825, after Mr. Adams came into power, amounts to nearly $700,000. I do not mention this to cast any reflection on his administration, which may not have been any more to blame than any other creditor of an insolvent, it being more the misfortune of the Government than the fault of the President. Yet the unreasonable attempt is made to hold the late and present Administration responsible for all such cases. The whole "sum which will be eventually lost" on these bonds, says the Secretary of the Treasury, "will not vary much from $6,500,000."

It seems there were some two thousand three hundred defaulting disbursing officers prior to the commencement of President Jackson's first term of service, and some forty more during his Administration. That by these officers the Government lost upwards of $4,100,000, previous to the above term, and about $100,000 during its continuance. The whole amount lost since 1789, is upwards of $18,000,000, a comparatively small portion of which was lost under General Jackson's administration. With all these facts staring us full in the face, let me now ask you, sir, what becomes of the question asked by my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] the other day—why was it, that as honest men could not be, or were not, selected during the last and present Administrations, to fill the Government offices, as did fill them under the former Administrations—a question, sir, which he asked with great apparent confidence, and as readily answered it himself with great felicity and self-complacency, for which all know my able and worthy colleague, whom I much esteem, is very remarkable. Why was it that my colleague asked such a question, when it was not possible for it to be sustained by facts? It was, sir, because the very great and numerous labors of that gentleman had prevented him from looking into the facts, and he was like many others, led away by the cry of fire, fire, when there was no fire. Sir, I am only astonished, as every unbiased man must be, on examination of the facts, that the amount of money lost since the commencement of the first term of President Jackson is not much greater. Certainly the hazards and responsibilities of his Administration were much greater than those of previous Administrations. The unparalleled extension of our territory, and the immense quantity of public lands brought into market, greatly multiplied the number of receivers and other officers. The same is true in reference to officers of the customs. The unparalleled increase of our tonnage, from one to two millions in nine years, is proof of this. But the great increase in the amount of money which has passed through the hands of our officers is conclusive. The largest amount of money received for public lands, during any one year of Mr. Adams's administration, is $1,495,845. The amount received on the same account in 1836, is $24,877,179. The largest amount of revenue received any one year preceding 1829, is $24,844,000. The amount received in 1836, is $50,826,000. Add to this the unheard-of increase of bank note circulation, which rose to $140,000,000, the large amount of public money on hand, which was at one time upwards of $50,000,000, the general extravagance and wastefulness which pervaded every section of the country, and every rank of society, and the madness of speculation with which the times were ominous, and what living, honest, unbiased man, is not surprised that the loss of public money falls so far short of corresponding losses in preceding years?

By the general suspension of specie payments many public officers became defaulters to the Government for the time being. The banks to the amount of more than $20,000,000. The Government had to give them time, in consequence of which the ultimate payment of most of the money was secured. The respective sums due by most of the defaulting officers have also been secured. The defalcations were not such as ordinarily occur. They were the unavoidable offspring of the unusual and extraordinary times that produced them.

This must be clear to every discriminating mind that is not blinded by prejudice. The general revulsion was an untoward and unprecedented storm, which upset the whole monetary system, which carried with it in its fall "the beggar and the king," the citizen and the corporation. None were exempt, whether natural or artificial persons. Even the Government had to share in the general discomfiture, which was deep and wide as the commerce of the world. Amid the disasters of the times, which spared neither the Government, the banks, or the people, were all the numerous collecting, receiving, and disbursing officers of the Government to escape? Who expected that such would be the case? Nobody. If not, does it furnish any evidence of dishonesty or corruption in the Administration? Certainly not. Where, then, is the soothing voice of charity, even of justice, that would not visit the penalties of guilt upon the innocent? Alas! for our blindness to our frailties! We forget to "first cast the beam out of our own eye," that we may "see clearly to cast the mote out of our brother's."

But when the general consternation occasioned by the suspension passed by, and confidence resumed her wonted place in the community, all interests began to right themselves. The defaulting banks secured most of their balances, and so did most receivers and collectors. There had been little destruction of means. A suspension of business constituted the general affliction, which passed away upon the resumption which followed; and although gentlemen have told us, day after day, about the large amounts lost by Linn, Spencer, Harris, and Boyd, receivers of public moneys, and Reckless, a collector, yet it seems that ultimate collections for the balances against them will be made. Reckless, it seems, was properly no defaulter, but finding there was a balance against him of some thirty or fifty dollars, he paid the money. As to the condition of the balances against the four receivers, the following note from the Secretary of the Treasury to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] will show:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 31, 1838.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 28th instant, I would observe, that in the document No. 111, sent to the House of Representatives in January last, Mr. Harris, the receiver in note No. 48 on page 39, is stated to have paid part of his balance, and the remainder to be well secured.

In Mr. Boyd's case, it is understood that the balance is well secured and in the course of collection. Such is presumed to be the balance against Linn, it being in suit, and one of the sureties of the latter being Governor Duncan, of Illinois. He was not in default when reappointed.

These officers were all dismissed, or they resigned as soon as the balances against them, appearing in the current returns, were not paid over as directed, or satisfactory reasons not given for postponement.

Spencer is not, and never has been, a defaulter on the books to my knowledge. He once delayed making a deposit from badness of the roads, but it was made as soon as they became passable.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY.

Hon. A. DUNCAN, House of Representatives.

The defalcation of Mr. Swartwout for nearly one and a quarter millions of dollars has not been embraced in the foregoing views. According to the report of the First Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury, this defalcation commenced and "increased gradually from the first quarter of 1830 to the end of the first quarter of 1833, when his official term expired." The message of the President at the commencement of this session informed us that "a change in the office of collector at one of our principal ports (New York) has brought to light a defalcation of the 'gravest character.'" This enormous defaulter appears to have escaped suspicion during his whole term of service, and until discovered by his successor, Mr. Hoyt, whose great vigilance in this matter, says the National Intelligencer, entitles him to great credit. This defalcation has been the subject of great abuse in this House, as though the fate of the Administration depended upon it. And here, again, the credit part of the account is not given. The people are left to infer that the money is all lost. The First Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury, in the report referred to, inform us that they "have every reason to believe that the security of Mr. Swartwout's official bond is amply sufficient for its amount."

Again, the Solicitor says:

"On examining the letter of attorney from Mr. Swartwout to Mr. Ogden, I found that it conferred on the latter the fullest agency. He was entirely impressed with the propriety of adopting, under it, such measures for the security of the United States as were in his power. He has paid over to me $30,000 in cash," &c. "Mr. Ogden has also executed, as the attorney of Mr. Swartwout, three mortgages of all his property in the States of New York, New Jersey, and Maryland." "These mortgages include the house and lots in this city, the large and valuable meadow property at Hoboken, and the interest in the coal lands at Cumberland. As to their value, I have no means of forming an opinion, but it is rated by Mr. Ogden at a very large amount."

These extracts show that the large amount for which Mr. Swartwout is in default, is not all lost. That all can ever be obtained, is not to be expected. The evidence here given, nevertheless, leaves but little doubt that a large portion of it is secure.

I have no apology (said Mr. M.) to make for defaulters. The bitter denunciations against them are no doubt merited; and they shall have no commiseration from me. But surely gentlemen cannot be so blind as not to see that it is utterly impossible for them to make up a great party issue on this point with the friends of the Administration. It is too plain that such an issue would be false, and foreign to the great points in contest between the two great political parties. No! it is rather a dernier resort—a forlorn hope—which, though precarious, is all that is left to lay hold of, after being foiled at every other point. Every other subject which could be pressed into service, has been used to alarm and frighten the people heretofore, and this one must subserve the purposes of the present occasion. Gentlemen, however, have rung the alarm bell so often heretofore, when no injury followed, and no well-founded signs of danger were discoverable, that they would now find some difficulty in exciting the public fears, even if there were now cause of alarm in every deed. But there is none on this, any more than on former occasions, either to alarm or endanger the cause of that party whose cause is the people's, and who have been struggling to preserve and inculcate, by the merit of its pretensions, the only true political principles upon which this Government ever can successfully, or, in my humble opinion, ever ought, to be administered. It is certainly cause of regret that defalcations should take place at any time; but surely the misconduct of a subordinate officer furnishes no more reason for opposing the Administration, than for opposing the Government itself, of which he has shown himself an unworthy member. The defalcation of a public officer cannot, and ought not, to contaminate the cause of an Administration which gave him employ. The apostasy of Judas Iscariot could not be urged as an objection to the cause of the Redeemer, or cast any obloquy upon his former associates. The vile conduct of an unworthy member of the church could not blacken or disparage the cause of truth and religion. What friend of his country would have affirmed, during the most eventful crisis of our history, that the cause of Washington and his compatriots was dishonored by the treachery of Arnold? Yet such are the unreasonable conclusions to which gentlemen must arrive, from the positions they assume and the arguments they advance.

Nor can the charges here fulminated militate against the fair standing of the public functionaries at the head of the Government, unless it can be shown that they connived at the alleged delinquencies. But this cannot be pretended with any semblance of justice. I am aware that through "life's devious course," it is much easier to find fault than to escape error. But the conduct of the Executive and his much-abused Secretary of the Treasury, so far as any corrupt motive or criminal delinquency is concerned, will survive unscathed the severest scrutiny. Not a blot will be left to obscure the unimpeachable brightness of their escutcheon. Why, then, is so much of the time of this House, so precious to the nation, and so costly to the people, employed in denunciation and invective? I will tell you, sir, (said Mr. M.) It is to keep up the late alarms with which the people were so dolorously saluted from this Hall. It is to let down the tail of the late panic by a gradual process, or it is, if possible, to reanimate and form again the broken phalanx, the flying legions of the Opposition, and bring them again to the charge upon some point more vulnerable than they have heretofore attacked. Above all, it is to divert the attention of the people from the true principles in contest between the contending parties, and to form with the Administration an immaterial and false issue, upon which to put themselves for trial upon the country. Suppose we go to trial upon these charges in reference to the late defalcations. Do the Opposition hazard anything in such a trial? If they fail in obtaining a verdict on their charges against the Administration, they lose nothing; no decision is given against their political principles. If they succeed, on their charges, the Administration loses all. Can the great principles for which we contend be dependent upon the merit or demerit, the fidelity or delinquency of a collector of customs or a receiver for public lands? The people are competent to answer such a question.

An apparent determination on the part of the Opposition to obstruct the public business has been one order of battle since the commencement of the present Congress. This floor has been the almost daily stage from which gentlemen address their constituents for the purpose of arousing party prejudices. Much zeal has been manifested on former occasions to thwart the necessary measures of legislation with the view of leaving the public service unprovided for. Nor has the national honor or national safety furnished any security against these partisan attacks, the heaviest blows being often leveled against the character of the nation when it was supposed the character of the Administration could be reached thereby. And although designed exclusively for the transaction of the public business, this House must be the place, and each session the time, to fight over the party conflict. We meet, sir, not to transact the public business, but to embarrass it. Not to provide for the public service, but to cripple and break it down. Not to redeem the public faith, but to violate it. Not to strengthen the public confidence, but to wake up dormant and imaginary suspicions. Not to maintain the national honor, but, if possible, to disgrace the Administration. We make speeches, not to allay party excitement, but to fan its devouring flame. Not to enlighten the public mind, but to "darken counsel" and bewilder the judgment. Why, sir, could the people be here from the distant corners of this wide-extended Republic, and see us

"Play such fantastic tricks

Before high heaven," they would cry, "Shame! shame! Is there no American blood to suffuse the cheek with the crimson blush? Is there no patriotic spirit to prompt to nobler action? These walls were not made to echo the jarring sounds of discord. This Hall was not constructed to be desecrated with mere party oblations."

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

SPEECH OF HON. ISAAC E. CRARY,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 30, 1839,

On the motion to refer the various topics embraced in the President's Annual Message to the appropriate committees.

Mr. CRARY rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: As the committee have disposed of the most important resolutions growing out of the message of the President, I hope they will indulge me in a reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Mason,] who has just taken his seat, and also to those of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Bell,] who occupied the floor some days since.

If my memory serves me, the gentleman from Ohio has assumed very different ground in regard to the Supreme Court, from that occupied by him some three years ago. He then considered this court an improper tribunal to decide the grave and highly important question between his own State and that which I have the honor to represent on this floor. The court then had none of that holy infallibility now claimed for it. It was too insignificant a body to sit in judgment upon the claims of a sovereign State. Congress must decide the question; and Congress did decide it, with the gentleman from Ohio acting as one of the judges. This, however, was only a temporary alienation of mind from the object of his affections. With that decision, he returns again to the embraces of his early love. The court is once more restored to favor, and looked upon "as the only stay and support of our institutions," as the only branch of the Government to which we "can safely trust the exercise of power." In the opinion of the gentleman, we ought not hereafter "to go to the White House to learn constitutional law," or either Hall of Congress, but to the purlieus of the Supreme Court. There we can hear the response of the oracles, and see the priests of the Constitution adorned with black gowns, and fixing, by their fat, the destinies of nations. Verily, Ephraim is joined to his idols.

I could not agree with the gentleman on the occasion alluded to, and I cannot agree with him now. So far from considering the Supreme Court "free from political bias," I have long been in the habit of looking upon it as a political body. Its very organization, the habits of the men who sit there in judgment, the nature of the cases which come before it, all tend to give it a political character. A majority of the Court has at all times been made up of men claiming the rank of statesmen. It is their delight and glory to pass upon the liberties and immunities of sovereign States; to bring before them the acts of ministers and governors and presidents; to sit in judgment on the powers of corporations, the validity of contracts, the rights of war, the nature of treaties, and, in fine, upon the very existence of nations. These high powers cannot be exercised without calling forth political feelings and party predilections. They necessarily make the court a political body, and of the very worst character for a Republic. The members cannot easily be removed for abuse of office; they cannot be operated upon by the healthy influence of a sound public opinion; they wear their ermine during "good behavior," which, being interpreted, means till death. And this is not all. As soon as they are transferred to the bench they apply themselves to the study of British law and British precedents, and administer this law and these precedents as though they were the rich first fruits of the seeds of our institutions. The Supreme Court is the stationary political branch of the Government; and if it would have the universal veneration of the people of this country, it must see to it that it no longer adopts the exploded maxim of the law, "that it is the part of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction."

The gentleman from Ohio may sneer at the "constitutional law of the White House," yet many a correct decision had been made there. The one first alluded to by him has ever met my approbation. Never were words more fully spoken. The President should interpret the Constitution as he understands it, and so should every member of this House. This we are sworn to do when we take our seats on this floor; and this the President is sworn to do in the words of the Constitution itself. The language to which exception is taken, was used by General Jackson in his bank veto message of the 10th of July, 1832. Here it is:

"If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act, it ought not to control the coordinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the court, must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution, swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President, to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval, as it is of the supreme judges, when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges, and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative capacity, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve."

Admitting the Supreme Court to have decided the bank to be constitutional, was not the President justified in using these very words? A bill was before him for signature; he considered its provisions a violation of the Constitution, and he refused to sign it. Did he violate the Constitution? Should he have consulted the Supreme Court or any of the decisions of that court? This was no part of his duty. If he believed the bill to be unconstitutional, it was his privilege to say so, and "return it with his objections to the House in which it originated."

The gentleman from Ohio thinks the late President claimed the exercise of a high-handed responsibility in an unofficial communication to his Cabinet in 1833, when the proposition was before them for a change of the deposits. I have often read over that communication, but never discovered in it any expressions deserving of censure. There is matter for grave and serious reflection. Some of the language is oracular. It foretells the evils that have befallen us by reason of the connection between bank and State. The President said that the banking power of the country ought to be entirely separated from the political power. Time has verified his opinions. We are already engaged in the warfare of separation; we may not succeed immediately, but we shall not fail, for the people have willed it, and "too often have they gained the victory in darker days than these, and with feeble forces than they now have at their command, to despair, or bate a jot of heart or hope." But, sir, let us have the language of the President on that occasion:

"As one of the most serious objections to the Bank of the United States is the power which it concentrates, care must be taken, in finding other agents for the service of the Treasury, not to raise up another power equally formidable. Although it would probably be impossible to produce such a result by any organization of the State banks which could be devised, yet it is desirable to avoid even the appearance. To this end it would be expedient to assume no more power over them, and interfere no more in their affairs than might be absolutely necessary to the security of the public deposits, and the faithful performance of these duties as agents of the Treasury. Any interference by them in the political contests of the country, with a view to influence elections, ought, in the opinion of the President, to be followed by an immediate discharge from the public service."

"It is the desire of the President that the control of the banks and the currency shall, as far as possible, be entirely separated from the political power of the country, as well as wrested from an institution which has already attempted to subject the Government to its will. In his opinion, the action of the General Government on this subject ought not to extend beyond the grant in the Constitution, which only authorizes Congress "to coin money and regulate the value thereof;" all else belongs to the States and the people, and must be regulated by public opinion and the interests of trade."

"Viewing it as a question of transcendent importance, both in the principles and consequences it involves, the President could not, in justice to the responsibility which he owes to the country, refrain from pressing upon the Secretary of the Treasury his view of the considerations which impel to immediate action. Upon him has been devolved, by the Constitution and the suffrages of the American people, the duty of superintending the operation of the Executive Departments of the Government, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. In the performance of this high trust, it is his undoubted right to express to those whom the laws and his own choice have made his associates in the administration of the Government, his opinions of their duties under circumstances as they arise. It is this right which he now exercises."

"Its responsibility has been assumed, after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press and the purity of the elective franchise; without which, all will unite in saying that the blood and treasure expended by our forefathers in the establishment of our happy system of Government will have been vain and fruitless."

Here is the whole of the responsibility claimed by the President. Does it exceed the limit of power conferred in the words of the Constitution? Does it transgress that clause which says that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed?" No, sir. The Constitution was not violated; and it was no such cause that made the welkin ring with the cry of tyranny. It was the occasion on which the language was uttered, and the object against which the responsibility claimed was exercised, that constituted the never to be forgiven offense. It struck a blow at the fair prospects of a great and powerful party in the country. It took from them their means of contaminating "the morals of the people," destroying "the freedom of the press," and corrupting "the purity of the elective franchise." Hence their persecuting cry of tyranny, of a violation of the Constitution. But the President assumed the responsibility, and the effects of it will be felt until the visions of the friends of our institutions are realized, and the prayers of the philanthropist are heard and answered.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] That gentleman occupies too distinguished a position on this floor not to receive an occasional attention. He is one of the field marshals of the grand army of opposition, and can, on an emergency, bring into the field more than the forces of a single State. Following the example of generals in a different service, he seldom shows himself in the thickest of the fight, unless it be necessary to turn a flank or storm a redoubt. At other times he takes up a commanding position in the rear of his forces, where he can readily be consulted by his numerous aids-de-camp.

The gentleman from Tennessee has made war upon the message, because it alludes to a probable danger to our institutions from the "anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth." He thinks these tendencies are not as great or as dangerous "as the tendency of power to accumulate in the hands of one man." None but a mind corroded by ambition and sore disappointment could have dreamed of such a tendency to power at the present time. It is setting in the very opposite direction, as I shall by-and-by have occasion to show. Thus much cannot be said of the tendency of associated wealth. The most casual observer must have seen its anti-republican character. You cannot go into a city of the Union where you will not discover its all-pervading influence. Corporate powers have been granted for such a multiplicity of objects, that the rights of the individual are fast sinking into insignificance. Even here, where the influence of these associations should be felt the least, with what facility do they accomplish their selfish purposes. If they become defaulters to the Government, a law is immediately passed to extend to them lenity; but if an individual uses your money, there are no epithets of reproach that you will not heap upon him, no punishment that you do not think he richly deserves. If a company send in a petition for a drawback on iron to be used in the construction of a railroad, the Committee on Manufactures give a favorable answer to the prayer, and the bill goes through the House with scarcely a dissentient voice. But let an individual apply for such a drawback on the material to be manufactured by him into axes for the prostration of the western forests; into scythes for the use of the farmers, or into ships for the navigation of the ocean or your own inland waters, and his petition will lie here till doomsday without consideration. Is there such a difference in these cases that the one must be hurried through all the forms of legislation, and the other never receive any action at all? Your railroad may be for the benefit of the country, but it more especially benefits the stockholders. The profits go to the stockholders, and your drawback enables them to dispose of their stock in the market for their own aggrandizement. Why, then, give a drawback in the one case, when you will not allow it in the other? It is as important to the country for the farmer and mechanic to have their capital cheap, as for the stockholders of corporations. In the one case you bless the many, in the other you but enrich the few.

In a Republic the law should operate equally upon all, and every divergence from this rule is contrary to the genius of our institutions. We have legislated long enough for the interests of the moneyed power; let us hereafter attend to the interests of the "entire people." We shall then hearless about Agrarians and Locofocos, and more about the prosperity and happiness of those whose hard hands have cleared the way for our greatness; and, under many a disadvantage, have made us the most powerful of nations. In making these remarks, I do not intend to deny the importance and utility of many of these associations. They have grown out of our condition, and are the natural results of an enterprising people. But they have had bestowed upon them more than their share of favor and attention. The time has come when it behooves us to see well to it; that we do not, by these grants of power entail upon those who are to come after us, evils that they can only get rid of by a resort to revolution.

Mr. Chairman, the President probably refers to the banking institutions of the country. In doing so, however, he expressly disavows any "hostility, official or personal, to those institutions." He wishes to see them "protected in the exercise of rights conferred by law," and does not doubt their "utility when properly managed in promoting the interests of trade, and through that channel the other interests of the community." He is "opposed to their creation in the form of exclusive privileges," and "desires to see the community protected against the consequences of their occasional mismanagement." In these views the great Democratic party of the country unite. The assertion, so often reiterated here, and elsewhere, that this party are opposed to banking institutions, is without foundation. It is a gross and malicious libel. We are at war—not with banking, or the credit which it honestly gives—but with its abuses, its monopolizing character, its anti-republican tendency.

It is not to be denied that there is great diversity of opinion among Democrats as to the proper system of banking to be sustained by the country. Some are in favor of having the business done by State institutions; others by joint-stock companies. Some would intrust the power to chartered associations; while others would regulate it by general laws, operating equally upon all. The latter plan has been adopted by my own State; but it has had to encounter much opposition, and may be superseded by a State institution. The law took effect at a disastrous period in the currency and credit of the country; when specie payments were suspended, and bank bills had no standard by which their value could be measured. Too many associations were formed, and there was an over-issue of bank obligations; but the return to specie payments rapidly corrected the evil, and bankers were taught that there are times and periods when banking operations can only be carried on by the possession of actual capital, and available exchangeable products.

This banking mania was natural. It was the first fruit of freedom after an age of interdictions and restrictions. These had induced the community to believe that great profits were to be realized from the trade, and the removal of them created a general disposition to rush into it without a due consideration of the fact that lenders, as well as borrowers, are necessary to the existence of such institutions. They were established among borrowers, and where only small amounts of capital could be used to advantage. They shared the fate that always awaits every premature attempt to extend the division of labor. But a failure from such causes is not to be used as an argument against a system of free banking, established on a proper foundation. Chartered associations have failed from similar causes, and even State institutions have been unable to redeem their promises. Our motto for the seas has been, "free trade and sailors' rights;" the improved modes of thinking of modern times will soon cause it to be our motto for the land. When that time comes, the abuses of banking will be corrected, its monopolizing character destroyed, and its anti-republican tendency abated. Capital will find its own level, and labor its own reward.

But, sir, let us return once more to the consideration of the "anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth." In what State of the Union have they not been manifested? Look at the action of this associated wealth in suspending specie payments without authority of law. The mandates of Bonaparte were never more imperious than were our banking institutions on that occasion. They said to trade, perish! and it perished without a murmur. They said to commerce, die! and it died without a struggle. Your merchants shut up their shops, and your ships were laid up at the wharves. With millions of specie in their vaults, these institutions put the community at defiance, and, in many instances, dictated to the sovereign power the conditions of peace. They entered the arena of politics, called conventions, deliberated on the condition of the country, regulated the laws of trade, and attempted to prescribe the course of action in this body. The moneyed king issued his proclamation, condemned the Treasury circular, impeached the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury in the distribution of the surplus revenue, attacked the message of the President at the extra session, and commanded his liege subjects to retreat behind their "cotton bags." We have seen them, at a late election in one of the largest States of the Union, uniting to overthrow a party in power for the purpose of perpetuating the reign of shipplasters, and of enabling their friends, on gaining the victory, to inscribe on their banners, "No sub-treasurers for the Empire State."

But the anti-republican tendency of associated wealth is not confined to our own country. The first English association for trading with the East Indies originated with a capital of about $150,000. This capital has been augmented from time to time until it now amounts to almost $30,000,000. The association commenced as a trading company, but the cupidity of the counting-house was soon united with the honor of the soldier; the merchant became a conqueror, the trader a king. They have despoiled one of the fairest portions of the globe, have waged relentless wars for plunder, murdered millions for their gold, and devastated a continent for the sake of power. There is no act of cruelty, injustice, fraud, rapine, tyranny, and baseness which does not stain the history of the career of this association. Verily, associated wealth has an anti-republican tendency. It not only uses its power to control the laws of trade and the politics of State, but to govern the destinies of nations. Such a power should be watched by the friends of Democratic institutions with never-ceasing vigilance. It is concentrating itself for a fearful struggle, and on the issue will depend the question whether the few, a class, are to predominate, or whether the many, the people, shall rule. I have no fears of the final result. The people will come off more than conquerors.

The gentleman from Tennessee denies the influence of the mass of the people in the conduct of our national affairs. He says "never before" were the mass of the community so powerless. "They have nothing to do but to follow blindly, and give their sanction to schemes and measures dictated by the heads of the party, some three or four men at most." This may be a correct representation of the condition of the Opposition, but it is not true when applied to the mass of the community. Their power was never greater than at the present moment. They never before enjoyed greater political franchises. The influence of the Democratic principle in the States has gradually removed the property requisitions for office, extended the right of suffrage, and created a more immediate responsibility to the people of those holding public trusts. When the Constitution was formed, presidential electors were chosen with the expectation that they would exercise their judgments in selecting a Chief Magistrate, but they now deposit their votes as the agents of the popular will, and for the man designated by the majority. By degrees the people have assumed the right to choose nearly all of those officers whose duties intimately affect their interest. The time has not long gone by since they were denied the right of expressing their opinion on public affairs, for the purpose of influencing the deliberations of this body. Now, they instruct us, and sometimes their instructions are obeyed. There is a powerful party in the country who believe in the right of instruction, and those who oppose this right are willing to listen to addresses and resolutions upon matters deeply affecting the public interests. Even the opponents of the "fierce Democracy" are beginning to study a little in the school of popular rights.

Mr. Chairman, the time has gone by when "three or four men at most," however popular, can dictate the public policy of this country. No man is powerful now who is not the exponent of the public opinion of the masses. The want of a knowledge of this fact, or of a due appreciation of its truth, has been the cause of all the blunders committed by the gentleman and his friends. They have attempted to dictate to the masses. They have set up their own gods, and called on all Israel to worship them; and against those who would not bow down and cry out, "these be our gods also," they have uttered an anathema maranatha. They have denounced them as outcasts, levelers, agrarians, workies, and Locofocos. All of these epithets have been applied to the masses, who could not believe in the infallibility of the opinions of certain great men in this country. The people acknowledge no leaders, unless they are the representatives of their opinions. They have no dictators but the principles of truth. These they embrace, comprehend, and sooner or later enforce.

The Democratic party here have been charged with receiving their instructions from "the White House." This declaration needs proof. I know of no one of their number whose conduct should subject him to this imputation. Instructions come to us from a different quarter, from the districts that we represent. Even the President sometimes takes lessons in these normal schools. He did so on the great question of a separation of bank and State. On that occasion he put himself at the head of a great and powerful party, which demanded that measure. It showed itself here in the long session of 1836; but its strength was more manifest in places far removed from the corrupting influences of the Capitol. I stand upon this floor as the representative of that principle. It was put at issue, in my own State, before the President sent forth his message at the extra session, and it was nobly sustained at the ballot-boxes. We had no dictation from the White House; and none from those high in authority. The movement was voluntary on the part of the people, and was crowned with success.

The mass of the community are far from being powerless; and he who asserts it has entirely mistaken the signs of the times. They make and unmake us all. Whom they will they set up, and whom they will they put down. The man who assumes to be their dictator soon sees "the fingers upon the plaster of the wall;" and from that hour his power departs from him and he becomes a political outcast. In this particular the late President has been grossly libeled. He was neither a dictator nor a tyrant. I do not deny his power, but it was power acquired by his sagacity to discern the feelings and wishes of the people. If he had attempted the part of a dictator or a tyrant, not all the honors acquired at New Orleans, not all the glories of a long and distinguished life of military service, could have saved him from political annihilation. General Jackson was the champion of the rights of mankind in the aggregate against certain classes who would have all to themselves. He was the chosen representative of those who were in favor of circumscribing the action of this Government, of bringing back the Constitution to what it was intended to be by its framers; of preserving the sovereignty and independency of the States, and with them, the rights of the people. He brought around him men fresh from the ranks of the people, acquainted with their wants, and understanding the current of their opinions. He consulted those men; and for that cause alone his opponents charged him with being under the influence of a "Kitchen Cabinet." It was a Cabinet worthy of the man. It enabled his master mind to go on with the age, and keep up with the advancing spirit of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee says, "that new party names have been invented; that we of late hear of little else than the Democracy of the country." That man is little versed in the history of our politics who does not know that the word Democrat has been a party cognomen for almost half a century. It was once used as a term of reproach for the purpose of bringing into disrepute the liberal views of such men as Jefferson and Madison. It was given as a party name as early as 1794, and has since been so much honored that our opponents seem disposed to take it from us. In denying to us our ancient appellation, it was, doubtless, the intention of the gentleman to prepare for this grand larceny. The Federalists, once National Republicans, the Whigs of 1834, and the Republican Whigs of 1838, are about to assume the name of Democratic Whigs. New party names have indeed been invented, but not by us, sir. We stand by the old landmarks; we rally under the old banners—the banners that have so often led to victory and to glory.

I said that the word Democrat was once applied to our party as a term of reproach. In 1797, Trumbull, the poet and Federalist, but an honest man withal, applied the word Democrat to our party in a poem published in the Connecticut Courant. Here is an extract:

"See Mifflin stretching out the laws,
To aid the anti-Federal cause,
See him with Barclay, John, and Dallas,
Poor Pennsylvania keeps no gallowes,
Play many a Democratic prank,
In fleeing Pennsylvania Bank."

In the same year, a Philadelphia paper gives the following advice to the farmers, who were Democrats:

"Go weed your corn, and plow your land;
And by Columbia's interest stand;
Cast prejudice away,
To able heads leave State affairs,
Give railing o'er, and say your prayers
For stores of corn and hay:
With politics never break your sleep,
But ring your hogs and shear your sheep."

The United States Gazette said: "It is very certain that the leading Democrats in the United States are almost to a man DEISTS and ATHEISTS." These extracts, from Federal papers, show that there was then a turbulent party in the country called Democrats, and that the great body of them were considered as only fit to weed corn, ring hogs, and shear sheep.

In further proof that we are still rallying under the old banners, let us have the words of the Aurora—a Democratic paper.

In 1796, this paper says: "Dr. Rush's eulogium on Rittenhouse has given great offense to the Aristocrats, because he was the president of a 'DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY.'"

On the succeeding day, the same paper holds the following language: "It is a little remarkable that 'the two great fires which have lately happened, have appeared in two places that send DEMOCRATIC REPUBLICANS to Congress.' Here, sir, is the appellation of our party at full length, and yet we are gravely told that 'Democracy' is a new name—an invention of modern times to gull the people.

But, sir, there is still another charge against the people. It is "most emphatically denied that we are authorized to boast of their increased attachment to our institutions." This is but the repetition of the language of by-gone days. In 1794, a writer in the Columbia Sentinel, the leading Federal print in New England, charged the Democrats "with exerting opposition to the law, 'actually raising an armed rebellion in the very Interference of Federal Officers in Elections—Mr. Wall.

SENATE.

'center of the United States, and opposing their veto to the doings of the President, to the laws of the Union, and to the will of the whole people." At a dinner given in old Faneuil Hall, President Adams charged the people with possessing such "a spirit of falsehood and malignity, as to bear a threatening aspect upon the union of the States and their constitution of Government." The United States Gazette was of the opinion "that Democrats were no republicans." It therefore says: "Let the party be styled Democrats, for two reasons; first, it describes the sort of politics they would introduce; and secondly, it is a name already disgraced, and fits the wearers." The language of the gentleman is that of the Tories of England when the people propose to shorten the duration of Parliament, simplify the qualification of voters, abridge the expenses of elections, abolish the small borough constituencies, abrogate the corn laws, reform the corporations, and reduce the temporalities of the clergy. The same language is used by the aristocrats of every age, when the people awake to a sense of their danger, and put forth their strength for the preservation of their liberties.

The next assault in order is upon the Department of the Post Office. It is said that there were "no abuses in this Department until the party in power began reform." You, sir, know that this statement needs great qualification. You will recollect the confusion that prevailed in every branch of this Department when it was under the charge of Mr. Meigs. In 1818 there was due the Treasury from this office the sum of $539,844. In 1817, when the Fifth Auditor's office was established, the Post Office accounts were only adjusted to the third quarter of the year 1810, and the accounts of postmasters were in arrears for thirty years. In many instances principals and sureties had become bankrupt. But at that time a bankruptcy of half a million of dollars, unsettled accounts at the Treasury for seven years, and with the postmasters of the country for thirty years, were not a very serious offense to the public morals, or "dangerous attack upon the public liberties." They gave rise to a short report, occasioned a few speeches, and the whole matter was adjusted without prejudice to Mr. Monroe, or to you, sir, as a member of his Cabinet. It was not the fashion then to bring a whole party before "this grand inquest of the nation" for the errors and faults of one man. Let the same thing happen now, and a long session of Congress would not give sufficient time for the Opposition to express their feelings of indignation. The welkin would ring with the cry of corruption and speculation.

I do not deny the existence of abuses in this Department when under the administration of Major Barry. He was imposed upon by those in whom he had a right to place confidence; and that which enriched them made him poor indeed. The West, however, have occasion to remember him favorably for increased mail facilities, and for giving to the Department an impulse which silenced murmurs, and put at rest the question of a branch office beyond the Alleghanies. It is also to be remembered that Congress have authorized the settlement and payment of many of those contracts which were pronounced corrupt by the Post Office investigating committee. The mandamus case grew out of the refusal of the present Postmaster General to pay the amount of the award made on those contracts. But whatever may have been the faults of the past management of the office, it must be admitted that the present Postmaster General executes his trust with distinguished ability. His errors are on the side of economy, not of lavish expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee thinks there are many abuses in the public service, but he has a grand panacea for them all. It is to operate on the political system as some of the late patented medicines are said to operate on the human system. We have only to apply it, and the whole political body assumes new life and vigor. It immediately puts on the innocent face of youthful existence. I never had much faith in the healing qualities of many of these medicines, and I have still less in the gentleman's bill "to secure the freedom of elections." It looks too much like the old sedition law. It is a bill to circumscribe freedom of speech and of action. It makes intermeddling in elections, in any way, by an officer of this Government, except to vote, "an attack upon the public liberties," a high misdemeanor, and punishes the offender by a fine of $1,000, removal from office, and perpetual disability to hold office forever after. But this gag is not sufficient. The "giving office on agreement with the appointee to render political or other service in elections, or otherwise," is punishable by a fine of $5,000, removal from office, and the same perpetual disability. When this bill becomes a law by consent of the people, they will have taken one grand step on the high road to despotism. The founders of our liberties considered "civil subjection as either necessary or voluntary." These restraints are not necessary, and it is ever to be remembered that the declarations of positive law are always weak when in opposition to the will of the people. Instead of being a measure "to secure the freedom of elections," it grossly attacks that freedom; ay, more, it violates the Constitution. It is no part of the duty of Congress to regulate the elective franchise. If the conduct of the officers of this Government at elections is odious in any of the States, let those States pass laws to prevent the evil. They have the power, and on them let there be devolved the responsibility of exercising it. The gentleman ought to take his bill to his own Legislature. When he does so, I have no doubt the wylly say of it as a Colonial Governor of the Old Dominion once said of schools and printing—"God keep us from both."

We have heard much of late about the "spoils principle." It has been most bitterly condemned by the Opposition here, and yet they have practiced upon it in every State where they have obtained the power. They first established the principle; and yet the gentleman says he has often "foretold its bad effects." This may be, sir, but it only shows that he stands alone with his party. Even in his own State, they have rewarded friends by giving them office, and punished enemies by turning them out.

Mr. BELL said they did not remove from office, and only appointed their friends to the higher offices.

Mr. CRARY. I speak from newspaper report, and may be in error. But I know no difference between a high and a low office. If it is an attack upon the public liberties to remove a political opponent from an inferior office, it must be an attack upon the same liberties to remove one from a superior station. The principle is the same in either case. This principle might prove injurious, if all our contests for power were of a personal character. As the Opposition rally more in support of men than measures, they ought, perhaps, to condemn it, and not only so, but never to practice it. The contests of the Democratic party are of a different character. Their motto is, and ever has been, principles first, and men afterwards, and they never rally around men until their principles are personified in them. In support of these principles they have endured buffetings and reproaches and stripes without number. They have submitted to be called by the most opprobrious epithets, and all for the belief that was in them, that they were promoting the true doctrines of liberty, and the real interests of mankind. When principles are made to prevail at such a price, they ought not to be represented and personified throughout the country by men who hate them, and labor by night and by day, in season and out of season to bring them into disrepute. No man or set of men can long be at the head of the Democratic party of this country, who will allow the sentinels upon the watch-towers to burn blue lights as signals to the enemy. General Washington was right on this subject, when he said: "I shall not, whilst I have the honor to administer the Government, bring a man into any office of consequence, knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government is pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide. That it would embarrass its movements is certain." The example of Washington was followed by his successors—by your venerable father, and by Madison. I will say nothing as to the course of Mr. Monroe, for he came into power, and defaced the old landmarks of party; and warriors came together, and shook hands upon their old battle-fields. When you assumed the reins of Government, it was a subject of frequent complaint with your friends that you tried to buy up your enemies by offers of political station. It was an unfortunate movement. For this and other causes, you very soon found yourself "with a barren scepter in your grasp, no son of yours succeeding." Sir, it will ever be found difficult for any administration to manage the affairs of Government to the satisfaction of their party, with the power of political station in the hands of opponents. If it does not prove "political suicide," it will "always embarrass its movements."

Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee is remarkable throughout for the peculiarity of its argument. It contains many a jesuitical statement—many an illogical deduction. But I will not trouble the committee with their further consideration. I leave the rest of its fallacies to be commented upon by those who are more capable of doing them justice.

INTERFERENCE OF FEDERAL OFFICERS IN ELECTIONS.

REPORT IN THE SENATE,

January 31, 1839.

Mr. WALL submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred "A bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections," report:

That they have examined the bill referred to them with the care and attention which the importance of the subject demands. The object of the bill proposed in the title and preamble, is to prevent the great powers given to the officers of the Federal Government, and other persons employed in its service, from being used for the influencing of elections which ought to be free and uncorrupt, and its scope is very broad and comprehensive. It proposes to enact that, after the first day of April next, no marshal or deputy marshal, no postmaster or deputy postmaster, no receiver or register of a land office, or any of their deputies or clerks, no surveyor general of public lands, or any of his deputies or assistants, no collector, surveyor, naval officer, weigher, gauger, appraiser, or other officer, or person, whatsoever, concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any part or branch thereof, no engineer, officer or agent employed or concerned in the execution or superintendence of any of the public works, shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for the choice of any persons to be electors of President or Vice President of the United States, or for the choice of any person to be a Senator or Representative in the Congress of the United States, or for the choice of any person to be Governor or Lieutenant Governor of any State, or of any person to be a Representative or member of the Legislative Department of any State of this Union, or for the choice of any person to serve in any public office established by the law of any of the said States; nor shall any such officer or person intermeddle in any of the elections above-mentioned, or use any means with intent to influence or control the same, otherwise than by giving his own vote, under the penalty of five hundred dollars, one moiety thereof to the informer, and the other moiety thereof to the United States, to be recovered, with costs of suit, by any person that shall sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, or plaint, in any of the district or circuit courts of the United States; and every person convicted of such offense, shall thereby become disabled and incapable of ever bearing or executing any place or office of trust whatsoever under the United States.

It is a wise and salutary rule, as well for the expounders as the makers of a law, to consider the old law, the mischief and the remedy. The committee believe that it is beyond all question, that under the Constitution and the existing laws of the United States, every citizen has "the right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communion among the people thereon," "by word, message, or writing," or in any other manner he may judge proper. This right is not only asserted in the celebrated resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, in the sessions of 1798, and 1799, and 1800, as belonging to the general principles of free government, as well as the particular organization and positive provisions of the Federal Constitution, but declared to be "the only effectual guardian of every other right." The foundation of representative government is based upon the intelligence of the citizen, and to insure that intelligence, it is both the right and the duty of every one freely to discuss and communicate, both publicly and privately, such matters as he may suppose will advance the public interest, or inform the public mind. One of the most salutary and effectual agents, to promote such interest, is an enlightened public opinion. To evolve such opinion, and to give form and direction to the general course of national policy, and the future destinies of all, every citizen, whether intrusted with public office or not, has alike deep, abiding, and active interest, and no citizen is at liberty to withdraw himself from this high responsibility, inseparably connected with republican institutions. One of the most celebrated law-makers of the ancient Republics declared every citizen infamous who refused to take part in the affairs of his country; and the word idiot, derived from the language of one of them, bears through all time this impress of their institutions, denoting one who was destitute of the spirit or intelligence requisite for the discharge of this highest duty of a citizen.

The elective right is not conferred by the Constitution of the United States, but belongs to representative government, and springs from its very nature; and the very essence of that right, under our institutions, is the right of electing the members of the General and State Governments. The value and the advantages of this right, so far as respects the public, depend upon the knowledge of public measures, and of the qualifications of candidates for public trust; and, consequently, upon the equal and unrestricted freedom of discussing their comparative merits and demerits. The citizen who, by the choice of his fellows, is distinguished by being selected to perform official duties and trusts, is not thereby elevated above them, nor degraded below them. He parts with no rights of citizenship, but remains an equal among equals; still connected with them by the strong and enduring ligaments of mutuality of rights and privileges. Under our Constitution, the people, not the Government, possess the sovereignty; and the doors of office can be opened only by the powerful charm of the public voice, and no degrading sacrifice of any of the privileges of citizenship, or any separation from the community of rights, feelings, and interests, which bind the people to the Government, is required.

The object of the Constitution is the protection of the equal rights and privileges of all—the few as well as the many. The spirit of despotism is widely different; erected upon the destruction of the rights of man, its main object is to protect the few against the many. Hence the policy of separating its officers from all sympathy of feeling and interest with the many, by attaching to office attractive distinctions and seductive privileges, which create a distinct class, and elevate them above the mass, or by degrading them by unnatural mutilations below their fellow-man, prepares them to become fit instruments of arbitrary power. Despots who surround their thrones with eunuchs and mutes, act upon the latter principle, and are impelled by the instinct of fear to resort to unnatural and unjust means to retain what is unjustly acquired. Happily our institutions, resting upon the just foundation of popular rights, neither demand nor will admit of the mutilation of the persons or the privileges of citizenship as a prerequisite for office. Under the existing laws a citizen of a State does not, by accepting any office under the Federal Government, forfeit any of the rights and privileges which belong to him as a citizen of a State; and all control over the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States, is expressly withheld from the action of the Federal Government, and left with the States, by the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution. The committee believe that the State and Federal Governments under our system are coordinate departments of one single and integral whole; that the compact between the States unites them in a single Government, as to their relations with each other and with foreign nations, and as to certain articles particularly specified, each retaining to itself the other rights of independent Government, agreeing to appoint in conjunction for the administration of the Federal branch, and each retaining its original right of appointing, for administering its domestic branch, a separate set of functionaries, legislative, executive, and judicial. These two sets of officers, each independent of the other, constitute a whole of Government for each State separately, the powers given to one, specifically made Federal, exercised over the whole, the residuary powers retained to the other confined to the particular State.

The committee have thus stated their views of the existing law in regard to the rights of the Federal functionaries upon whom the bill referred to them is proposed to operate. What, then, is the mischief which this bill is designed to prevent? It assumes that the great powers given to the officers of the Federal Government, and others employed in their service, may be used for the influencing of elections and corrupting their freedom and purity.

That elections ought to be pure and uncorrupted is a principle admitted by all, and no language can be too strong to express the abhorrence felt by the committee against any attempt to destroy this freedom and purity. He who is guilty of either, by bribing or corrupting voters, violating the ballot-box, or setting at naught its voice, forging or suppressing returns, or disobeying the laws enacted for securing any elective right, is guilty of treason against republican institutions, and ought to be regarded by all as a dangerous foe to liberty.

The committee are not aware that any such acts have been committed by any of the functionaries named in the bill referred to them; nor have they been able to discover the slightest evidence that any attempt has been made to bring the patronage or power of the Federal Government to destroy the freedom and purity of elections. It is true that such allegations have been made; but it will be recollected that it is equally true that allegations have been made against some of the functionaries of some of the State governments, of attempting, in violation of existing laws, to suppress returns, set aside the voice of the people, and substitute the will of the minority for that of the majority; in fact, to treat elections as nullities, and substitute the acts of reckless and profligate officers for the voice of the majority. We have seen one of the States of the Union brought to the brink of revolution by alleged efforts of this kind, and in other States witnessed alarming attempts to defeat the voice of the majority in elections. This state of things would indeed seem to indicate an alarming laxity of political morality, and to require the exercise of appropriate remedies, by constitutional legislation. Whether, if true, they are to be attributed to the action of the functionaries of the State or Federal Government, or the officers of corporations of associated wealth, which have been brought by indiscreet legislation into too intimate connection with both, and whose influence insinuates itself into all the business of active enterprise and the ordinary transactions of society, or to other causes, it is not the legitimate province of the committee to inquire. Those who are charged with attempts to corrupt the purity, and destroy the freedom of elections, are very apt to make charges of the same kind against others, in the vain hope of exculpating themselves, or at least of drawing off public attention from their own acts, by inculpating others. Neither accusations from such quarters, nor the mere assertions of disappointed office-hunters, or reckless partisan editors, pealing forth the war cries of party, can safely be made the foundation of such legislation as destroys the use of unquestionable rights for the purpose of preventing their abuse.

In the struggles of parties for power, it is believed by the committee that it may well be doubted whether the patronage of office is to be deemed an advantage, inasmuch as while there can be but one incumbent of an office, the number of those who are stimulated to partisan activity by the hope of gaining it as a reward for extraordinary exertions, is unlimited, to say nothing of those who may be paralyzed by disappointment, or disaffected by rejection. Public sentiment exercises a salutary and controlling influence over the conduct of public functionaries; and while it properly watches their conduct with jealousy, and scrutinizes their actions rigidly, it tolerates almost unbounded liberty of speech in those who are seeking office. We cannot cast our eyes in any direction without perceiving the evidence of the fact that, for every office under the Federal Government, even to the Presidency, the numerical proportion of those who seek office by partisan activity is at least three to one against the possessors. The office-seekers have an unlimited freedom of speech and of action, denied to the incumbent by the circumstances of his position, and are at liberty to attack the motives and conduct of the latter, and indulge in professions of patriotic ardor and disinterestedness, restrained by no other limits than the elastic credulity of their friends and party. That the possession of patronage does not insure its retention, is proved by frequent instances, both in the Federal and State Governments.

The committee believe that, in those places where the Federal officers enumerated in the bill are most numerous, it will be found that the elections more frequently result against than in favor of the Administration; and this proves either that they do not bring "the great powers derived from the Federal Government" to influence elections, or that they use them against the party which conferred those powers, or that no danger is to be apprehended of their destroying the freedom and purity of election. It is believed that even a majority of those who would be affected by this bill are hostile to the views of policy, or opposed to the political principles of the present Administration; and if the sentiments of those who are found in possession of office in the ten miles square are any test, the majority would be very great. But the true and conclusive answer to all such allegations, of bringing the patronage and power of the General Government in hostility to the freedom and purity of elections, is to be found in the fact that such acts are everywhere, in all the States, punishable by State laws; and the committee are not aware of any prosecution even for such offenses.

It is also worthy of special remark that, in those States where the most clamor has been raised and the most alarm has been expressed on this subject, the State functionaries are opposed to the Administration, and, as they have the power, it is their duty to punish such offenses. The committee are therefore constrained to believe that there is no just foundation for such an accusation, and to look upon it as one of those allegations which those who are struggling to gain the power which they affect to think so corrupt and corrupting consider themselves justified in making to stimulate their partisans and decry their opponents. But whether the mischief actually exists or not, the committee proceed to consider the policy and constitutionality of the remedy which is proposed by the bill referred to them.

The object of the bill is to render what is lawful and praiseworthy, and in strict conformity with both the letter and spirit of our institutions, for all citizens, criminal in a particular class who have been honored by the confidence of the people of the whole States. It is not to punish a crime malum in se, but to create a new crime. It is not to punish bribery and corruption, the robbery of the ballot-box, the suppression or forging of returns, or usurpation or neglect of official duty in giving effect to the will of the majority in elections, but the use of persuasion or dissuasion, of intermeddling to control or influence voters by means that are lawful and right in others. Every citizen ought to qualify himself by study, conversation, and every other means of acquiring knowledge, to understand the theory and principles of our institutions, and to ascertain the best mode of administering them in their true spirit, so as to promote the greatest good of the greatest number, and to render himself capable of discharging any trust that may be conferred on him by his fellow-citizens. It is as well his right as his duty to discuss and promulge freely the measures of any Administration, and the character and conduct of those who support or oppose it, as well to control them by the censorship of public opinion as to subject them to the test of the Constitution. In doing so he may win the confidence of his fellow-citizens by his declared opinions, or may become identified with some great principle which conciliates their support. All this is innocent and praiseworthy, even if the motive is the acquisition of office, because it promotes the public good. Can it be wise, or even just, to punish as a crime, when he attains office, what was patriotic and praiseworthy while he was seeking it? Yet why should office-seeking and office-holding thus be separated by arbitrary enactments, which bestow honors and confidence upon the one, and penalty and ignominy upon the other, for doing the same act? How is it possible for any of the officers enumerated in this bill freely to discuss public men and measures in private circles, in public assemblies, in the newspapers, or even in the unreserved confidence of social intercourse, when an elector is present, before or after an election, without subjecting himself to the sweeping penalties of this bill? It is unequal. While one set of functionaries under the Federal Government, and all those of the State governments, and the officers of the corporations of associated wealth, are left with an unrestricted freedom of speech and of the press, this bill puts a gag and fetters upon a few proscribed men, in respect to public men and public measures. Why this discrimination? Are the proscribed officers more corrupt or liable to corruption than other office-holders? Is it to guard against the corrupting influence and patronage of the Federal Administration? If so, the effect of the bill would be still more objectionable, as in degrading them by taking from them the rights common to all others, it would prepare them to become the willing instruments of corruption or ambition. This bill would create a caste among office-holders, deriving their authority from the same high source, the people, and requiring the same high qualifications to discharge their duties. Those enumerated would be degraded by the very acceptance of office, which would cut them off from all identity of feeling, interest, and sympathy with their fellow-citizens, by the voluntary mutilation of the very manhood of citizenship. It converts those officers into mutes. It enforces temporary outlawry of the dearest and most inestimable rights of citizenship, with a penalty suspended over their heads during the continuance of office, which may be cut by a word, message, writing, or even a look, doom them to become outcasts—political lepers. They would be dishonored by the very act of surrendering such rights for the mercenary motives of pecuniary gain and rewards of office, and proclaim themselves slaves, and the fit instruments for making slaves of others. They would find the badges of slavery and dishonor written upon their commissions. It creates a privileged class of office-holders. The President and his Cabinet, the heads of bureaus and their clerks, the officers of Congress, the judiciary and their clerks, and the district attorneys, the officers of the Army and Navy, in short, all the Federal officers whose emoluments are greatest, and whose sphere of influence is most extensive, are left free, while those who derive their compensation from fees given for labor performed in the execution of their duties, or their daily support from their daily labor in the offices or employments enumerated, are prohibited from intermeddling in elections, by word or deed, save only by giving their own vote. Is it to recognize distinctions in society, grades of virtue in office-holders? Is it to imply that the proscribed office-holders, being chiefly subordinate, and many of them hard-working men, must "have bridles in their mouths, and saddles upon their backs," as a preliminary qualification for office? Why should those officers be rendered aliens, and be cut off from the enjoyment of the social rights of discussing political subjects, even under the protection of their own household gods, while the other functionaries of the Federal and State Governments, and the officers of the corporations of associated wealth, and the employés of private persons are permitted to retain the full rights of citizens? This bill degrades the rights of suffrage, the guardian of all political rights by meting it out as a boon in different portions to different citizens, all equally worthy of trust, and distinguished by popular favor, and by placing it under an odious espionage.

It surrounds the proscribed officers with a body of common informers, stimulated by two of the strongest incentives to constant vigilance—the hope of gain, and the desire of office—to watch their every word, message, writing, look, or action, to torture it into an endeavor to persuade, or to dissuade, an elector, in giving his vote, or intermeddling in an election. By day and by night, in public and in private, in the election of a President or a Governor, of a constable or a pound-keeper, the omnipresent eye of this new body of familiars is alike upon the collector and his cartman, the superintendent of the public works, and the day laborer in his employ. Where is the limit to be found in this bill which separates freedom of speech and of the press from its operation? The open, manly independence of thought and liberty of action, heretofore justly considered the best preservatives of our institutions, must soon perish under the parasitic embrace of this bill. It not only punishes the freedom of action, but of thought. It forbids the designated person, as well from intermeddling in any Federal or State election, as from using any means with intent to control or influence the same; thus introducing a new crime in our code, without precision or technical definition, broad and comprehensive as the theater of human action, and expansive as human thought on political subjects. While it deprives one class of Federal officers of a portion of their rights, it bestows the most latitudinarian power upon another class, the furthest removed from the influence of the people—the judiciary. Them it clothes with jurisdiction to decide what is an endeavor to persuade, or to dissuade, an elector to give his vote; what act is an intermeddling in an election; and what is using any means with intent to influence or control the same. It is stamped with the most odious and miserable impress of tyranny, vagueness, and uncertainty. It may well be doubted whether the end—the purity and freedom of election—would justify such means, a delegation of such undefined power, even to the purity of the sacred ermine. The history of other countries is full of warning upon this subject. The Spanish Inquisition, with all its terrible atrocities, was reared upon quite as slender a foundation. Its proposed object was to render religion pure and uncorrupt; and, for that avowed holy purpose, the most latitudinarian power was given to its ministers. To prevent heresy in religion, they had, or soon assumed for that purpose, the power to punish all persons who endeavored to "persuade" or "dissuade" others, or in anywise "intermeddle" in matters of religion. Hence, also, they gradually assumed cognizance of the intentions, and even the thoughts, of men, and the tendencies of their words and writings, in the streets and in the sacred privacy of the closet, on a subject of universal concern and everlasting interest, and subjected them to the never-sleeping eye of a body of informers, under the name of familiars. The parallel between the bill referred to the committee and the origin of the Inquisition, is as striking as it is alarming, and differs less in the means than the end; the one being designed to render religion pure and uncorrupt, and the other to preserve the elective franchise pure and uncorrupt. The delegation of such unlimited power corrupted even sacred the priesthood; and religious heresy became the means of their power, and the terrible instrument of their malice or tyranny. Are laymen more pure or safer depositaries of unlimited discretion? May it not be justly apprehended that political heresy may become, in the hands of the judiciary, as formidable a means of power and as vindictive an instrument of malice and tyranny? "Confidence is every-where the parent of despotism; free government is founded in jealousy, not confidence. It is jealousy, not confidence, which prescribes limited constitutions, to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power."

The committee believe that the spirit of our institutions is onward, and that it is more consistent with that spirit to look upon the ruins of the Inquisition which have fallen before the progress of human liberty, as monuments of its triumph, than to find materials to reconstruct new fortresses, from which to assail the imprescriptible rights of man.

The magnitude of the discretionary power committed by this bill to the judiciary has a tendency to convert our form of Government into a judicial despotism, quite as intolerable to a free people, and equally odious as any other. The history of the Star Chamber, like that of the Inquisition, proves that no class, however venerated and elevated, is the safe depository of unlimited discretionary power, even for the most holy and salutary ends. The most dangerous and destructive assaults upon human rights have been made from fortresses constructed for their defense. It deserves serious consideration whether a law like this bill could ever be carried into execution at this day, and under our free institutions; a law which prostrates the freedom of thought, of action, of speech, and of the press, so far as respects a large portion of the most intelligent, respected, and meritorious of our citizens. The great body of the functionaries whom this bill would affect have been honored by the selection of the people to discharge responsible duties, for their honesty, capacity, and fidelity to the Constitution. The habitual reviler of republican institutions, and of the capacity of the people for self-government, may in vain attempt to fix a stigma upon all officers who derive their appointments from the people, for the purpose of thus gradually undermining their confidence in the Government of their choice, but the people will always be found true to themselves, and will never submit to the execution of a law which deprives their fellow-citizen of his common and equal rights, simply because they had distinguished him by their favor and preference. In the opinion of the committee this bill would arm a body of informers with dangerous powers. In the contest of parties it may happen that the State functionaries may unite with the corporations of associated wealth, in a party struggle to obtain the power of the Federal Government; armed with the tremendous engineering of this law, actions of debt, bill, or plaint, in any district or circuit court of the United States, and penalty and costs, is there not reason to fear that it would be used with ruinous effect against any of the proscribed officers, who would not use "the great powers" given to the officers of the Federal Government to promote the views of the office-seekers? On the other hand, would it not enable a corrupt Administration to punish them for an independent exercise of their judgment in like manner? The committee will only advert to one other objection to the policy of this bill. Its obvious tendency is to alienate the people from the Federal Government by infusing a jealousy of its powers and its officers, by unjust discriminations between the two sets of families chosen by the people to carry on the two coördinate departments of the one single and integral Government, formed by the compact of the States, to array the State governments and its functionaries against the Federal Government and its functionaries, and thus gradually to undermine or weaken it by treating as aliens in the State governments those who accept office under the Federal Government. In short, its tendency would be to "alienate one portion of the country from the rest, and to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts," and therefore, in the opinion of the committee, it ought to be resisted in the beginning.

The committee are aware that a precedent may be found for the principles of this bill, and almost its language, in the legislation of England. So also may be found a precedent for the total disfranchisement of the officers of the customs, excise duties, and post office, while holding office. Such a plant may be indigenous in such a soil. Here it must ever be an exotic, from the essential difference between the two Governments. In the British Government, the jealousy of encroachment on the rights of the people is confined to the King. The representatives of the people are considered not only exempt themselves from distrust, but likewise the guardians of the people against such encroachments. Hence, there, it is a principle that Parliament is omnipotent; and all barriers are raised, not against the Parliament, but the prerogative of the King. Here, all power emanates from the people; and the Constitution, which is paramount to all laws, secures them as well against legislative as executive usurpation. The committee are not prepared to yield to the policy of importing the chains and gags of the legislation of Great Britain to manacle and fetter the free citizens of this country. The free and honest exercise of the right of suffrage ought not to be abridged, shackled, or fettered by Federal legislation; nor should any class of citizens be rendered odious by jealous distinctions. The committee can perceive no reason for the adoption by Congress of any restriction upon any of what they deem the inestimable and unalienable rights of every class of citizens, merely because they have been honored with the confidence of the people. They know no objection to reason, argument, or even persuasion, by word, message, or writing, either before or after an election, from whomsoever it may proceed; or by whatever motive prompted. Nor do they understand on what just principles it can be maintained that the possession of office simply should deprive a citizen of the influence arising from character, intelligence, integrity, and the confidence which they inspire, and of the right to use it as others are left free to use theirs. The committee can find no scales in the Constitution in which to weigh the relative patriotism, integrity, and independence of the functionaries of the Federal or State Governments, and the officers of corporations, or the employers of individuals. They cannot believe that the employees of the Federal Government are more corrupt or corrupting than the employees of other bodies—corporate or politic, or of individuals. They are satisfied that the best corrective of any abuse of the freedom or purity of elections by the officers designated, in the manner rendered penal by this bill, even if any such exists, will be found in an enlightened public opinion, which, sooner or later, depends upon the legitimate moral force of truth, and the influence of reason and fair argument, irrespective of mere official authority. So far, they believe the experience of the working of our institutions has proved the truth of the axiom of the great apostle of Democracy, that "error of opinion may always be safely tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it." They can find no justification of the policy or justice of restraining, by law, the unlimited liberty of the exercise of the freedom of speech or of the press by every class of citizens, whether in or out of office, than such as in other countries has prompted the establishment of political or religious inquisitions, analogous to the tendencies of this bill, which are alike at war with experience, the spirit of the age, and the genius of our institutions. But if any mischief has arisen or may arise from this source, the legitimate remedy must be sought and found in the legislation of the several States, whose constitutional duty it is to prescribe the privileges and immunities of their citizens, free from the control of Federal legislation.

But whatever may be the opinion entertained, as to the policy of this law, the committee are of opinion that the remedy proposed is unconstitutional. The second section of the first article of the Constitution declares that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen "by the people of the States, who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." And by article second, section first, declares that electors of President and Vice President "shall be appointed in such manner as the State Legislatures may direct;" and the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution declares that the citizens of each State "shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Congress, therefore, have no right to intermeddle, by law, in prescribing the qualifications of electors or the mode of conducting elections of members of the House of Representatives, or electors of President and Vice President, nor in respect to the privilege or immunities of a citizen of a State; that right belongs exclusively to the States, and is by the Constitution withheld from the Federal Government. It is difficult to perceive upon what constitutional grant of power the right to prescribe the qualifications of electors, and the mode of conducting State elections for State officers, can be sustained, and the committee cannot find any warrant in that instrument for its assumption by Congress.

But if any doubt upon this subject could exist it is dispelled by the first article of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble to petition the Government for the redress of grievances." The committee believe that the powers of the Federal Government result from the Constitution, and are limited by the plain sense and intention of that instrument, and that the State sovereignties are only diminished by powers specifically enumerated or necessary to carry the specified powers into effect; and that the States, by the Constitution, retained to themselves the right of protecting the freedom of religious principles, and of judging how far the licentiousness of speech and of the press may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom, and how far the abuses which cannot be separated from their use should be tolerated, rather than the use be destroyed. The freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press, and of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of grievances, is withdrawn in express terms, from the powers of the Federal Government. It is deemed unnecessary by the committee to attempt to demonstrate these propositions. They have already been done by the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature in 1798, 1799, and 1800, and the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky in 1798 and 1799. The provisions of this bill are, in the opinion of the committee, more clearly unconstitutional than those of the alien and sedition laws; their tendency is more clearly and unequivocally to abridge the freedom of speech, of the liberty of the press, and of the right of peaceably assembling. It is true it is confined to a particular class, certain designated officers under the Federal Government, but it will hardly be seriously contented that this makes any essential difference. If you may lawfully abridge the freedom intended to be granted by the Constitution to all, by laws embracing only a portion, you may thus proceed until all are finally deprived of their rights.

Under every aspect that the committee have been able to view the provisions of this bill, it appears to them that it is unjust, unequal, impracticable, impolitic, tyrannical, and unconstitutional; that it is founded on an assumption of power by the Federal Government not granted by the Constitution, and destructive of the rights of the several independent States composing the Union, and of the constitutional rights of the citizens of those States, and that its provisions are of a most alarming and dangerous tendency—not called for by any existing mischief, and would not afford an appropriate remedy if such mischief existed. They, therefore, respectfully report the said bill, without amendment, and recommend that the same should not be passed.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

REMARKS OF HON. D. PETRIKIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 15, 1839,

In the Committee of the Whole, on the motion to strike out the appropriation for the Board of Navy Commissioners, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS.

Mr. PETRIKIN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: As to the propriety or expediency of abolishing the Board of Commissioners of the Navy at this time, there may be some little doubt, but there can be no doubt that a reorganization of the whole Navy Department is absolutely necessary. The Board of Navy Commissioners has, from its first organization, acted as an incubus on the Navy; this is a matter of history, and cannot be denied. This board has become odious to the people, and in every quarter of the country the people are complaining of it. This alone ought to be sufficient cause for abolishing the board. The people in this country are sovereign, and if an office or any branch of the Government becomes odious or obnoxious to them, we, as their Representatives, ought at once to abolish the office, or reorganize the obnoxious branch of the Government. As to the suggestion by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that the present head of the Executive Department is odious to the people, it is not the case, and is contradicted by facts. The people have, on several occasions, and some of them very recently, declared themselves satisfied with the general principles the present Executive has acted upon in the administration of the Government, and the people will advocate and approve of his administration as long as he acts on those general principles, which they consider necessary for the preservation of the Constitution and liberties of the country. But they do not approve of many of those who are kept in office. Was the will of the people obeyed, the President would sweep out of the Departments in this city, a horde of officers and clerks of the same political party of the gentleman, (who has volunteered the suggestion I allude to,) who are truly odious to a large majority of the people. So much for the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky. We are told the Board of Commissioners of the Navy was created at the close of the last war with Great Britain, to remedy evils that were discovered during the war in the organization of our Navy. But the true reason is the scene we see every session of Congress in every department of this Government—a disposition to create offices and officers, and to furnish salaries to enable men to live in ease and affluence, under the pretext of doing service to the country. We heard of no deficiency in the organization of our Navy Department during the war. On the contrary, our Navy, for the number of vessels and size, excelled that of all others in the known world for discipline and bravery. Italy had its Capua; so has the United States. Idleness, luxury, and dissipation, has a tendency to enervate and debilitate both body and mind. We are told of the preëminent services of those who have composed the Board of Navy Commissioners, and that they are high-minded, honorable men. This may be, and is, no doubt, all true. I do not know them, nor have I heard any charges made against them as individuals. It is not my intention to say aught disrespectful of the individuals who now fill the offices of that board; and I have no doubt they have, in times past, rendered service to the country; but, sir, the man who would come to this place, or any other of the cities of the Union, and live five or six years in idleness and luxury, without becoming debilitated in body and mind, must be an exception to the rest of mankind. The history of the world proves what I assert to be true. And does age, and the natural debility consequent to that stage of life, tend to lessen the debility produced by dinner parties and dissipation?

We were told yesterday by a gentleman of long experience in government, from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that men who represented people residing in inland districts, had no right to express opinions here relative to the organization of the Navy Department, and that he was surprised that a gentleman [Mr. CRARY, of Michigan] should have made the motion to strike out this appropriation, who had not a sea-port in all his State. I came to Congress under the impression that each member had an equal right to express his opinions in relation to every branch of this Government, and to find fault or approve as he thought the merits of the case required. I was aware that the gentleman from Massachusetts acted with a party, the leaders of which would, if in their power, deprive us of that equal right; but I had not heard it before openly avowed on this floor. I can tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that the constituents of members who represent inland districts, and have "no sea-ports," during the war of 1812, rejoiced when they heard of the victories achieved by our Navy, not only by words, but also by acts. They willingly submitted to pay every species of tax, direct and indirect, to support the Navy then, and are willing now to do the same, when the honor and safety of the country require it. But, when the constituents of those whom the gentleman from Massachusetts says have no right to interfere with the Navy were rejoicing at its victories, the gentleman's constituents, and their representatives in their State Legislature, were passing resolves "that it did not become a moral and religious people to rejoice at the victories of our land and naval forces;" and not only that, but his State Executive even refused to defend their own soil.

The gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Messrs. ADAMS and REED,] who are opposing the present motion, and appear anxious to take the Navy into the special care and keeping of themselves and their constituents, are not uninfluenced by their own private interests in this matter, although it did not become "a moral and religious people to rejoice at the victories" of this same Navy, when fighting the battles of the country: yet the Navy, as it is now employed for the benefit of a few, deserves, in their estimation, all commendation of praise. What is the present employment of two thirds or more of the vessels of our Navy now in commission? Why, sir, they are employed at a vast expense in looking after the property, and guarding the vessels of the traffickers, traders, and speculators, who live, like the gentlemen's constituents, on the sea-coast; in exploring distant seas and oceans, to find new seal and whale fisheries, or new sources of trade and traffic for the gentlemen's constituents; but when the money has to be raised to pay the enormous expenses, our constituents, who reside in inland districts, and have no sea-ports, have to pay the taxes, although their Representatives are told that it is a matter of surprise to gentlemen if they happen to ask how their money is expended. Our constituents are producers; the district I represent is inhabited by people who send to market flour, pork, whiskey, coal, and iron. We furnish the gentlemen's constituents on the sea-board with the necessities of life, food and fuel; we, who reside in inland districts, although we have no sea-ports, pay the taxes and bear the burdens of Government. The gentlemen's constituents, or a large majority of them, are traders, traffickers, and speculators, who live by their wits, and not by their works, and get their living and their wealth by the profits derived from the farmer, manufacturer, and miner, of the interior. I should like to hear from the gentlemen some reason why we have not a right to inquire how our money is expended, and when we think it wasted, complain? I have heard no reason given, except that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] "had no sea-port" in his State.

The advocates of this appropriation and of the present organization of the Navy Department, have urged another reason why the Board of Navy Commissioners ought not to be abolished. It is not, sir, the usefulness of the board, as at present constituted, nor is it the flourishing situation of our Navy under their care, nor is it the retrenchment of the expenses of the Navy Department. No, sir; they have not ventured to rest their defense on any one or all of those matters; but, sir, they tell us of the preëminent services of the persons composing the board during the last war. We hear that same story in this hall almost every week respecting every officer of both Army or Navy, who comes here with a claim, or whose name happens to be connected with any subject of inquiry. Now, sir, I am willing to give every person credit and reward to the full extent for services rendered to the country. But, sir, have the individuals composing this board ever done more than their duty in the service of their country? If they have, I for one am willing to reward them in a direct way, but not by giving them place and pay for pretended services, to the injury of an important part of the defense of the country. I should like to hear in what particular case they, or either of them, have done more than their duty. When they solicited and obtained commissions in the Navy, did they not contract to do certain duties for the country, and to receive for their services a certain amount of pay, and if wounded or disabled, to be supported during their lives? Have they done more on their part than was required of them by the contract, or has the Government and country done less on their part? Will the advocates of the board answer those questions? I know hundreds who have shed their blood and worn out their constitutions, now living in poverty, equally meritorious and deserving with the generals, commodores, and other officers, that we hear extolled by members on this floor every day; and yet let one of those poor men come here I have alluded to and ask for their rights, we do not hear gentlemen say a word in their behalf. It is not long since we had an instance of this kind in this Hall. We saw a soldier who had fought in the battles of the two wars of independence, that of 1776 and that of 1812, who was wounded and honorably discharged, denied the trifling pittance of $3 75 per month, and that, too, by many of those who are loud in the praises, and are for lavishing thousands of dollars on men not so deserving, but who wear epaulets and belong to a higher caste in society. Although I do not wish to derogate from the character or services of any man, yet I wish to see equal justice done to all.

I have always been opposed to extra rewards, such as swords, medals, &c., to persons who have done no more than their duty; and, in many instances within our knowledge, those rewards are not given to persons most deserving. In fact, these matters are looked upon by plain, sober, thinking people as mere frippery, procured, in most instances, by management and intrigue, or for fashion's sake, and not for any services beyond what duty required of the individual, and for a neglect of which he would have deserved punishment.

This course of procedure has another bad effect, is morally wrong, and an injury to the people. It is at once declaring that an officer is not bound by the contract he enters into with the Government to discharge the duties of his office faithfully, without receiving a greater reward than he stipulates to receive when he accepts office. Honor ceases to be an incentive to duty; money is the object.

Gentlemen on the Committee on Naval Affairs talk about being taken by surprise by this motion. Why, sir, I saw a resolution early in the session, submitted to this House, directing that committee to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the Navy Department. Have they given us any reason why they did not inquire as directed? Have they submitted to us any plan for a new organization of that Department? Have they applied to the present, on all hands acknowledged, talented and competent head of the Navy Department for his views on this subject? If not, I should be glad to know why.

Mr. INGHAM, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said no such resolution had been referred to that committee. A resolution to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Board of Navy Commissioners had been referred, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] had given his reasons for not reporting.

Mr. REED said the resolution referred to had been in his charge, and that he had called on the gentleman from Michigan to give his views in writing, and had delayed reporting to receive them.

Mr. PETRIKIN. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says he has seen no such resolution as I have referred to, but acknowledges the existence before the committee of a resolution from this House directing them to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Board of Navy Commissioners. Mr. Chairman, is not that tantamount to a direction by this House to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the Navy Department? Certainly, no man in his senses would abolish the board without giving something in its stead.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] does not pretend to say that he called upon the Secretary of the Navy for his opinions on this important subject; nor does the chairman, or any other member of that committee, get up in his place and inform us of their having inquired of the Secretary of the Navy for advice or instruction, so as to enable them to act on the requisition of this House knowingly. The only attempt to get any information that we hear of being made, is that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] called on the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] for his opinions. Now, sir, does it not appear strange that he should go to the very man for advice, who, we are told, had no right to interfere with matters relating to the Navy, because "he had no sea-port in his district," and that neither he nor his colleagues on the committee ever called on the Secretary of the Navy, who is well qualified to answer all queries relative to this matter, and who takes pride in doing the duties of his station? Had it been a resolution to inquire into the expediency of making a dry-dock, or any other equally extravagant and useless work, which would tend to increase the burdens of the country and the expenditures of the Government, we should have seen a report long since recommending it, and the gentlemen of the Naval Committee would have soon found the way to the Secretary of the Navy for information. But the resolution to abolish the Board of Navy Commissioners savors of an attempt at retrenchment and reform; and therefore finds no favor from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

During the war of 1812, we had no Navy Board, yet our Navy was the admiration of the world, both for the construction of our vessels and the discipline of officers and crews. How is it now? Why, sir, we were told yesterday, by the very men of the party who profess to be the exclusive friends of the Navy, that our Navy is everything but what it ought to be. We heard it stated that one of our finest vessels has lately been converted into horse stables, cow stalls, and donkey pens. The gentlemen who made this charge ought not to have confined their wrath to Commodore Elliott alone; they ought to have gone back for years, and examined the history of our Navy, and they would have found that Commodore Elliott has done no more than has been the practice for years with others. I was sorry to see gentlemen show their partiality by attacking one individual out of dozens equally culpable. If they did not know such to be the case, I do, and many others know it, who are now on the floor of this House, to be the fact, that our naval officers have not only imported horses, cows, and donkeys, in national vessels, but some of them have acquired fortunes by carrying other kinds of freight. And, sir, who is accountable for this abuse, if abuse it is? Are not the Commissioners of the Navy Board, as the guardians and executive officers of the Navy, bound to take cognizance of all abuses in the Navy, and see them corrected, or at least report them to their superiors for their action? But, sir, we have no evidence that they have done so; on the contrary, this abuse complained of by their own friends, has been countenanced by them for years; and, for aught I know, they may have, when in command of vessels, participated in the donkey and horse traffic.

But, sir, the importation of animals, and the converting our ships of war into horse stables, cow stalls, and donkey pens; I consider a much more laudable use of them than another use they are applied to, and for which the same Navy Board are responsible. We hear of our ships of war sailing from one port to another; from Europe to Asia, and from thence to Africa; the officers giving fêtes, balls, and regulas to the princes, nobles, and gentry of despotic Governments, and our brave tars, dressed like mountebanks, manning the yards to cheer those nobles. We have had applications made to Congress by officers, asking us to pay them large sums of money, which they allege they expended in making feasts and giving balls and fêtes to the nobility of Europe. Is that, sir, fit employment for the officers or the vessels of war of plain Republicans? It may do for the subjects of despots; but, sir, my constituents abhor it, and I believe a large portion of the people of this country are of the same opinion. This, also, is not a new occurrence; it has been the practice for several years, but has lately been indulged in to a greater extent, and on a more magnificent scale, by a man who has acquired immense wealth by holding office under the Government of this country; whether honestly or not, every one must judge for himself, and by the circumstances make up his own opinion.

Why did we not hear of those matters from the gentlemen in their very eloquent exordiums this morning, praising the administration of the Board of Navy Commissioners? For years past, this board have had the exclusive management of the Navy, and it was not until the present efficient

SENATE.

Secretary took charge of the Department that any of these abuses were attempted to be corrected. It is to the present Secretary that the country owes the prohibition of our Navy commanders converting our ships into horse and donkey stables. He has also, I understand, made some other changes, but those commissioners have still too much power, without any direct responsibility, and it is my wish to see a new organization of the Navy Department, so that there may be one responsible head, a healthy body, and active and efficient limbs to take the place of the sickly, unhealthy condition of the present system.

Before I close, I must say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that my constituents alone send more grain, flour, pork, whiskey, iron, and other necessities of life, which cannot be dispensed with, to market, than two thirds of all the New England States north and east of New York, besides coal and lumber to an immense amount, and depend upon industry and frugality for their prosperity, and not upon appropriations from the General Government for light-houses, harbors, dry-docks, or exclusive privileges, as most of his constituents do.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will adopt the amendment; but whether it is adopted or not at this session, the discussion of the subject will call the attention of those who administer the Government to provide, by next session, a plan to remedy the evil complained of; and it will also let those in office know that the people are not either blind, deaf, or dumb, although they may not have "a sea-port" in their vicinity, but are busy scrutinizing the conduct of those intrusted with the management of the affairs of the nation. I wish it to be distinctly understood that it has not been my intention to say aught derogatory to the private character of any man in office; it is not the men or their private characters I attack, but the office, and the effect produced by an improper and improvident organization, producing evils which those I represent wish to have remedied.

SETTLEMENT OF FLORIDA.

REMARKS OF HON. T. H. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 5, 1839,

On the bill providing for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida, and in reply to Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, and Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator from Ohio had acted with his accustomed frankness in stating the reason which induced him to oppose this bill. It is because Florida is a slaveholding Territory, and because the bill will have the effect of increasing the slaveholding interest. For these reasons he opposes it, and he seems to think that God will curse any country or place which admits of slavery. He instances St. Domingo, as a country which has declined and decayed because the French, as he says, hunted the slaves with dogs; seeming to forget the horrid massacre of the white race which took place in that island about forty years ago, and which destruction of the white race is the true cause of the decline of the island. He also instances Alton, as a place which has become desolate because Mr. Lovejoy, the Abolitionist, lost his life there. This may be a double error. Alton may not be desolate; may not have experienced any decline but that which is the temporary effect of overaction; and if not as flourishing now as formerly, it may be for a very different reason than that of the wrath of the Deity for the death of Mr. Lovejoy. But what has Florida done to excite these remarks, or to make her dread the Divine vengeance? She has done nothing against the black race or the Abolitionists. She has done nothing to cause the Deity to make her a place of desolation; but desolate she is—desolate is forty-one thousand square miles of her territory, made so by the ravages of the colored races upon the white!

Four counties of Florida are depopulated—great numbers of families, fathers, mothers, and children, have been massacred—a great many officers and soldiers have been killed, and none made prisoners! No prisoners—not one—not even in the defeat of Major Dade. That defeat was a treacherous attack before war had been openly made; and when, at two o'clock in the afternoon, there was no longer a man left standing—when nearly all were dead, and the survivors, covered with wounds and blood, lay among the dead in the little breastwork which they had thrown up for their defense—when, in this condition, even Indian ferocity relented, and savage cruelty was satiated—then it was that a band of forty negroes came down upon the helpless survivors, sought out for each one that was alive, and gave the knife and the hatchet to every helpless being in whom breath or motion could be found. This is what the negroes did; and it was only from two wounded soldiers, believed to be dead, but who were able to crawl off in the night, that the details of that disastrous defeat and massacre have come to the public knowledge. So far as the Indians were concerned, they left a part of the wounded alive in the breastwork; so far as the negroes were concerned, they spared not one! They killed to the last man in whom they could find a sign of life, and the two that escaped were not spared by design, but believed to be dead, and left for dead. This has been the conduct of the colored races in Florida; and certainly the Senator from Ohio should see that his sympathy is misplaced; that it is his own white race which has been the sufferer in Florida; and that the colored races have exulted in the slaughter and destruction of men, women, and children, descended, like the Senator himself, from the white branch of the human race.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] is candid enough to speak for others as well as himself; he speaks for certain sagacious politicians, as he describes them, who saw in this bill, from the moment it was brought forward, a design to raise up new Territories in the South to become slave States, and to increase the slaveholding interest. He tells us that these sagacious politicians all saw this effect the moment this bill was brought in, and he applauds the foresight of these sagacious men. Doubtless the effect of the bill will be to increase the population of Florida; and is that a sufficient reason with the sagacious politicians to whom he refers for opposing the bill? Certainly the politicians of the South and West have not acted on this principle in relation to the non-slaveholding Territories. Look at Wisconsin and Iowa, two Territories on the Upper Mississippi, both fully organized, filling up with people, and ready to become States within less than two years from this day. Where was southern jealousy when these two Territories were organized? Where were the sagacious politicians of the South at that time? They were here, sir—here in this Senate and in the House of Representatives; they knew very well that they were raising up two non-slaveholding States; but they did nothing to obstruct the organization of the two Territories; they indulged no jealousy; they made no political calculations; they did what they believed was right; and now all that they ask from the politicians of the non-slaveholding States is to act on the same principle—to do what is right for Florida, without indulging in jealousy or political calculations.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] has followed the Senator from Ohio, and has entered into an elaborate opposition to the bill. He objects to all parts of it, the details as well as the principle, and strenuously opposes its passage. He objects to the land bounty, and treats it as a naked gratuity, like the fishing bounties, and considers it a free gift of so much of the public domain. So far as the fishing bounties are concerned, they are, where not a drawback of the salt duty, a naked gratuity for which no services are rendered to the United States; but in the case of these settlers, the land will not be a bounty in the nature of a premium or a gift, but will be a bounty in the military sense of the word, that is to say, it will be in payment, or part payment, of military service. This is the nature of the bounty land to be granted by the bill. It is not a gift, but is a price paid for services, real services, which are to be rendered. The ten thousand settlers in Florida are to go into stations—into blockhouses and stockades—into fortification, in fact; which they are to man and defend until Florida is pacified, and the Indians are removed. They are to do the service of any army, and to accomplish an object which armies have not been able to accomplish. They are to render military service, which may continue one, two, or more years. Now, this is no gift of land. It is a sale, and a sale for a valuable consideration; and such a consideration as thousands will reject for one that will accept. Thousands will refuse to take the land on the terms of the bill, for one that will take it. Perhaps few from the Senator's own State will accept three hundred and twenty acres of land on the terms proposed, yet every one of them would certainly accept it as a gift.

The Senator, therefore, is in great error in treating these bounties as gifts. They are pay for military services, as much so as the military bounty lands of the late war. By an act of Congress, the soldiers in the latter part of the late war received a bounty in land of three hundred and twenty acres each—the soldier received this over and above his pay, subsistence, clothing, and other allowances. The land was called a bounty; but it was a bounty in the sense of the bounty money paid to the recruit at the time of enlistment; it was pay, and not a gift. The Senator comes from a State which opposed the bounty land to the soldiers of the late war, to aid in repulsing the British. He now opposes bounties to settlers in Florida, to drive the Indians from that Territory; and in all this his State is consistent. She acts on a uniform principle, and is entitled to respect for her steadfastness of purpose. No, sir, these bounties are not gifts, but payments for great and valuable services. The Senator says the land will amount to three million two hundred thousand acres, and will be worth $4,000,000; and this is true. The land would bring, if sold, $4,000,000 to the Treasury; but it has to be conquered before it can be sold! It will have to be conquered! These settlers will have to conquer the three million two hundred thousand acres for themselves, and, also, at the same time, will conquer above twenty million acres more for the Government; for the Indians now have possession of twenty-six million acres of land in East Florida, the greater part of it public land, and of which the Government can have no use until the Indians are expelled. Grant that the land would be worth $4,000,000, when it is conquered, it is worth nothing to us now; and it will be the cheapest payment that can be made for the conquest of Florida. The Senator from Massachusetts is startled at $4,000,000; yet his fishermen have drawn upwards of six million dollars in bounties, and are now actually drawing, from year to year, at the rate of $257,000 per annum.

The Senator from Massachusetts objects also to the rations, the medicines, the seed grains, the transportation, and the hospital attendance, which is to be given to the settlers. He considers all these aids as gratuities, as naked gifts, bestowed upon the settlers for nothing. Far otherwise is the fact, Mr. President. They are in payment of military services; they are in part payment for the same services for which the land is granted; and they rest upon the same principle as similar supplies to militia and volunteers, when called into the service of the United States, would rest upon. The whole of these small items together will not cost the Treasury more than half a million dollars; a mere trifle compared to the expense of calling out militia and volunteers on every alarm. Governor Gilmer, with the sanction of the Government, has just called out five hundred men for the protection of the frontiers of Georgia; other bodies have been called out for the protection of middle Florida and the country about St. Augustine; and these calls must be repeated as often as depredations are committed, as often as alarms, real or false, continue to occur. The regular troops cannot guard the frontiers; they may do all they can; the Indians will elude them; will avoid their presence; will steal in upon the settlements, and will massacre families. Then volunteers will be called out; they will come when they are called; and they will be paid. A large annual expenditure must be looked for in this way, over and above the expenses for the regular troops, until the Indians are removed, unless the country is occupied by armed settlers. These are the efficient means to terminate the war; and they are the cheapest means—cheapest in a mere moneyed point of view, to say nothing of being cheapest in lives.

It is objected to the bill by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] that these ten thousand settlers are to be without military organization; and possibly he might have found a still stronger objection to them if they had been organized. If they had been organized, then we should have encountered objections to an army of ten thousand men, over and above our regular Army of twelve thousand. This was well foreseen; it was foreseen that we should have a cry against a new army; and, therefore, the settlers go under their real characters of cultivators, and when assembled in their stations, they can form themselves into companies and battalions, if they please, under the laws of Florida, or they may remain in their stations and choose a leader from among themselves, if they wish to make expeditions, and pursue the Indians. They can make such expeditions if they please; it will be at their own option; the bill does not require it; it requires but three things; first, to live at the station; secondly, to defend it if attacked; thirdly, to cultivate the ground for their own benefit. This is all that the bill requires, and to do these things requires no military organization. Doubtless the settlers will defend themselves, and they can choose their own leaders for that purpose. United States troops will always be at hand to aid them; and such disposition of the troops can be made that every station will be within protecting distance of a body of regulars.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] further objects to the bill because it contemplates a settlement of the Territory of Florida. He says it is a bill to promote settlement, to cause the country to be settled, to induce people to go to the country and settle there. Sir, it is rather a bill to resettle the country, to reoccupy it, to repeople it. Often has it been stated in this debate that the inhabitants of four counties and a half of this portion of Florida have been driven from their homes for three years; that about one hundred miles square of the territory between the Suwannee and the St. Johns, and between the Georgia line and the Withlacoochee river, all settled over at the breaking out of this war, and part of it settled under the Spanish Government, has been depopulated by this war, the inhabitants driven from their homes, and now anxiously wishing to return. It is one of the objects of the bill to restore these exiled families to their homes. It is an object of the bill, also, to restore the settlement and to rebuild the light-house at the point of the peninsula, where so much commerce passes, where the contracted gorge of the gulf, the violence of the gulf stream, and the frequent prevalence of contradictory winds, subject merchant vessels to danger of being wrecked, and where the wrecked American mariner is more certain of being massacred than he would be on the most barbarian coast of any part of Africa or of Asia.

Mr. B. here read a letter from Lieutenant Shurbrick, of the United States Navy, dated in December last, showing the force of the Indians, the danger to ships and mariners, the supplies which the hostile Indians received there from wrecked vessels, and the necessity of aiding the commerce of the country, as well as protecting the lives of our citizens, in that exposed point of the peninsula of Florida. The following is the letter:

UNITED STATES SLOOP PANTHER, OFF KEY BISCAYNE, December 1, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you, that after having executed your order relative to the transfer of stores from Indian Key, I proceeded to Key Biscayne, and made expeditions in the Boca Raton. We fell in with large boxes of Indians, who came to the edge of the woods and built fires, to entice us on shore. I did not attack them, their force being too large. On Sunday, the 24th November, a boat came alongside, informing me that the steamer Wilmington was ashore to the north of Cape Florida. The Panther was immediately under weigh, and about fifty miles above the cape I had the pleasing satisfaction of rescuing the rest of her crew, sixteen in number. These, with two boats, I brought to Key Biscayne.

In the interim I dispatched acting Lieutenant C. R. Howard with the barge Shacco, in one of the sloops of Mr. Housman, to the wreck of a Spanish brig. He saved her crew, (nearly thirty slaves,) a large portion of her cargo, but was subsequently blown off, and the barge, most unfortunately, lost in getting her in. I then went up in the Panther—got a great deal of lead from her, and other articles that would have been valuable to the Indians, and burnt her. The Indians were in sight in the river behind the hill.

Respectfully, &c., I have the honor to be,
E. T. SHURBRICK,
Acting Lieutenant.

Lieutenant Commandant JOHN McLAUGHLIN, United States Schooner Wave.

Having read this letter, Mr. B. appealed to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] as a friend to commerce, and as representing a commercial State, to aid in restoring the exiled inhabitants to their homes at the point of the peninsula; that the light-house which the Indians had burnt down might be rebuilt, and a population established there, not only to succor mariners and ships after they were wrecked, but before it; to relieve them while in distress, and to save lives, vessels, and property, from the dangers which they now encountered. In the name of commerce, Mr. B. invoked the Senator from Massachusetts to cease his opposition, and to give his aid to the settlement of Florida; to its occupation and re-occupation by our own citizens, to the exclusion of the marauding and murdering Indians which now roamed over it, ravaging where they went. Forty-one thousand square miles of territory; a region from the Suwannee river to the Atlantic ocean, from the State of Georgia to Cape Sable; a region of country above four hundred miles in length and more than one hundred in breadth—this vast region, capable of sustaining a large population, rich in the production of the most valuable tropical crops and fruits, the proper region of the mulberry, where three generations of the silk worm, and consequently three successive supplies of their rich products, may be annually expected; where fisheries of great value await our industry; and where, from its geographical position, commerce demands aid and succor. This large and rich region now demands the protection of this Government, and certainly protection is the first duty which the Government owes to its citizens.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in the universality of his objections to the bill, deprecates it as a new measure—as a new mode of proceeding, never before thought of. Sir, it is new, I admit; but new only in the sense of the French proverb, which says: "nothing is new but what has been forgotten." In this sense the plan of the bill is new; for the Senator seems to have forgotten that every inch of territory on this continent, now occupied by white people, was taken from the Indians by armed settlers, and that pre-emptions and donations of land have forever rewarded the bold settlers who rendered this service to the civilization of the world. The savages have given way before the armed settler from the day that the New World was discovered up to the present time. The blockhouse, the stockade, the rifle, have taken the country, and have held it, from the shores of the Atlantic to the far West; and in every instance grants of land have rewarded the courage and enterprise of the bold pioneer. The bill, then, instead of proposing something never heard of before, proposes, in fact, to go back to the old and tried mode of proceeding—to go back to the ancient and wise practice of our forefathers, and to follow the course which has been always followed in the settlement of new countries.

SETTLEMENT OF FLORIDA.

SPEECH OF HON. T. H. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 5, 1839.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida which is now overrun and infested by hostile bands of Indians, was taken up and read.

[The bill proposes to grant three hundred and twenty acres of land to each white settler over the age of eighteen, able to bear arms, not exceeding ten thousand men, who shall settle in such parts of Florida as shall be indicated by the Government, and to remain there as cultivators until the Indians are expelled from the country. The settlers to live in stations of from forty to one hundred men, to have a special protection from the United States troops while putting up their blockhouses, and a general protection afterwards. The United States to supply them with provisions for one year, and with seed grains and seed vegetables for the first crop, with ammunition until peace is restored, and transportation to distant stations; each settler to choose his own land, according to the date of settlement, so that first settlers shall have first choices within their respective districts; with several minor provisions for the benefit of the health, comfort, and safety of the settler.]

The bill having been read through,

Mr. BENTON said that it was a new measure, proposing a radical change in the mode of expelling the Indians from Florida, and that an exposition of its principles, and of the reasons for proposing it, would naturally be expected by the Senate.

It is a new measure. It proposes to carry settlers, instead of militia and volunteers, to Florida; it proposes settlement and cultivation, instead of campaigns and battles; it proposes to substitute the ax, the plow, and the hoe, for the gun, the sword, and the bayonet. This is a radical change in our mode of operating in Florida, and the reasons for it are clear and decisive. Troops have been tried, and have failed in accomplishing the object. Every species of troops have been tried; regulars, militia, and volunteers, horse and foot. They have made campaigns and fought battles for three years, and have done all that men could do under such circumstances; and they have suffered more than men ought to be required to suffer in such a war; and all without accomplishing the object. Three years have been consumed in military operations; and at what cost and with what results? At the cost in money of near $20,000,000; in lives, of near forty officers killed, or died of their wounds, or of the climate; of many wounded; of nearly four hundred soldiers killed and wounded of the regular Army; besides heavy losses among the militia and volunteers. This is the cost! and what are the results? The results are four counties of Florida depopulated—the Indians ravaging the country from Cape Sable to the Okefinokee swamp—the frontiers of Georgia attacked—depredations carried to the suburbs of St. Augustine and Tallahassee—the light-house at Florida Point burnt and destroyed—shipwrecked mariners on the coast of Florida massacred—and all cultivation suspended over a large district of country, part of which was settled and cultivated under the dominion of Spain, when Florida was a province of that kingdom. These are the results after three years of military operations—after this great cost in money and in lives.

The inefficacy of campaigns and battles is proved; and the question is, what shall we do next? Shall we continue to call out thousands of volunteers to cooperate with the regular Army in the further prosecution of the war? Shall we continue to call upon the surrounding States for their annual supply of men and horses for this fruitless service? Shall we still project campaigns and battles? Our opinion is, that we shall cease with that mode of carrying on the contest; that we shall give up the idea of campaigns and battles; that we shall open our eyes to the truth of the problem that this is not a service for an army to be employed upon! that it is an unfit and impracticable service for an army; and that an armed occupation and settlement of the territory is the true way of expelling the Indians and pacifying the country.

This is the mode recommended and sanctioned by the Administration, and approved by the most experienced officers. The Secretary of War, in his report at the commencement of the session, suggests the plan. General Jesup, who has been so much employed, and rendered so much real service in Florida, fully approves it. The Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, who has done double duty in Florida—commanding a corps and healing the sick and the wounded—also fully approves it. Governor Call, in a message to the Territorial Legislature, does the same. General Hernandez, a native of St. Augustine, engaged in several of the expeditions against the Indians, and a great loser by their depredations, also is full and explicit in favor of the new plan. The sentiments of all these gentlemen have been made known to the Senate, in written communications, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed and laid upon the tables of members. The change, then, which the bill proposes, has the approval of experienced officers, best qualified to give an opinion upon the subject.

The state of things in Florida cannot remain as they are. They cannot stand still in their present condition. We must do something; and it does seem to me that the plan proposed is not only the best, but, perhaps, the only mode of accomplishing what has been so long tried in vain. I hold it to be the best mode, in every aspect, under which the question can be considered, of expelling the Indians from Florida. In the first place, it is the cheapest mode. Considered in a mere pecuniary point of view—under the mere head of expense—and it must be far cheaper than the further employment of large bodies of militia and volunteers, in addition to the regular force disposable for that service. Almost the only expense would be in land; and land of which we have not the possession, and which the settlers must conquer for us before we can give it to them; and, with it, must conquer upwards of twenty million acres more for us. The whole quantity to be granted will be but three million two hundred thousand acres; its value to the United States nothing now, and only $4,000,000 when these settlers shall have expelled the Indians from it. The quantity is but three million and a quarter of acres; only the eighth part of what the settlers will acquire for the United States; for the whole quantity of lands of which these Indians have the possession is about twenty-six million acres, and far the greater part of it public property. The settlers, then, are to be paid with a small part of their own earnings. Four million dollars' worth of land, to be conquered from the Indians by the settlers themselves, will constitute almost the whole expense. The rations, the ammunition, the transportation, the medicines, and the seed grains, all together, cannot cost half a million dollars; so that the total expense under the bill will be $4,500,000; and this upon a certainty; for, unless the object is accomplished, no land will be earned.

In the next place, it is the most humane method of terminating this war. It is most humane to our own people; for it is terrible to employ our Army and our citizen soldiers—all of them valuable in themselves, and connected with parents, wives, and children, to whom their lives are both precious and necessary—it is terrible to employ officers, soldiers, and citizens upon a service which is but little above that of hunting wild beasts, and in which the killed and wounded undergo a species of assassination from an invisible hand, and in which no prisoners are made. It is most humane with respect to the Indians themselves; for the effect of the settlements will be to expel them from the country by the advance of population, and almost without bloodshed. The establishment of ten thousand cultivators in the country, occupying one or two hundred positions to command the coasts and all the healthy and valuable spots, will soon have its uniform effect upon the Indians. They will recede as the stations advance: they will retire beyond the Mississippi when they hear, from the Okefinokee swamp to Cape Sable, the sound of the ax, the crack of the rifle, and the fierce barking of the house-dog. With little effusion of blood on either side will this protracted contest, in this manner, be brought to a close. Considerations of humanity, then, demand its adoption. In the third place, it will be the most efficacious method. It will be no longer a struggle of the whites against the Indians, but of the Indians against the whites. The action of the war will be reversed. Now the Indians are the possessors of the country, and the effort is on the part of the whites to dislodge them from their fastnesses; then the whites will become the possessors, and it will be the business of the Indians to drive them out of their stations. This they can never do. A hollow square of block-houses, manned by four or five rifles each, and guarded by the faithful mastiff, is secure from attack or surprise from any number of Indians whatever. All the Indians in the United States could not take one of these stations. The plan which we recommend is, therefore, certainly the best in three essential features of cheapness, humanity, and efficiency.

It may be objected by some, Mr. President, that the plan is not practicable; that is to say, that ten thousand men cannot be found who will go to Florida upon the terms of the bill. To this I would answer, in the first place, that there is no knowing whether the plan will succeed or not, until it is tried. In the next place, I would answer that the objection furnishes no reason for voting against the bill, even if it could be known to be true; for the experiment can cost nothing unless it succeeds. The settlers can receive no rations unless they go to their stations: they can receive no land unless they remain there until the Indians are removed. It is, therefore, a bill which may do great good, and can do no harm. If it succeeds, everything is gained; if it miscarries, nothing is lost. It will be an innocent and costless experiment at all events. There is, therefore, no harm in trying it. So much for the objection even if founded in truth! But I deny its truth. I hold it to be unfounded; and that, in point of fact, the plan is every way practicable; that the ten thousand settlers will go—that they will maintain their position when they get there—will accomplish the object for which they go—and will do well for themselves, as well as render a great service to their country by going.

The settlers will go if the bill passes; the inducements are sufficient to carry them. Three hundred and twenty acres of land, selected by the settler himself out of twenty-six million acres, (for the large grants to the Duke of Alagon, the Count Panton Rostro, and Don Pedro de Vargas, are all declared null and void by the treaty of cession;) three hundred and twenty acres of land so selected out of so large a quantity, in a region of such valuable productions, must be a rich remuneration for two or three years residence in Florida, with all the other advantages which the bill proposes to confer. True, this land would be worth but $400 to the Government; true, the Treasury would receive no more than $400 if the three hundred and twenty acres should be sold; but the sum which the Government would receive would be no criterion of its value. It would be worth a far larger sum; it would be worth many dollars an acre to the settler—far more than he could earn in the same length of time by any pursuit or occupation which he could follow. Great is the intrinsic value of good land in the peninsula of Florida. Highly valuable it is for its productions and for its locality. Besides the rich products of cotton and sugar, and the famous Cuba tobacco, worth thirty dollars a hundred—besides these rich staples many of the most valuable tropical fruits are grown there; fruits, the cultivation of which is so easy and the value so great. The pine apple, the orange, lemons, limes, figs, the plantain, cocoa, with the most delicious grapes and melons, are all grown there. The capacity for producing these valuable crops and fruits give a great intrinsic value to the good lands of Florida, to say nothing of the live-oak and other fine timber which abound in many parts. Besides the land, the bill proposes other advantages to the settler; subsistence for one year, seed grains and vegetables, ammunition, medicines, reception of the sick in the military hospitals, transportation, aid in putting up block-houses, special protection while establishing the station, general protection afterwards, land to use before they get their own, and the benefit of all their own time and labor. Such are the advantages which the bill proposes, in addition to the three hundred and twenty acres of land; and surely there is no possible way in which a man by his own exertions—any young man able to bear arms, though not of age—can in so short a time, with so much ease to himself, without the use of capital, and by his mere individual personal exertions, make and clear so valuable an estate.

Great error prevails in the common estimate of the value of these Florida lands. By many, all the pine lands are condemned, when in fact much of them have a clay and marl foundation, and are of great value. Great bodies of savanna, extensive hammocks, rich swamps, alluvials, clay, and marl, are found, all adapted to valuable cultivation. On this head the letters of Dr. Lawson and General Hernandez are full and satisfactory.

The settlers will go, and when there will maintain themselves. Subsistence will be easy, for the first year the Government supplies it. In that time grain and vegetables will be produced. Cattle, swine, and fowls, will be introduced. The natural supplies of the country will contribute much towards the support of the inhabitants. The forests abound with game, with deer, turkeys, and quails; the waters are covered with aquatic fowls, and filled with fish, turtle, and oysters. It is the opinion of General Jesup, so declared in his letter which has been printed by order of the Senate, that the fisheries on the coast of Florida, in proportion to their extent, will prove as valuable as those of Newfoundland. Many indigenous vegetables are found; of which the wild potato, the brier root, the cabbage tree, the palmetto, and the wild arrow root, are the most considerable. The climate will admit of two crops of grain and vegetables within the year. The settler can find no difficulty in providing for his subsistence. He should go the first year without his family. His rations will be sufficient for himself that year; the second year his family will find their support in the produce of the crops, in the increase of cattle, swine, and fowls, and in the boundless supplies of the forest and waters.

The settlers can maintain themselves against the Indians. Even if they had no assistance from the United States troops, they could maintain their positions. They are to be formed into stations of from forty to one hundred men at each place. These stations will be a species of fortification, covering ground enough to shelter many people, and impregnable to Indians. The block-houses may be arranged into hollow squares, to include several hundred acres of ground for cultivation; or they may be formed into a line across a point, or along a coast, within the distance of rifle cross firing, with four or five men allotted to each house. Such stations could not be taken by force; and, with the faithful house dog for a sentinel, they could not be surprised. I hold a block-house to be impregnable against Indians. No number of Indians can take one of those houses, with four or five riflemen in it. It is the strongest defense in the world against small-arms. Of this, you, sir, [addressing himself to the Vice President, Colonel R. M. Johnson,] of this you have full knowledge, from the experience of the early settlers in Kentucky and Tennessee. Few or no block-houses were even taken there, the strength of the house securing it against force, and the vigilance of the mastiff securing it against stratagem. Our late southern Indian wars have furnished striking instances to the same effect, of which I will mention one. At the breaking out of the Creek war in 1813, the inhabitants on the Mobile and Alabama rivers collected into a station, which soon acquired a frightful celebrity. It was called Fort Mimms. A battalion of militia guarded the place, and a great number of families sought shelter within its huts and stockades. I was at the place a few months afterwards, and verified the facts of which I speak. Among other families under the shelter of this fort, was that of two brothers, their names Pearce, natives of one of the New England States. They were considerate, reflecting, clear-sighted men, cautious and brave.

In the Friday night preceding the Monday on which the fort was surprised, they were convinced, by the fierce and peculiar growling of the dogs, that the Indians were about—that they were examining the place preparatory to an attack upon it; and they were convinced, from the negligence which prevailed at the fort, that it might be surprised. These brothers had a saw mill two miles off, and for its protection a block house near to it. They concluded that they would be safer in their own block house, with their four or five rifles, than in a fort so negligently guarded. This was Friday night; on Saturday morning they acted on this belief; they removed their household to the block house; and, at twelve o'clock on Monday, Fort Mimms was surprised and taken. Hearing the firing, one of the brothers mounted a horse, rode down to the scene, sat in a cove of wood, saw the rifle, the knife, and the hatchet dispatching the children, the women, and the men, as the flames of the burning fort drove them out of the stockade into the open ground about. When the massacre was over, the Indians turned their steps to the block house of the Pearces. They examined it; they walked round it at a respectful distance; they went off; and those two brothers, with a few men in their employ, maintained their position during the whole war, without the loss of a life, and with the complete protection of their own property. This is an example, in point, to show the safety of a block house, and numerable others might be related. Entirely safe, then, will be the proposed settlers in Florida, even without the protection of a military force. But it is not intended to leave them without protection. The regular troops of the United States will remain in the country, occupying commanding positions, reconnoitering, marching, pursuing the Indians, and defending the settlers. There are now six regiments employed on that service; one of dragoons, two of artillery, and three of infantry. They comprise nearly four thousand men; and, even without the clause to that effect in the bill, there can be no question but that the Government will keep up a strong military force in the country, and give all possible protection, security, and defense to the settlers. Besides this land force, small vessels of war have been kept upon that station to succor troops and mariners, and will doubtless be continued there.

The settlers will find healthy positions for their stations. On this point the letter of the Surgeon General, Dr. Lawson, is full and explicit; and his skill as a medical man, and his knowledge of the country as having been in it, and at the furthest extremity of the peninsula, for nearly two years, make him a judge of the highest character, and a witness of the highest authority. He testifies to the salubrity of the stations which may be found at various points, and generally along the coasts, and particularly at the point of the peninsula itself. After describing a great number of healthy and fertile districts, desirable for settlements, he thus speaks of the immediate point of the peninsula:

"At Cape Sable there is a beautiful spot for a military post and depot for a colony, which should be established on a prairie running east and by north from that cape along the coast towards Cape Florida. This prairie runs immediately on the sea-shore for thirty-five miles, then turns a little north and to the interior of the country, extending, perhaps, twenty or thirty miles more in length. It appears to be an inclined plane, falling imperceptibly from the sea-shore to the everglades, a distance of fifteen or twenty miles, to the interior of the country. From what I saw of the products of the land on the cape and the islands in the vicinity, I am induced to believe that the soil of this prairie will produce in great perfection grain and vegetables of every kind, with sugar-cane, cotton, &c. Through the prairie there are numerous clumps and groves of trees, which will afford both fuel and building timber for the settlers. The keys and sandbars in front of the cape make an excellent harbor for steamboats and sail vessels drawing from six to ten feet water. The waters along this coast are full of turtle and fish of every kind, and the prairie and woods around abound in game."

"The immediate site of Cape Sable is evidently healthy, as are almost all situations directly on the sea-board; and I have no doubt that healthy positions can be gotten on the prairie, as the climate is delightful even in the summer season, from the prevalence of the sea breeze, or trade winds."

This description of the peninsula (said Mr. B.) puts a different face upon it from that which it had before borne. It is certain that it will sustain a large population, merely from agricultural pursuits, and independently of the commerce which its geographical position will command. The immediate point itself, heretofore believed to be barren sand, or insalubrious marsh, is here shown to be healthy, fertile, and beautiful, and furnishing good homes for two thousand settlers under this bill, at three hundred and twenty acres of land each.

Sir, the plan proposed by the bill is a good plan, and must succeed if it is tried. The men will go; they will maintain their positions; and the Indians will go away. It is the cheapest plan than can be devised; for, unless it succeeds, it will cost nothing. No rations will be issued unless the men go to the stations; no land will be granted unless they remain there until the Indians are expelled. It will cost nothing unless it succeeds; and in this it differs from all other plans which have been or can be devised. In all other plans the expense is certain, the success uncertain. If it does succeed, it will cost but $4,500,000, $4,000,000 of which will be paid in land, of which the settlers will have to gain possession from the Indians; and, at the same time will gain possession of upwards of twenty million acres for the United States, over and above what will pay themselves. Compared to the heavy expense of campaigns against the Indians, this expenditure is comparatively nothing. Compared with the mere defense of the country and the surrounding settlements, now occupying six regiments of regulars, and always more or less of militia and volunteers, called out upon every alarm, and it will still be found to be far the cheapest. Manage as they may, unless the country is occupied by armed settlers, the mere defense of the frontiers in perpetual calls for militia and volunteers, will amount to a great sum annually; and, eventually, to far more than would be the whole expense of expelling the Indians and pacifying the country under this bill. The ten thousand men are not too many. It is a case in which both economy and humanity require an ample number to be employed at once. The country to be occupied is of great extent, abounding with fastnesses; and of a form to require the greatest number of men to protect it. It is upwards of four hundred miles in length, by above one hundred in breadth, with large swamps in many places, and presenting an outline of at least nine hundred miles, every part of which requires defense. Spread ten thousand men over this superfluous, and along this outline, in stations of from forty to one hundred each, and it will be found that the settlements will be sparsely enough scattered over it.

This is the plan, Mr. President, for the recovery and pacification of Florida. It is recommended by the Secretary of War, approved by the most experienced officers, and is practicable on its face. It is the plan on which we rely; and the question is, shall we adopt this plan, or do nothing, and leave the work to the regular troops, and to the militia and volunteers which, from time to time, may be called out? Experience shows that this mode of warfare can accomplish no results; that, at the end of three years, the population of four counties remain driven from their homes, the frontiers of Georgia lie open to incursion and massacre, the suburbs of Tallahassee and St. Augustine are penetrated and attacked, forty-one thousand square miles of our territory are ravaged by a savage foe; and a large extent of coast, including a cape which must be doubled, lying between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic—between New Orleans and New York—is more unsafe to the American mariner than the savage shores of the most barbarian nations in any part of Africa, Asia, or New Holland. This state of things cannot be tolerated—cannot be permitted to continue. The United States Government owes defense to its citizens, and protection to its Territories. It owes protection and security to its commerce. We cannot give up the peninsula of Florida to a banditti of savages; we cannot surrender it to become a refuge to runaway slaves, marauding Indians, and to freebooters and pirates from the surrounding islands and keys of the Gulf of Mexico. We cannot permit a part of our own coast to remain more dangerous to our mariners than the coasts of the most distant and barbarian nation; we cannot suffer ourselves to be baffled in a contest with a tribe of savages. We must subdue these Indians; we must pacify and settle Florida. The plan we propose is the only one from which success, in any reasonable time, is expected. It is the only one which we now have to offer; and, having thus made an exposition of the principle of the bill, it would be very agreeable to me, and a course strictly parliamentary in itself, to take the sense of the Senate on the principle of the measure, unembarrassed with details, on a motion to strike out the first section, or to postpone the whole bill indefinitely. If there are Senators who object to the whole plan of the bill—to the whole idea of an armed occupation by settlers and cultivators—let them move to strike out, or to postpone. We shall then have the sense of the Senate upon the principle of the measure; and if that sense is against the whole measure, much time and trouble will be saved in avoiding all the labor of perfecting details.

SETTLEMENT OF FLORIDA.

REMARKS OF HON. LEWIS F. LINN, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 5, 1839.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida which is now overrun and infested by hostile bands of Indians, being under consideration—

Mr. LINN said there was great necessity of adopting this or some similar measure, and gave it as his opinion that, with the means heretofore used, we should not bring this unfortunate war to a close in less than half a century. We will accomplish no good by sending detachments of the regular army against these Indians. Our officers, it seemed to him, were too fearful of being beaten to act efficiently or to encounter them successfully. We must get men there who will be determined to subdue the Indians at all hazards. Let any one look back at the battle of Okechobe, and it would be obvious that there never was less military skill than was displayed on that occasion, that the errors committed on that day, arose from the fear on the part of the commanding general of being defeated by the Seminoles. Mr. L. said that he could scarcely trust himself to speak of that battle, for, generally speaking, it agitated him profoundly even to think of it. He was not certain that he ought to trust himself to speak of it at all, and the Senate would remember the reasons why, as a Missourian, he manifested feeling and discomposure in alluding to that battle. [Mr. L. alluded to the slaughter of the Missouri volunteers, and the attempt that was made to tarnish their reputation.] He was satisfied that the best defense for the great western frontier would be a cordon of just such men as his colleague had asked for in his bill. If you will give three hundred and twenty acres of land lying along that whole line of frontier, of one thousand two hundred miles in length, to every man who would settle on it, and engage in its defense, you would at once organize a force that would set at defiance those hordes of savages which the policy of this Government had accumulated on that border, and of whose formidable numbers his friend from South Carolina [Mr. Paeon] had spoken. Mr. L. here spoke in favorable terms of the bill introduced by one of the Senators from Arkansas, [Mr. FULTON,] setting apart a certain portion of land on that frontier as bounty lands for settlers who will engage in its defense. That whole frontier (Mr. L. said) was sparsely settled, and this state of things offered a temptation to marauding bands of savages to attack them. Build up a wall against the sixty thousand Indian warriors strung along that border, of hardy, brave, and enterprising pioneers, and your regular army will find employment in preventing the whites from encroaching on and overwhelming the Indians. And that should be the state of things. We are entitled to tranquility and safety, and they to permanent protection, that they may pursue the path which is to lead them to improvement in civilization, Christianity, and their concomitant blessings.

Mr. L. said he did not believe there was any danger of a general war with all the Indians on that frontier, unless we should have war with Great Britain, in which event we may look for it to a great certainty. At present we have a strong hold on many tribes, through large annuities secured to them by treaties, and which they will lose by going to war with the United States. But the danger now is, that some tribe on which we have no hold through their interests, may commence hostilities, and be joined immediately by clouds of young, turbulent, and active warriors, from neighboring tribes. If you will, Mr. President, give lands to persons who will pledge themselves to inhabit and cultivate the same for a certain number of years, and let them have choice land, you would find many, very many, in the South and West, actuated by pretty much the same motives which Toussaint or Christophe said governed the Yankees—that is, if a bag of coffee was hung up at the gates of the infernal regions, a Yankee would be found enterprising enough to go there and get it. So it was with the hardy pioneers of the West and Southwest. Tell them that you will give them a section or half section of first-rate land, and you will find plenty to go and take it, and keep it, too, in defiance of all the savages that may infest it. Place Colt's rifle in the hands of the settlers, and let them have a few dogs to give warning of their lurking places, and to start them from their coverts, instead of sending into the dark and tangled hammock your men, to be shot down by an invisible foe, and he would venture to assert that, in a very short space of time, a hostile Seminole would not be left in Florida.

He said he was confident the regular Army would not bring the war to a close in half a century. Neither the education nor habits of the officers or men qualified them for this kind of warfare, where abundance of hard knocks were given but no laurels to be gained. If the regiment that was held in reserve at the battle of Okechobe had been thrown upon one of the flanks of the enemy, and Colonel Foster's on the other, we would have been spared the pain of seeing our people shot down in the presence of a masked battery, and where all the noble efforts were unavailing; but the contest would have been ended at once, either by driving the Seminoles into Lake Okechobe in their rear, or forcing an immediate surrender. This, to us, bloody battle was ended at last, when Colonel Foster made an attack upon one of the flanks of the Indians. He said he did not know whether Colonel Foster made this movement on his own responsibility or under orders from his commander; but, if it was a voluntary act, he deserved the lasting gratitude of his country. The officers of our regular Army were generally gallant and accomplished gentlemen, and would, no doubt, distinguish themselves in a war with England, France, or any civilized Power; but they were not very efficient in Indian warfare. They considered that death, eternal death, to their military fame and character would be the consequence of their being defeated by a miserable band of untutored Indians, which, in his opinion, rendered them overcautious. If you want this war ended promptly, you must send men into Florida who can swim creeks, plunge into swamps and morasses, pillow their heads upon logs, sleep in mud and water, thread the forest and hammock, and undergo every hardship and privation; and the war will be closed only by such men.

TREASURY NOTES.

SPEECH OF HON. W. W. POTTER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 18, 1839,

On the bill to amend "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the Government," approved 21st of May, 1838.

Mr. POTTER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under consideration only carries out the provisions of the last session for an issue of Treasury notes. The amount required is necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, without reference to any extraordinary expenditures which may be created, by further appropriations, during the present session. Prior legislation and appropriations heretofore made by Congress, under this auxiliary to the finances, were necessary, to enable the national Treasury to meet existing demands on it. The pensions granted to revolutionary soldiers, and those of the late war, take rank among the most sacred debts that a nation can contract with individuals, and creates an obligation of the highest and most important character for their prompt and faithful liquidation. Every motive of patriotism imperiously demands that the honor and faith of the Government should be sacredly preserved, and the promises made faithfully redeemed. Is the issue of Treasury notes required to place the Government in funds, to preserve its unsullied character, and perform its obligations? If necessary, then, a high sense of duty requires that this body, in making provision for the payment of the debt, should act promptly and efficiently. This, I take it, is the only true question presented for our consideration. The evidence of the existence of that necessity is not denied, and is abundantly clear, from the reports on our tables. Although it is with unfeigned reluctance that I shall now, and have heretofore, voted for an issue of Treasury notes, yet that feeling is overcome by the necessity of the crisis. I have failed to discover the usual acumen and form of argument that characterizes the efforts of my honorable friends from South Carolina, in the objections urged against the immediate passage of this bill.

The prominent argument assigned against this provision for the liquidation of a fair and recognized claim on the public Treasury is because, forsooth, it will tend, in the other branch of the Legislature and in this, at the present session, to wasteful, extravagant, and unconstitutional appropriations. What! are we to presume that the passage of this bill will induce Congress to violate the letter and spirit of the Constitution, to embark in a profligate expenditure of the public money? A violent and forced presumption, which I am not prepared to make. The spirit of charity and forbearance forbids such presumptions against the integrity and purity of the American Congress. I would most respectfully remark to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that the course of the Pennsylvania delegation, in the last session of this Congress, in casting their votes on the Cumberland road bill, and on the appropriation to the Delaware breakwater, was strictly in accordance with the course of policy generally pursued by the delegation from that State in analogous cases, from the adoption of the Constitution. He is in error in thinking that a single member was influenced in casting his vote from the circumstances of the pending congressional elections in our State, or that now, when the elections are past, it will have the slightest effect in producing a different result.

Another subject has been commented upon in this debate, upon which I desire to offer a few remarks. I allude to the report submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means on the state of the Treasury and the expenditures of the Government. That report contains much that meets my decided approbation. The principles advanced in it, touching the lavish and wasteful expenditure of the public money which grew out of, and was fostered and cherished by the large surplus revenue accumulated in the Treasury, are germane to the approved doctrines of construction given by the Republican party to the Constitution. The danger of corruption to the simple republican institutions of our country, from having in the public Treasury immense amounts of surplus revenue, beyond the economical wants of the Government, are justly and forcibly portrayed. With a full and overflowing Treasury, the purity of the Government is endangered. Extravagance, the forerunner and prolific parent of corruption, steals, "like a thief in the night," into our expenditures, and insensibly saps our institutions. Civil and political rights are best protected, and the purity of the Government preserved, when the Federal powers are administered upon the basis of that rigid and economical expenditure contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, that glorious bond of union and sacred charter of our rights and liberties.

There is, however, one portion of that report from the accuracy of which I entirely dissent. I refer to the intimation that the principle of protection to the great navigating, agricultural, and manufacturing interests of the country, is an innovation upon our legislation, which first arose during and at the close of the late war. Unless I am greatly mistaken, a review of the history of legislation previous to that period will conclusively establish the fact that the principle was coeval with the Constitution itself; nay, the defect of the want of power in the Articles of Confederation authorizing the National Legislature to extend adequate protection to these primary interests of a free people was, in connection with others, one of the causes which led to the convention that framed the Constitution. In the debates in some of the State conventions, when the adoption of the Constitution was under discussion, the importance and necessity of such a delegation of power was ably and eloquently urged as an argument in favor of the Constitution. Virginia, under the articles of confederation, evidenced a desire to protect her commercial and agricultural interests. The futility of the effort, unless the adjoining States united and acted in concert, rendered it entirely impracticable. The entire commerce of the State would have been rapidly concentrated in the ports of Maryland and the adjacent States. The abortive attempt to regulate commerce, and protect thereby the interests connected therewith, demonstrated the importance of Congress possessing the power of general and uniform regulations, which unquestionably gave an impulse to the idea of constitutional reform. It was impossible for the States, acting without union, and in their separate capacities, to afford encouragement or give protection to these great interests, the existence and prosperity of which are essential to the freedom and independence of the country from foreign influence.

That the provisions of the Constitution, vesting in Congress "the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise," and "the power to regulate trade," clothed that body with authority to protect the common agriculture and manufactures of the country, was urged by Mr. Dawes, in the convention of Massachusetts, who advocated the adoption of the Constitution, and the necessity of such provisions. He enforced it in the following language:

"Our manufactures are another great subject which has received no encouragement by national duties, and they never can by any authority in the old Confederation."

Again he observed:

"If we wish to encourage our own manufactures, to preserve our commerce, to raise the value of our own lands, we must give Congress the power in question."

A distinguished opponent to the Constitution, in reply, remarked:

"All we hear is, that the merchant and farmer will flourish, and that the mechanic and tradesmen are to make their fortunes directly, if the Constitution goes down."

It would seem, at that day, that friend and adversary concurred in the opinion that the power of protection would be vested in the Federal Government by the provisions of the Constitution. The second act to be found on your statute-book, after the adoption of the Constitution, solemnly declares, in its preamble:

"That it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported."

In that act, passed in 1789, you will find full and adequate protection given to the staples of the planting States. Cotton, indigo, and tobacco are protected by heavy duties; three cents per pound on cotton, sixteen cents per pound on indigo, and six cents per pound on tobacco. The coal of Virginia had a protection of two cents per bushel, and discriminating duties, in favor of merchandise imported in vessels built in and belonging wholly to citizens of the United States, were adopted.

In the modification and amendment to this act, passed in 1790, the same language relative to the protection of the leading interests of the country is preserved. And we find in the earliest annals of the legislation of the country the principle of protection recognized and sustained in the most emphatic manner. Such was deemed its magnitude and importance to the prosperity of the country, that it is placed on an equality and in juxtaposition with the necessity of the support of the Government; and the preservation of the faith and credit of the nation in the payment of the debts of the Revolution. The cultivation of cotton, the great staple of the South, which has grown and increased in importance and magnitude until it has overshadowed in value all the other exports of the country, in its infancy, received the cherishing and fostering care of the Government. This great agricultural interest, which has done so much to enhance the wealth, increase the prosperity, and, as a medium of exchange, to pay the European debt of the country under the most depressing and embarrassing circumstances, owes its palmy fortunes to the wise and judicious application of the protective system. The report of Alexander Hamilton (the first Secretary of the Treasury) on manufactures, early after the organization of the Government, carried, in some respects, the doctrine of protection by bounties farther, or at least as far, as its most strenuous advocates have ever required. Mr. Madison's motion for commercial restrictions, in the House of Representatives, on the 14th February, 1806, emphatically declares "that the interests of the United States should be promoted by further restrictions and higher duties, in certain cases, on the manufactures and navigation of foreign nations employed in the commerce of the United States." The principle of the imposition of duties for protection standing forth as a naked column to the view of the eye, is enforced in this measure, proposed by that wise and patriotic statesman. The restrictive measures of Mr. Jefferson's administration, the embargo and non-intercourse, breathed hope into, and gave vitality to the great manufacturing interests. These were southern measures, sustained by enlightened statesmen from all the various sections of this widely extended country.

With those evidences of encouragement and protection to the navigating, manufacturing, and agricultural interests, existing on the records of national legislation anterior to the late war, how can any man yield an unqualified assent to the position taken in this report? The colonial policy of Great Britain was to prevent the colonists from spreading a sail upon the ocean, or manufacturing even a "hob nail." The declaration of independence and the successful termination of the revolutionary war severed forever the political vassalage which Great Britain ever held over this country. Yet, if we had remained dependent on her for a supply of all the munitions of war necessary for national defense, and for the clothing we wear, we would have still been in commercial pupilage and vassalage to that Power. No people can be free and independent who have not within themselves the means of defense against the invasion of a foreign enemy, and the necessary clothing and breadstuffs to protect and sustain its population. Grain, the great agricultural staple of the State I have the honor in part to represent, has received a protection of twenty-five cents per bushel. So abundant has heretofore been the supply, that it is only within the last year or two that any considerable amount of that article has been imported into the country. The peculiar circumstances that brought about this result will not, in all human probability, occur for years again. I would ask, are not the interests of an enlightened, intelligent, and bold yeomanry, the tillers of the soil, the stay and defenders of the rights and liberties of the country, worthy of the protection and encouragement of their own Government? Commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, are twin handmaidens, each necessary to the prosperity of the other. A common interest inseparably joins them together; when either languishes and is depressed, the others equally suffer. I am no advocate for excessive duties and high tariffs, which would again produce a bloated Treasury. All we require is uniformity and stability in your revenue laws, and such discrimination in the imposition of duties necessary to raise sufficient revenue to supply the economical wants of the Treasury as will best protect, preserve, and encourage, the great and leading interests of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures. I am no advocate for drawing money, by either direct or indirect taxation, out of the means of the people, unless it is wanted for the purposes of sustaining the Government and maintaining "the common defense and general welfare."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, called the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order, alleging that it was not in order to discuss the tariff on a bill for the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. CRARY (who temporarily occupied the chair) decided that the gentleman was not out of order.

Mr. POTTER proceeded. I should have concluded, before this the observations which I had contemplated to make if the gentleman had not interposed. I but follow the example which those who preceded me had set in this debate. In my humble judgment, manufactures have suffered more from the uncertainty and fluctuations of legislation, from the want of reliance in the steadiness and continuance of any particular system of duties, than all the advantages derived by the high duties imposed by the provisions of the acts of 1828 and 1832. Certainly and stability of legislation will enable them to accommodate their business to the existing state of the country. Give to these leading interests of the country that certain and moderate protection arising from the judicious arrangement of impost duties, necessary to raise revenue to supply the wants of the Treasury when the Government is administered on the most economical scale, necessary for the protection of the country and the advancement of its prosperity, and you will do more, infinitely more, for the certain and steady advancement of the agricultural and manufacturing interest than was accomplished by high tariffs, accompanied by incessant changes and violent political convulsions. Representing a great agricultural and manufacturing district, a sense of duty to my constituents has constrained me to make the remarks which have fallen from me. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Hereafter, when it becomes necessary to readjust the revenue laws and the tariff of duties, if I am honored by a seat on this floor, I trust I shall be enabled to enter upon that duty in the spirit of forbearance, conciliation, and compromise, which produced the Constitution under which we are assembled here; and that the interests of all sections of our common country may be preserved without essential injury to the interests of any.

My thanks are due to the House for the indulgence which has been accorded to me.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. THOS. MORRIS,
OF OHIO,

IN THE SENATE, February 9, 1839,

On presenting certain petitions for the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, &amp;c.

Mr. MORRIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to present for the consideration of the Senate numerous petitions, signed by, not only citizens of my own State, but citizens of several other States, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana. These petitioners, amounting in number to several thousand, have thought proper to make me their organ in communicating to Congress their opinions and wishes on subjects which, to them, appear of the highest importance. These petitions, sir, are on the subject of slavery, the slave trade as carried on within and from this District, the slave trade between the different States of this Confederacy, between this country and Texas, and against the admission of that country into the Union; and also against that of any other State whose constitution and laws recognize or permit slavery. I take this opportunity to present all these petitions together, having detained some of them for a considerable time in my hands, in order that as small a portion of the attention of the Senate might be taken up on their account as would be consistent with a strict regard to the rights of the petitioners. And I now present them under the most peculiar circumstances that has ever probably transpired in this or any other country. I present them on the heel of the petitions which have been presented by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] signed by the inhabitants of this District, praying that Congress would not receive petitions on the subject of slavery in the District from any body of men or citizens but themselves. This is something new; it is one of the devices of the slave power, and most extraordinary in itself. These petitions I am bound in duty to present—a duty which I cheerfully perform; for I consider it not only a duty but an honor. The respectable names which these petitions bear, and being against a practice which I as deeply deprecate and deplore as they can possibly do, yet I well know the fate of these petitions; and I also know the time, place, and disadvantage under which I present them.

In availing myself of this opportunity to explain my own views on this agitating topic, and to explain and justify the character and proceedings of these petitioners, it must be obvious to all that I am surrounded by no ordinary discouragements.

The strong prejudice which is evidenced by the petitioners of the District, the unwillingness of the Senate to hear, the power which is arrayed against me on this occasion, as well as in opposition to those whose rights I am anxious to maintain, opposed by the very lions of debate in this body, who are cheered on by an applauding gallery and surrounding interests, is enough to produce dismay in one far more able and eloquent than, the lone and humble individual who now addresses you. What, sir, can there be to induce me to appear on this public arena, opposed by such powerful odds? Nothing, sir, nothing but a strong sense of duty, and a deep conviction that the cause I advocate is just; that the petitioners whom I represent are honest, upright, intelligent, and respectable citizens, men who love their country, who are anxious to promote its best interests, and who are actuated by the purest patriotism, as well as the deepest philanthropy and benevolence. In representing such men, and in such a cause, though by the most feeble means, one would suppose that, on the floor of the Senate of the United States, order, and a decent respect to the opinions of others, would prevail. From the causes which I have mentioned, I can hardly hope for this. I expect to proceed through scenes which will become this Hall; but nothing shall deter me from a full and faithful discharge of my duty on this important occasion.

Permit me, sir, to remind gentlemen that I have now been six years a member of this body. I have seldom, perhaps too seldom, in the opinion of many of my constituents, pressed myself upon the notice of the Senate, and taken up their time in useless and windy debate. I question very much if I have occupied the time of the Senate during the six years as some gentlemen have during six weeks, or even six days. I hope, therefore, that I shall not be thought obtrusive, or charged with taking up time with abolition petitions. I hope, Mr. President, to hear no more about agitating this slave question here. Who has begun the agitation now? The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] Who has responded to that agitation, and congratulated the Senate and the country on its results? The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] And pray, sir, under what circumstances is this agitation begun? Let it be remembered, let us collect the facts from the records on your table, that when I, as a member of this body, but a few days since offered a resolution as the foundation of proceedings on these petitions, gentlemen, as if operated on by an electric shock, sprung from their seats and objected to its introduction. And when, you, sir, decided that it was the right of every member to introduce such motion or resolution as he pleased, being responsible to his constituents and this body for the abuse of this right, gentlemen seemed to wonder that the Senate had no power to prevent the action of one of its members in cases like this, and the poor privilege of having the resolution printed, by order of the Senate, was denied.

Let the Senator from South Carolina before me remember that, at the last session, when he offered resolutions on the subject of slavery, they were not only received without objection, but printed; voted on, and decided; and let the Senator from Kentucky reflect that the petition which he offered against our right was also received and ordered to be printed without a single dissenting voice; and I call on the Senate and the country to remember that the resolutions which I have offered on the same subject have not only been refused the printing, but have been laid upon the table without being debated or referred. Posterity, which shall read the proceedings of this time, may well wonder what power could induce the Senate of the United States to proceed in such a strange and contradictory manner. Permit me to tell the country now what this power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself, is. It is the power of SLAVERY. It is a power, according to the calculation of the Senator from Kentucky, which owns $1,200,000,000 in human beings as property; and if money is power, this power is not to be conceived or calculated; a power which claims human property more than double the amount which the whole money of the world could purchase. What can stand before this power? Truth, everlasting truth, will yet overthrow it. This power is aiming to govern the country, its constitutions and laws; but it is not certain of success, tremendous as it is, without foreign or other aid. Let it be borne in mind that the bank power some years since, during what has been called the panic session, had influence sufficient in this body, and upon this floor, to prevent the reception of petitions against the action of the Senate on their resolutions of censure against the President. The country took instant alarm, and the political complexion of this body was changed as soon as possible.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Abolition Petitions—Mr. Morris.

SENATE.

The same power, though double in means and in strength, is now doing the same thing. This is the array of power that even now is attempting such an unwarrantable course in this country; and the people are also now moving against the slave, as they formerly did against the bank power. It, too, begins to tremble for its safety. What is to be done? Why, petitions are received and ordered to be printed against the right of petitions which are not received, and the whole power of debate is thrown into the scale with the slaveholding power. But all will not do; these two powers must now be united; an amalgamation of the black power of the South with the white power of the North must take place, as either, separately, cannot succeed in the destruction of the liberty of speech and the press and the right of petition. Let me tell gentlemen that both united will never succeed. As I said on a former day, God forbid that they should ever rule this country. I have seen this billing and cooing between these different interests for some time past; I informed my private friends of the political party with which I have heretofore acted, during the first week of this session, that these powers were forming a union to overthrow the present Administration; and I warned them of the folly and mischief they were doing in their abuse of those who were opposed to slavery. All doubts are now terminated. The display made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY], and his denunciations of these petitioners as Abolitionists, and the hearty response and cordial embrace which his efforts met from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN], clearly show that new moves have taken place on the political chess-board, and new coalitions are formed, new compromises and new bargains, settling and disposing of the rights of the country for the advantage of political aspirants.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] seemed, at the conclusion of the argument made by the Senator from Kentucky, to be filled not only with delight but with ecstasy. He told us that about twelve months since he had offered a resolution which turned the tide in favor of the great principle of State rights, and says he is highly pleased with the course taken by the Kentucky Senator. All is now safe by the acts of that Senator. The South is now consolidated as one man; it was a great epoch in our history, but we have now passed it; it is the beginning of a moral revolution; slavery, so far from being a political evil, is a great blessing; both races have been improved by it; and that Abolition is now dead, and will soon be forgotten. So far the Senator from South Carolina, as I understand him. But, sir, is this really the case? Is the South united as one man, and is the Senator from Kentucky the great center of attraction? What a lesson to the friends of the present Administration, who have been throwing themselves into the arms of the southern slave power for support! The black enchantment I hope is now at an end—the dream dissolved, and we awake into open day. No longer is there any uncertainty or any doubt on this subject. But is the great epoch passed? is it not rather just beginning? Is abolitionism dead? or is it just awakening into life? Is the right of petition strangled and forgotten? or is it increasing in strength and force? These are serious questions for the gentleman's consideration, that may damp the ardor of his joy if examined with an impartial mind, and looked at with an unprejudiced eye.

Sir, when these peans were sung over the death of Abolitionists, and, of course, their right to liberty of speech and the press, at least in fancy's eye, we might have seen them lying in heaps upon heaps, like the enemies of the strong man in days of old. But let me bring back the gentleman's mind from this delightful scene of abolition death, to sober realities and solemn facts. I have now lying before me the names of thousands of living witnesses that slavery has not entirely conquered liberty; that Abolitionists (for so are all these petitioners called) are not all dead. These are my first proofs to show the gentleman his ideas are all fancy. I have also, sir, since the commencement of this debate, received a newspaper, as if sent by Providence to suit the occasion, and by whom I know not. It is the Cincinnati Republican of the 2d instant, which contains an extract from the Louisville Advertiser, a paper printed in Kentucky, in Louisville, our sister city; and though about one hundred and fifty miles below us, is but a few hours distant. That paper is the leading Administration journal, too, as I am informed, in Kentucky. Hear what it says on the death of abolition:

"ABOLITION—CINCINNATI—THE LOUISVILLE ADVERTISER.—We copy the following notice of an article which we lately published, upon the subject of abolition movements in this quarter, from the Louisville Advertiser:

"ABOLITION.—The reader is referred to an interesting article which we have copied from the Cincinnati Republican—a paper which lately supported the principles of Democracy; a paper which has turned, but not quite far enough to act with the Adamases and Slades in Congress, or the Whig-Abolitionists of Ohio. It does not, however, give a correct view of the strength of the Abolitionists in Cincinnati. There they are in the ascendant. They control the city elections, regulate what may be termed the morals of the city, give tone to public opinion, and 'rule the roost' by virtue of their superior piety and intelligence. The Republican tells us that they are not laboring Locofocos—but 'drones' and 'consumers'—the 'rich and well born,' of course; men who have leisure and means, and a disposition to employ the latter, to equalize whites and blacks in the slaveholding States. Even now, the absconding slave is perfectly safe in Cincinnati. We doubt whether an instance can be adduced of the recovery of a runaway in that place in the last four years. When negroes reach 'the Queen city' they are protected by its intelligence, its piety, and its wealth. They receive the aid of the élite of the Buckeyes, and we have a strong fiction in Kentucky struggling zealously to make her one of the dependencies of Cincinnati! Let our mutual sons go on. The day of mutual retribution is at hand—much nearer than is now imagined. The Republican, which still looks with a friendly eye to the slaveholding States, warns us of the danger which exists, although its newborn zeal for Whiggery prompts it to insist, indirectly, on the right of petitioning Congress to abolish slavery. There are about two hundred and fifty abolition societies in Ohio at the present time, and, from the circular issued at headquarters, Cincinnati, it appears that agents are to be sent through every county to distribute books and pamphlets designed to inflame the public mind, and then organize additional societies—or, rather, form new clans, to aid in the war which has been commenced on the slaveholding States."

I do not, sir, underwrite for the truth of this statement as an entire whole; much of it I repel as an unjust charge on my fellow-citizens of Cincinnati; but, as it comes from a slaveholding State—from the State of the Senator who has so eloquently anathematized Abolitionists that it is almost a pity they could not die under such sweet sounds—and as the South Carolina Senator pronounces them dead, I produce this from a slaveholding State for the special benefit and consolation of the two Senators. It comes from a source to which I am sure both gentlemen ought to give credit. But suppose, sir, that Abolitionism is dead: is liberty dead also, and slavery triumphant? Is liberty of speech, of the press, and the right of petition, also dead? True, it has been strangled here; but gentlemen will find themselves in great error if they suppose it also strangled in the country; and the very attempt in legislative bodies to sustain a local and individual interest, to the destruction of our rights, proves that those rights are not dead, but a living principle, which slavery cannot extinguish. And be my lot what it may, I shall, to the utmost of my abilities, under all circumstances and at all times, contend for that freedom which is the common gift of the Creator to all men, and against the power of these two great interests—the slave power of the South and banking power of the North—which are now uniting to rule this country. The cotton bale and the bank note have formed an alliance; the credit system with slave labor. These two congenial spirits have at last met and embraced each other, both looking to the same object—to live upon the unrequited labor of others—and have now erected for themselves a common platform, as was intimated during the last session, on which they can meet, and bid defiance, as they hope, to free principles and free labor.

With these introductory remarks, permit me, sir, to say here, and let no one pretend to misunderstand or misrepresent me, that I charge gentlemen, when they use the word Abolitionists, they mean petitioners here such as I now present—men who love liberty, and are opposed to slavery—that in behalf of these citizens I speak; and, by whatever name they may be called, it is those who are opposed to slavery whose cause I advocate. I make no war upon the rights of others. I do no act but what is moral, constitutional, and legal, against the peculiar institutions of any State; but acting only in defense of my own rights, of my fellow-citizens, and, above all, of my State, I shall not cease while the current of life shall continue to flow.

I shall, Mr. President, in the further consideration of this subject, endeavor to prove, first, the right of the people to petition; second, why slavery is wrong, and why I am opposed to it; third, the power of slavery in this country, and its dangers; next, answer the question, so often asked, what have the free States to do with slavery? Then make some remarks by way of answer to the arguments of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.]

Mr. President, the duty I am requested to perform is one of the highest which a Representative can be called on to discharge. It is to make known to the legislative body the will and the wishes of his constituents and fellow-citizens; and in the present case I feel honored in the confidence reposed in me, and proceed to discharge the duty. The petitioners have not trusted to my fallible judgment alone, but have declared in written documents the most solemn expression of their will. It is true these petitions have not been sent here by the whole people of the United States, but from a portion of them only; yet such is the justice of their claim, and the sure foundation upon which it rests, that no portion of the American people, until a day or two past, have thought it either safe or expedient to present counter petitions; and even now, when counter petitions have been presented, they dare not justify slavery and the selling of men and women in this District, but content themselves with objecting to others enjoying the rights they practice, and praying Congress not to receive or hear petitions from the people of the States—a new device of slave power this, never before thought of or practiced in any country. I would have been gratified if the inventors of this system, which denies to others what they practice themselves, had, in their petition, attempted to justify slavery and the slave trade in the District, if they believe the practice just, that their names might have gone down to posterity. No, sir; very few have the moral courage to record their names to such an avowal; and even some of these petitioners are so squeamish on this subject, as say that they might, from conscientious principles, be prevented from holding slaves.

Not so, sir, with the petitioners which I have the honor to represent; they are anxious that their sentiments and their names should be made matter of record; they have no qualms of conscience on this subject, they have deep convictions and a firm belief that slavery is an existing evil, incompatible with the principles of political liberty, at war with our system of Government, and extending a baleful and blasting influence over our country, withering and blighting its fairest prospects and brightest hopes. Who has said that these petitions are unjust in principle, and on that ground ought not to be granted? Who has said that slavery is not an evil? Who has said it does not tarnish the fair fame of our country? Who has said it does not bring dissipation and feebleness to one race, and poverty and wretchedness to another, in its train? Who has said it is not unjust to the slave and injurious to the happiness and best interests of the master? Who has said it does not break the bonds of human affection, by separating the wife from the husband, and children from their parents? In fine, who has said it is not a blot upon our country's honor, and a deep and foul stain upon her institutions? Few, very few, perhaps none but him who lives upon its labor, regardless of its misery, and even many whose local situations are within its jurisdiction, acknowledge its injustice, and deprecate its continuance; while millions of freemen deplore its existence, and look forward with strong hope to its final termination. SLAVERY! a word like a secret idol, thought too obnoxious or sacred to be pronounced here but by those who worship at its shrine; and should one who is not such a worshiper happen to pronounce the word, the most disastrous consequences are immediately predicted, the Union is to be dissolved, and the South to take care of itself.

Do not suppose, Mr. President, that I feel as if engaged in a forbidden or improvident act. No such thing. I am contending with a local and "peculiar" interest, an interest which has already banded together a force sufficient to seize upon every avenue by which a petition can enter this Chamber, and exclude all without its leave. I am not now contending for the rights of the negro—rights which his Creator gave him, and which his fellow-man has usurped or taken away. No, sir; I am contending for the rights of the white person in the free States, and am endeavoring to prevent them from being trodden down and destroyed by that power which claims the black person as property. I am endeavoring to sound the alarm to my fellow-citizens that this power, tremendous as it is, is endeavoring to unite itself with the moneyed power of the country, in order to extend its dominion and perpetuate its existence. I am endeavoring to drive from the back of the negro slave the politician who has seated himself there to ride into office for the purpose of carrying out the object of this unholy combination. The chains of slavery are sufficiently strong, without being riveted anew by tinkering politicians in the free States. I feel myself compelled into this contest, in defense of the institutions of my own State, the persons and firesides of her citizens, from the insatiable grasp of the slave power, as being used and felt in the free States. To say that I am opposed to slavery in the abstract, are but cold and unmeaning words. If, however, capable of any meaning whatever, they may fairly be construed into a love for its existence; and such I sincerely believe to be the feeling of many in the free States who use the phrase. I, sir, am not only opposed to slavery in the abstract, but also in its whole volume, in its theory as well as practice. This principle is deeply implanted within me; it has "grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength."

In my infant years I learned to hate slavery. Your fathers taught me it was wrong in their Declaration of Independence, the doctrines which they promulgated to the world, and upon the truth of which they staked the issue of the contest that made us a nation. They proclaimed "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." These truths, as solemnly declared by them, I believed then, and believe now. They are self-evident. Who can acknowledge this, and not be opposed to slavery? It is, then, because I love the principles which brought your Government into existence, and which have become the corner-stone of the building supporting you, sir, in that chair, and giving to myself and other Senators seats in this body—it is because I love all this, that I hate slavery. Is it because I contend for the right of petition, and am opposed to slavery, that I have been denounced by many as an Abolitionist? Yes; Virginia newspapers have so denounced me, and called upon the Legislature of my State to dismiss me from public confidence. Who taught me to hate slavery and every other oppression? Jefferson, the great and the good Jefferson! Yes, Virginia Senators, it was your own Jefferson, Virginia's favorite son; a man who did more for the natural liberty of man, and the civil liberty of his country, than any man that ever lived in our country; it was him who taught me to hate slavery; it was in his school I was brought up. That Mr. Jefferson was as much opposed to slavery as any man that ever lived in our country, there can be no doubt; his life and writings abundantly prove the fact. I hold in my hand a copy, as he penned it, of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, a part of which was stricken out, as he says, in compliance with the wishes of South Carolina and Georgia. I will read it. Speaking of the wrongs done us by the British Government, in introducing slaves among us, he says:

"He [the British King] has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred right of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offered him, captivating and carrying them into SLAVERY in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel Powers, is the warfare of the Christian King of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his prerogative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce; and that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms against us, and purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people on whom he also obtruded them, thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

Thus far this great statesman and philanthropist. Had his cotemporaries been ruled by his opinions, the country had now been at rest on this exciting topic. What Abolitionist, sir, has used stronger language against slavery than Mr. Jefferson has done? "Cruel war against human nature," "violating its most sacred rights," "piratical warfare," "opprobrium of infidel Powers," "a market where men should be bought and sold," "execrable commerce," "assemblage of horrors," "crimes committed against the liberty of a people," are the brands which Mr. Jefferson has burned into the forehead of slavery and the slave trade. When have I, or any other person opposed to slavery, spoken in stronger and more opprobrious terms of slavery than this? You have caused the bust of this great man to be placed in the center of your Capitol, in that conspicuous part where every visitor must see it, with its hand resting on the Declaration of Independence, engraved upon marble. Why have you done this? Is it not mockery? Or is it to remind us continually of the wickedness and danger of slavery? I never pass that statue without new and increased veneration for the man it represents, and increased repugnance and sorrow that he did not succeed in driving slavery entirely from the country. If I am an Abolitionist, Jefferson made me so; and I only regret that the disciple should be so far behind the master, both in doctrine and practice.

But, sir, other reasons and other causes have combined to fix and establish my principles in this matter, never, I trust, to be shaken. A free State was the place of my birth; a free Territory the theater of my juvenile actions. Ohio is my country endeared to me by every fond recollection. She gave me political existence, and taught me in her political school; and I should be worse than an unnatural son did I forget or disobey her precepts. In her constitution it is declared "that all men are born equally free and independent," and "that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes." Shall I stand up for slavery in any case, condemned as it is by such high authority as this? No, never! But this is not all. Indiana, our younger western sister, endeared to us by every social and political tie, a State formed in the same country as Ohio, from whose territory slavery was forever excluded by the ordinance of July, 1787—she, too, has declared her abhorrence of slavery in more strong and emphatic terms than we have done. In her constitution, after prohibiting slavery, or involuntary servitude being introduced into the State, she declares, "but as to the holding any part of the human creation in slavery, or involuntary servitude, can originate only in tyranny and usurpation, no alteration of her constitution should ever take place, so as to introduce slavery or involuntary servitude into the State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes whereof the party had been duly convicted." Illinois and Michigan also formed their constitutions on the same principles. After such a cloud of witnesses against slavery and whose testimony is so clear and explicit, as a citizen of Ohio, I should be recreant to every principle of honor and of justice, to be found the apologist or advocate of slavery in any State, or in any country whatever. No, I cannot be so inconsistent as to say I am opposed to slavery in the abstract, in its separation from a human being, and still lend my aid to build it up, and make it perpetual in its operations and effects upon man in this or any other country.

I also, in early life, saw a slave kneel before his master, and hold up his hands with as much apparent submission, humility, and adoration, as a man would have done before his Maker, while his master, with outstretched rod, stood over him. This, I thought, is slavery—one man subjected to the will and power of another, and the laws affording him no protection; and he has to beg pardon of man, because he has offended man, (not the laws,) as if his master were a superior and all powerful being. Yes, this is slavery—boasted American slavery—without which, it is contended even here that the union of these States would be dissolved in a day; yes, even in an hour! Humiliating thought, that we are bound together as States by the chains of slavery! It cannot be; the blood and the tears of slavery form no part of the cement of our Union; and it is hoped that by falling on its hands they may never corrode and eat them asunder. We who are opposed to, and deplore the existence of, slavery in our country, are frequently asked, both in public and private, what have you to do with slavery? It does not exist in your State; it does not disturb you! Ah, sir, would to God it were so—that we had nothing to do with slavery, nothing to fear from its power or action within our own borders, that its name and its miseries were unknown to us. But this is not our lot; we live upon its borders, and in hearing of its cries; yet we are unwilling to acknowledge, that if we enter its territories and violate its laws, that we should be punished at its pleasure. We do not complain of this, though it might well be considered just ground of complaint. It is our firesides, our rights, our privileges, the safety of our friends, as well as the sovereignty and independence of our State, that we are now called upon to protect and defend. The slave interest has at this moment the whole power of the country in its hands. It claims the President as a northern man with southern feelings, thus making the Chief Magistrate the head of an interest, or a party, and not of the country and the people at large. It has the cabinet of the President, three members of which are from slave States, and one who wrote a book in favor of southern slavery, but which fell dead from the press, a book which I have seen, in my own family, thrown musty upon the shelf.

Here, then, is a decided majority in favor of the slave interest. It was five out of nine judges of the Supreme Court; here, also, is a majority from the slave States. It has, with the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the clerks of both Houses, the Army and the Navy; and the bureaus have, I am told, about the same proportion. One would suppose that, with all this power operating in this Government, it would be content to permit—yes, I will use the word permit—it would be content to permit us, who live in the free States, to enjoy our firesides and our homes in quietness; but this is not the case. The slaveholders and slave laws claim that as property which the free States know only as persons; a reasoning property, which, of its own will and mere motion, is frequently found in our States; and upon which thing we sometimes bestow food and raiment if it appear hungry and perishing, believing it to be a human being; this perhaps is owing to our want of vision to discover the process by which a man is converted into a thing. For this act of ours, which is not prohibited by our laws, but prompted by every feeling, Christian and humane, the slaveholding power enters our territory, tramples under foot the sovereignty of our State, violates the sanctity of private residence, seizes our citizens, and, disregarding the authority of our laws, transports them into its own jurisdiction, casts them into prison, confines them in fetters, and loads them with chains, for pretended offenses against their own laws, found by willing grand juries upon the oath (to use the language of the late Governor of Ohio) of a perjured villain. Is this fancy, or is it fact, sober reality, solemn fact? Need I say all this, and much more, is now matter of history in the case of the Rev. John B.

Abolition Petitions—Mr. Morris.

Mahan, of Brown county, Ohio? Yes, it is so; but this is but the beginning—a case of equal outrage has lately occurred, if newspapers are to be relied on, in the seizure of a citizen of Ohio, without even the forms of law, and who was carried into Virginia and shamefully punished by tar and feathers, and other disgraceful means, and rode upon a rail, according to the order of Judge Lynch, and this only because in Ohio he was an Abolitionist. Would I could stop here—but I cannot.

This slave interest or power seizes upon persons of color in our State, carries them into States where men are property, and makes merchandise of them, sometimes under sanction of law, but more properly by its abuse, and sometimes by mere personal force, thus disturbing our quiet and harassing our citizens. A case of this kind has lately occurred, where a colored boy was seduced from Ohio into Indiana, taken from thence into Alabama and sold as a slave; and to the honor of the slave States, and gentlemen who administer the laws there, be it said, that many who have thus been taken and sold by the connivance, if not downright corruption, of citizens in the free States, have been liberated and adjudged free in the States where they have been sold, as was the case of the boy mentioned, who was sold in Alabama. Slave power is seeking to establish itself in every State, in defiance of the constitution and laws of the States within which it is prohibited. In order to secure its power beyond the reach of the States, it claims its parentage from the Constitution of the United States. It demands of us total silence as to its proceedings, denies to our citizens the liberty of speech and the press, and punishes them by mobs and violence for the exercise of these rights. It has sent its agents into free States for the purpose of influencing their Legislatures to pass laws for the security of its power within such State, and for the enacting new offenses and new punishments for their own citizens, so as to give additional security to its interest. It demands to be heard in its own person in the Hall of our Legislature, and mingle in debate there. Sir, in every stage of these oppressions and abuses, permit me to say, in the language of the Declaration of Independence—and no language could be more appropriate—we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms, and our repeated petitions have been answered by repeated injury. A power, whose character is marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to rule over a free people. In our sufferings and our wrongs we have besought our fellow-citizens to aid us in the preservation of our constitutional rights, but, influenced by the love of gain or arbitrary power, they have sometimes disregarded all the sacred rights of man, and answered in violence, burnings, and murder.

After all these transactions, which are now of public notoriety and matter of record, shall we of the free States tauntingly be asked what we have to do with slavery? We should rejoice, indeed, if the evils of slavery were removed far from us; that it could be said with truth that we have nothing to do with slavery. Our citizens have not entered its territories for the purpose of obstructing its laws, nor do we wish to do so, nor would we justify any individual in such an act; yet we have been branded and stigmatized by its friends and advocates, both in the free and slave States, as incendiaries, fanatics, disorganizers, enemies to our country, and as wishing to dissolve the Union. We have borne all this without complaint or resistance, and only ask to be secure in our persons, by our own firesides, and in the free exercise of our thoughts and opinions in speaking, writing, printing, and publishing on the subject of slavery that which appears to us to be just and right; because we all know the power of truth, and that it will ultimately prevail in despite of all opposition. But, in the exercise of all these rights, we acknowledge subjection to the laws of the State in which we are, and our liability for their abuse. We wish peace with all men; and that the most amicable relations and free intercourse may exist between the citizens of our State and our neighboring slaveholding States; we will not enter their States, either in our proper persons, or by commissioners, legislative resolutions, or otherwise, to interfere with their slave policy or slave laws, and we shall expect from them and their citizens a like return, that they do not enter our territories for the purpose of violating our laws in the punishment of our people for the exercise of their undoubted rights—the liberty of speech and of the press on the subject of slavery. We ask that no man shall be seized and transported beyond our State in violation of our own laws, and that we shall not be carried into and imprisoned in another State for acts done in our own. We contend that the slaveholding power is properly chargeable with all the riots and disorders which take place on account of slavery. We can live in peace with all our sister States; if that power will be controlled by law, each can exercise and enjoy the full benefits secured by their own laws; and this is all we ask. If we hold up slavery to the view of an impartial public as it is, and if such view create astonishment and indignation, surely we are not to be charged as libelers. A State institution ought to be considered the pride, not the shame, of the State; and, if we falsify such institutions, the disgrace is ours, not theirs.

If slavery, however, is a blemish, a blot, an eating cancer in the body-politic, it is not our fault if, by holding it up, others should see in the mirror of truth its deformity, and shrink back from the view. We have not, and we intend not, to use any weapons against slavery but the moral power of truth and the force of public opinion. If we enter the slave States, and tamper with the slave contrary to law, punish us—we deserve it; and if the slaveholder is found in a free State, and is guilty of a breach of the law there, he also ought to be punished. These petitioners, as far as I understand them, disclaim all right to enter a slave State for the purpose of intercourse with the slave. It is the master whom they wish to address; and they ask and ought to receive protection from the laws, as they are willing to be judged by the laws. We invite into the arena of public discussion in our State the slaveholder; we are willing to hear his reasons and facts in favor of slavery or against Abolitionists; we do not fear his errors while we are ourselves free to combat them. The angry feelings which in some degree exist between the citizens of the free and slaveholding States on account of slavery are, in many cases, properly chargeable to those who defend and support slavery. Attempts are almost daily making to force the execution of slave laws in the free States; at least, their power and principles; and no term is too reproachful to be applied to those who resist such acts, and contend for the rights secured to every man under their own laws. We are often reminded that we ought to take color as evidence of property in a human being. We do not believe in such evidence, nor do we believe that a man can justly be made property by human laws. We acknowledge, however, that a man, not a thing, may be held to service or labor under the laws of a State, and if he escape into another State, he ought to be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such labor or service may be due; that this delivery ought to be in pursuance of the laws of the State where such person is found, and not by virtue of any act of Congress.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the consideration of the petition presented by the Senator from Kentucky, and to an examination of the views he has presented to the Senate on this highly important subject. Sir, I feel, sensibly feel, my inadequacy in entering into a controversy with that old and veteran Senator; but nothing high or low shall prevent me from an honest discharge of my duty here. If imperfectly done, it may be ascribed to the want of ability, not intention. If the power of my mind, and the strength of my body were equal to the task, I would arouse every man; yes, every woman and child in the country, to the danger which besets them, if such doctrines and views as are presented by the Senator should ever be carried into effect. His denunciations are against Abolitionists; and under that term are classed all those who petition Congress on the subject of slavery. Such I understand to be his argument, and as such I shall treat it. I, in the first place, put in a broad denial to all his general facts, charging this portion of my fellow-citizens with improper motives, or dangerous designs.

That their acts are lawful, he does not pretend to deny. I call for proof to sustain his charges. None such has been offered, and none such exists, or can be found. I repel them as calumnies double distilled in the alembic of slavery. I deny them, also, in the particulars and inferences; and let us see upon what ground they rest, or by what process of reasoning they are sustained.

The very first view of these petitioners against our right of petition, strikes the mind that more is intended than at first meets the eye. Why was the Committee on the District overlooked in this case, and the Senator from Kentucky made the organ of communication? Is it understood that anti-abolitionism is a passport to popular favor, and that the action of this District shall present for that favor to the public a gentleman upon this hobby? Is this petition presented as a subject of fair legislation? Was it solicited by members of Congress, from citizens here, for political effect? Let the country judge. The petitioners state that no persons but themselves are authorized to interfere with slavery in the District; that Congress are their own Legislature; and the question of slavery in the District is only between them and their constituted legislators; and they protest against all interference of others. But, sir, as if ashamed of this open position in favor of slavery, they, in a very coy manner, say that some of them are not slaveholders, and might be forbidden by conscience to hold slaves. There is more dictation, more political heresy, more dangerous doctrine contained in this petition than I have ever before seen couched together in so many words. We! Congress their own legislator in all that concerns this District! Let those who may put on the city livery, and legislate for them and not for his constituents, do so; for myself, I came here with a different view, and for different purposes. I came a free man, to represent the people of Ohio; and I intend to leave this as such representative, without wearing any other livery. Why talk about Executive usurpation and influence over the members of Congress? I have always viewed this District influence as far more dangerous than that of any other power. It has been able to extort, yes, extort from Congress millions to pay District debts, make District improvements, and in support of the civil and criminal jurisprudence of the District.

Pray, sir, what right has Congress to pay the corporate debts of the cities in the District more than the debts of the corporate cities in your State and mine? None, sir. Yet this has been done to a vast amount, and the next step is, that we, who pay all this, shall not be permitted to petition Congress on the subject of their institutions; for, if we can be prevented in one case, we can in all possible cases. Mark, sir, how plain a tale will silence these petitioners. If slavery in the District concerns only the inhabitants and Congress, so does all municipal regulations. Should they extend to granting lottery, gaming-houses, tippling-houses, and other places calculated to promote and encourage vice—should a representative in Congress be instructed by his constituents to use his influence, and vote against such establishments, and the people of the District should instruct him to vote for them, which should he obey? To state the question is to answer it; otherwise the boasted right of instruction by the constituent body is "mere sound," signifying nothing. Sir, the inhabitants of this District are subject to state legislation and State policy; they cannot complain of this, for their condition is voluntary; and as this city is the focus of power, of influence, and considered also as that of fashion, if not folly, and as the streams which flow from here irradiate the whole country, it is right, it is proper, that it should be subject to State policy and State power, and not used as a leaven to ferment and corrupt the whole body-politic.

The honorable Senator has said the petition, though from a city, is the fair expression of the opinion of the District. As such I treated it, am willing to acknowledge the respectability of the petitioners and their rights, and I claim for the people of my own State equal respectability and equal rights that the people of the District are entitled to: any peculiar rights and advantages I cannot admit.

I agree with the Senator that the proceedings on abolition petitions, heretofore, have not been the most wise and prudent course. They ought to have been referred and acted on. Such was my object, a day or two since, when I laid on your table a resolution to refer them to a committee for inquiry. You did not suffer it, sir, to be printed. The country and posterity will judge between the people whom I represent and those who caused to be printed the petition from the city. It cannot be possible that justice can have been done in both cases. The exclusive legislation of Congress over the District is as much the act of the constituent body as the general legislation of Congress over the States; and to the operation of this act have the people within the District submitted themselves. I cannot, however, join the Senator that the majority, in refusing to receive and refer petitions, did not intend to destroy or impair the right in this particular. They certainly have done so.

The Senator admits the Abolitionists are now formidable; that something must be done to produce harmony. Yes, sir, do justice, and harmony will be restored. Act impartially, that justice may be done; hear petitions on both sides, if they are offered, and give righteous judgments, and your people will be satisfied. You cannot compromise them out of their rights, nor lull them to sleep with fallacies in the shape of reports. You cannot conquer them by rebuke, nor deceive them by sophistry. Remember you cannot now turn public opinion, nor can you overthrow it. You must, and you will, abandon the high ground you have taken, and receive petitions. The reason of the case, the argument, and the judgment of the people, are all against you. One in this cause can "chase a thousand," and the voice of justice will be heard whenever you agitate the subject. In Indiana, the right of petition has been most nobly advocated in a protest, by a member, against some puny resolutions of the Legislature of that State to "whitewash slavery." Permit me to read a paragraph, worthy of an American freeman:

"But who would have thought until lately that any would have doubted the right of petition, in a respectful manner, to Congress? Who would have believed that Congress had any authority to refuse to consider the petitions of the people? Such a step would overthrow the Autocrat of Russia, or cast the Grand Seigneur of Constantinople his head. Can it be possible, therefore, that it has been reserved for a republican Government, in a land boasting of its free institutions, to set the first precedent of this kind? Our city councils, our courts of justice, every department of Government, are approached by petition, however unwelcome or absurd, so that its terms are respectful. None go away unread or unheard. The life of every individual is a perfect illustration of the subject of petitioning. Petition is the language of want, of pain, of sorrow, of man in all his sad variety of woes, imploring relief at the hand of some power superior to himself. Petitioning is the foundation of all government, and of all administrations of law. Yet it has been reserved for our Congress, seconded indirectly by the vote of this Legislature, to question this right, hitherto supposed to be so old, so Heaven deeded, so undoubted that our fathers did not think it necessary to place a guarantee of it in the first draft of the Federal Constitution. Yet this sacred right has been at one blow driven, destroyed, and trodden under the feet of slavery. The old bulwarks of our Federal and State constitutions seem utterly to have been forgotten which declares, 'that the freedom of speech and the press shall not be abridged, nor the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for the redress of their grievances.'"

These, sir, are the sentiments which make Abolitionists formidable, and set at naught all your counsels for their overthrow. The honorable Senator not only admits that Abolitionists are formidable, but that they consist of three classes. The friends of humanity and justice, or those actuated by those principles, compose one class. These form a very numerous class; and the acknowledgment of the Senator proves the immutable principles upon which opposition to slavery rests. Men are opposed to it from principles of humanity and justice; men are Abolitionists, he admits, on that account. We thank the Senator for teaching us that word; we intend to improve it. The next class of Abolitionists, the Senator says, are so, apparently, for the purpose of advocating the right of petition. What are we to understand from this? That the right of petition needs advocacy. Who has denied this right, or who has attempted to abridge it? The slaveholding power; that power which avoids open discussion and the free exercise of opinion; it is that power alone which renders the advocacy of the right of petition necessary, having seized upon all the powers of the Government. It is fast uniting together those opposed to its iron rule, no matter to what political party they have heretofore belonged; they are united with the first class, and act from principles of humanity and justice; and if the mists and shades of slavery were not the atmosphere in which gentlemen were enveloped, they would see constant and increasing numbers of our most worthy and intelligent citizens attaching themselves to the two classes mentioned, and rallying under the banners of Abolitionism. They are compelled to go there, if the gentleman will have it so, in order to defend and perpetuate the liberties of the country. The hopes of the oppressed spring up afresh from this discussion of the gentleman.

The third class, the Senator says, are those who, to accomplish their ends, act without regard to consequences. To them, all the rights of property, of the States, of the Union, the Senator says, are nothing. He says they aim at other objects than those they profess—emancipation in the District of Columbia. No, says the Senator, their object is universal emancipation, not only in the District, but in the Territories and in the States. Their object is to set free three millions of negro slaves. Who made the Senator, in his place here, the censor of his fellow-citizens? Who authorized him to charge them with other objects than those they profess? How long is it since the Senator himself, on this floor, denounced slavery as an evil? What other inducements or objects had he then in view? Suppose universal emancipation to be the object of these petitioners: is it not a noble and praiseworthy object; worthy of the Christian, the philanthropist, the statesman, and the citizen? But the Senator says, they (the petitioners) aim to excite one portion of the country against another. I deny, sir, this charge, and call for the proof; it is gratuitous, uncalled for, and unjust towards my fellow-citizens. This is the language of a stricken conscience, seeking for the palliation of its own acts by charging guilt upon others. It is the language of those who, failing in argument, endeavor to cast suspicion upon the character of their opponents, in order to draw public attention from themselves. It is the language of disguise and concealment; and not that of fair and honorable investigation, the object of which is truth. I again put in a broad denial to this charge, that any portion of these petitioners, whom I represent, seek to excite one portion of the country against another; and without proof I cannot admit that the assertion of the honorable Senator establishes the fact. It is but opinion, and naked assertion only.

The Senator complains that the means and views of the Abolitionists are not confined to securing the right of petition only; no, they resort to other means, he affirms—to the ballot-box—and if that fail, says the Senator, their next appeal will be to the bayonet. Sir, no man who is an American in feeling and in heart, but ought to repel this charge instantly, and without any reservation whatever, that if they fail at the ballot-box they will resort to the bayonet. If such a fratricidal course should ever be thought of in our country, it will not be by those who seek redress of wrongs, by exercising the right of petition, but by those only who deny that right to others, and seek to usurp the whole power of the Government. If the ballot-box fail them, the bayonet may be their resort, as mobs and violence now are. Does the Senator believe that any portion of the honest yeomanry of the country entertain such thoughts? I hope he does not. If thoughts of this kind exist, they are to be found in the hearts of aspirants to office, and their adherents, and none others. Who, sir, is making this question a political affair? Not the petitioners. It was the slaveholding power which first made this move. I have noticed for some time past that many of the public prints in this city, as well as elsewhere, have been filled with essays against Abolitionists for exercising the rights of freemen.

Both political parties, however, have courted them in private and denounced them in public, and both have equally deceived them. And who shall dare say that an Abolitionist has no right to carry his principles to the ballot-box? Who fears the ballot-box? The honest in heart, the lover of our country and its institutions? No, sir! It is feared by the tyrant; he who usurps power, and seizes upon the liberty of others; he, for one, fears the ballot-box. Where is the slave to party in this country who is so lost to his own dignity, or so corrupted by interest or power, that he does not, or will not, carry his principles and his judgment into the ballot-box? Such a one ought to have the mark of Cain in his forehead, and sent to labor among the negro slaves of the South. The honorable Senator seems anxious to take under his care the ballot-box, as he has the slave system of the country, and direct who shall or who shall not use it for the redress of what they deem a political grievance. Suppose the power of the Executive chair should take under its care the right of voting, and should proscribe any portion of our citizens who should carry with them to the polls of election their own opinions, creeds, and doctrines. This would at once be a deathblow to our liberties, and the remedy could only be found in revolution. There can be no excuse or pretext for revolution while the ballot-box is free. Our Government is not one of force, but of principle; its foundation rests upon public opinion, and its hope is in the morality of the nation. The moral power of that of the ballot-box is sufficient to correct all abuses. Let me, then, proclaim here, from this high arena, to the citizens not only of my own State, but to the country, to all sects and parties who are entitled to the right of suffrage, to the ballot-box! carry with you honestly your own sentiments respecting the welfare of your country, and make them operate as effectually as you can, through that medium, upon its policy and for its prosperity. Fear not the frowns of power. It trembles while it denounces you.

The Senator complains that the Abolitionists have associated with the politics of the country. So far as I am capable of judging, this charge is not well founded; many politicians of the country have used Abolitionists as stepping-stones to mount into power; and, when there, have turned about and traduced them. He admits that political parties are willing to unite with them any class of men, in order to carry their purposes. Are Abolitionists, then, to blame if they pursue the same course? It seems the Senator is willing that his party should make use of even Abolitionists; but he is not willing that Abolitionists should use the same party for their purpose. This seems not to be in accordance with that equality of rights about which we heard so much at the last session. Abolitionists have nothing to fear. If public opinion should be for them, politicians will be around and amongst them as thick and as noisy as the locusts of Egypt. The Senator seems to admit that, if the Abolitionists are joined to either political party, there is danger—danger of what? That humanity and justice will prevail? that the right of petition will be secured to ALL, EQUALLY? and that the long-lost and trodden African race will be restored to their natural rights? Would the Senator regret to see this accomplished by argument, persuasion, and the force of an enlightened public opinion? I hope not; and these petitioners ask the use of no other weapons in this warfare.

These ultra-Abolitionists, says the Senator, invoke the power of this Government to their aid. And pray, sir, what power should they invoke? Have they not the same right to approach this Government as other men? Is the Senator or this body authorized to deny them any privileges secured to other citizens? If so, let him show me the charter of his power, and I will be silent. Until he can do this, I shall uphold, justify, and sustain them, as I do other citizens. The exercise of power by Congress in behalf of the slaves within this District, the Senator seems to think no one without the District has the least claim to ask for. It is because I reside without the District, and am called within it by the Constitution, that I object to the existence of slavery here. I deny the gentleman's position, then, on this point. On this, then, we are equal. The Senator, however, is at war with himself. He contends the object of the cession by the States of Virginia and Maryland was to establish a seat of Government only, and to give to Congress whatever power was necessary to render the District a valuable and comfortable situation for that purpose, and that Congress have full power to do whatever is necessary for this District; and if to abolish slavery be necessary to attain the object, Congress have power to abolish slavery in the District. I am sure I quote the gentleman substantially; and I thank him for this precious confession in his argument; it is what I believe, and I know it is all I feel disposed to ask. If we can, then, prove that this District is not as comfortable and convenient a place for the deliberations of Congress, and the comfort of our citizens who may visit it, while slavery exists here, as it would be without slavery, then slavery ought to be abolished; and I trust we shall have the distinguished Senator from Kentucky to aid us in this great national reformation. I take the Senator at his word. I agree with him that this ought to be such a place as he has described; but I deny that it is so. And upon what facts do I rest my denial? We are a Christian nation, a moral and religious people. I speak for the free States, at least for my own State; and what a contrast does the very streets of your capital daily present to the Christianity and morality of the nation? A race of slaves, or at least colored persons, of every hue, from the jet black African, in regular gradation, up to the almost pure Anglo-Saxon color. During the short time official duty has called me here, I have seen the really red haired, the freckled, and the almost white negro; and I have been astonished at the numbers of the mixed race when compared with those of full color, and I have deeply deplored this stain upon our national morals; and the words of Doctor Channing have, thousands of times, been impressed on my mind, that "a slave country reeks with licentiousness."

How comes this amalgamation of the races? It comes from slavery. It is a disagreeable annoyance to persons who come from the free States, especially to their Christian and moral feelings. It is a great hindrance to a proper discharge of their duties while here. Remove slavery from this District, and this evil will disappear. We argue this circumstance alone as a sufficient cause to produce that effect. But slavery presents within the District other and still more appalling scenes—scenes well calculated to awaken the deepest emotions of the human heart. The slave trade exists here in all its horrors, and unwhipped of all its crimes. In view of the very chair you now occupy, Mr. President, if the massy walls of this building did not prevent it, you could see the prison, the pen, the hell, where human beings, when purchased for sale, are kept, until a cargo can be procured for transportation to a southern or foreign market, for I have little doubt that slaves are carried to Texas for sale, although I do not know the fact.

Sir, since Congress have been in session, a mournful group of these unhappy beings, some thirty or forty, were marched, as if in derision of your members of Congress, in view of your Capitol, chained and manacled together, in open daylight, yes, in the very face of heaven itself, to be shipped at Baltimore for a foreign market. I did not witness this cruel transaction, but speak from what I have heard and believe. Is this District, then, a fit place for our deliberations, whose feelings are outraged with impunity with transactions like this? Suppose, sir, that mournful and degrading spectacle was at this moment exhibited under the windows of our Chamber: do you think the Senate could deliberate, could continue with that composure and attention which I see around me? No, sir; all your powers could not preserve order for a moment. The feelings of humanity would overcome those of regard for the peculiar institutions of the States; and though we would be politically and legally bound not to interfere, we are not morally bound to withhold our sympathy and our execration in witnessing such inhuman traffic. This traffic alone, in this District, renders it an uncomfortable and unfit place for your seat of Government.

Sir, it is but one or two years since I saw standing at the railroad depot, as I passed from my boarding-house to this Chamber, some large wagons and teams, as if waiting for freight; the cars had not then arrived. I was inquired of, when I returned to my lodgings, by my landlady, if I knew the object of those wagons which I saw in the morning. I replied I did not; I suppose they came and were waiting for loading. "Yes, for slaves," said she; "and one of those wagons was filled with little boys and little girls, who had been bought up through the country, and were to be taken to a southern market. Ah, sir," continued she, "it made my very heart ache to see them." The very recital unnerved and unfitted me for thought or reflection on any other subject for some time. It is scenes like this, of which ladies of my country and my State complained in their petitions, some time since, as rendering this District unpleasant, should they wish to visit the capital of the nation as wives, sisters, daughters, or friends of members of Congress. Yet, sir, these respectable females were treated here with contemptuous sneers; they were compared on this floor to the fishwomen of Paris who dipped their fingers in the blood of revolutionary France. Sir, if the transaction in slaves here which I have mentioned could have made such an impression upon the heart of a lady, a resident of the District, one who had been used to slaves, and was probably an owner, what would be the feelings of ladies from the free States on beholding a like transaction? I will leave every gentleman and every lady to answer for themselves. I am unable to describe it. Shall the capital of your country longer exhibit scenes so revolting to humanity that the ladies of your country cannot visit it without disgust? No; wipe off the foul stain, and let it become a suitable and comfortable place for the seat of Government. The Senator, as if conscious that his argument on this point had proved too much, and of course had proven the converse of what he wished to establish, concluded this part by saying that, if slavery is abolished, the act ought to be confined to the city alone. We thank him for this small sprinkling of correct opinion upon this arid waste of public feeling. Liberty may yet vegetate and grow even here.

The Senator insists that the States of Virginia and Maryland would never have ceded this District if they had thought slavery would ever have been abolished in it. This is an old story twice told. It was never, however, thought of until the slave power imagined it, for its own security. Let the States ask a retrocession of the District, and I am sure the free States will rejoice to make the grant.

The Senator condemns the Abolitionists for desiring that slavery should not exist in the Territories, even in Florida. He insists that, by the treaty, the inhabitants of that country have the right to remove their effects when they please; and that, by this condition, they have the right to retain their slaves as effects, independently of the power of Congress. I am no diplomatist, sir, but I venture to deny the conclusion of the Senator's argument. In all our intercourse with foreign nations, in all our treaties in which the words "goods, effects," &c., are used, slaves have never been considered as included. In all cases in which slaves are the subject-matter of controversy, they are specially named by the word "slaves;" and, if I remember rightly, it has been decided in Congress that slaves are not property for which a compensation shall be made when taken for public use, (or rather slaves cannot be considered as taken for public use,) or as property by the enemy, when they are in the service of the United States. If I am correct, as I believe I am, in the positions I have assumed, the gentleman can say nothing, by this part of his argument, against Abolitionists for asking that slavery shall not exist in Florida.

The gentleman contends that the power to remove slaves from one State to another, for sale, is found in that part of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce within the States, &c. This argument is non sequitur, unless the honorable Senator can first prove that slaves are proper articles for commerce. We say that Congress have power over slaves only as persons. The United States can protect persons, but cannot make them property; and they have full power in regulating commerce, and can, in such regulations, prohibit from its operations everything but property; property made so by the laws of nature, and not by any municipal regulations. The dominion of man over things, as property, was settled by his Creator when man was first placed upon the earth. He was to subdue the earth, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth; every herb bearing seed, and the fruit of a tree yielding seed, was given for his use. This is the foundation of all right in property of every description. It is for the use of man the grant is made, and of course man cannot be included in the grant. Every municipal regulation, then, of any State, or any of its peculiar institutions which makes man property, is a violation of this great law of nature, and is founded in usurpation and tyranny, and is accomplished by force, fraud, or an abuse of power. It is a violation of the principles of truth and justice, in subjecting the weaker to the stronger man. In a Christian nation such property can form no just ground for commercial regulations, but ought to be strictly prohibited. I therefore believe it is the duty of Congress, by virtue of this power to regulate commerce, to prohibit, at once, slaves being used as articles of trade.

The gentleman says the Constitution left the subject of slavery entirely to the States. To this position I assent; and, as the States cannot regulate their own commerce, but the same being the right of Congress, that body cannot make slaves an article of commerce, because slavery is left entirely to the States in which it exists, and slaves within those States, according to the gentleman, are excluded from the power of Congress. Can Congress, in regulating commerce among the several States, authorize the transportation of articles from one State and their sale in another, which they have not power so to authorize in any State? I cannot believe in such doctrine; and I now solemnly protest against the power of Congress to authorize the transportation to, and the sale in, Ohio, of any negro slave whatever, or for any possible purpose under the sun. Who is there in Ohio, or elsewhere, that will dare deny this position? If Ohio contains such a recreant to her constitution and policy, I hope he may have the boldness to stand forth and avow it. If the States in which slavery exists love it as a household god, let them keep it there, and not call upon us in the free States to offer incense to their idol. We do not seek to touch it with unhallowed hands, but with pure hands, upraised in the cause of truth and suffering humanity.

The gentleman admits that, at the formation of our Government, it was feared that slavery might eventually divide or distract our country; and, as the BALLOT-BOX seems continually to haunt his imagination, he says there is real danger of dissolution of the Union, if Abolitionists, as is evident they do, will carry their principles into the BALLOT-BOX. If not disunion in fact, at least in feeling, in the country, which is always the precursor to the clash of arms. And the gentleman further says we are taught by holy writ, "that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." The moral of the gentleman's argument is, that truth and righteousness will prevail, though opposed by power and influence; that Abolitionists, though few in number, are greatly to be feared; one, as I have said, may chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight; and, as their weapons of warfare are not "carnal, but mighty to the pulling down of strongholds," even slavery itself; and as the ballot-box is the great moral lever in political action, the gentleman would exclude Abolitionists entirely from its use, and, for opinion's sake, deny them this high privilege of every American citizen. Permit me, sir, to remind the gentleman of another text of Holy Writ: "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion." The Senator says that those who have slaves are sometimes supposed to be under too much alarm. Does this prove the application of the text I have just quoted? "Conscience sometimes makes cowards of us all." The Senator appeals to Abolitionists, and beseeches them to cease their efforts on the subject of slavery, if they wish, says he, "to exercise their benevolence." What! Abolitionists benevolent! He hopes they will select some object not so terrible. Oh, sir, he is willing they should pay tithes of "mint and rue," but Abolition Petitions—Mr. Morris.

SENATE.

the weightier matters of the law, judgment and mercy he would have them entirely overlook. I ought to thank the Senator for introducing Holy Writ into this debate, and inform him his arguments are not the sentiments of Him, who, when on earth, went about doing good.

The Senator further entreats the clergy to desist from their efforts in behalf of abolitionism. Who authorized the Senator, as a politician, to use his influence to point out to the clergy upon what they should preach, or for what they should pray? Would the Senator dare exert his power here to bind the consciences of men? I think not. By what rule of ethics, then, does he undertake to use his influence, from this high place of power, in order to gain the same object, I am at a loss to determine? Sir, this movement of the Senator is far more censurable and dangerous, as an attempt to unite Church and State, than were the petitions against Sunday mails, the report in opposition to which gained for you, Mr. President, so much applause in the country. I, sir, also appeal to the clergy to maintain their rights of conscience; and if they believe slavery to be a sin, we ought to honor and respect them for their open denunciation of it, rather than call on them to desist; for between their conscience and their God we have no power to interfere; we do not wish to make them political agents for any purpose.

But the Senator is not content to entreat the clergy alone to desist; he calls on his countrywomen to warn them, also, to cease their efforts, and reminds them that the ink shed from the pen held in their fair fingers when writing their names to abolition petitions, may be the cause of shedding much human blood! Sir, the language towards this class of petitioners is very much changed of late; they formerly were pronounced idlers, fanatics, old women, and school misses, unworthy of respect from intelligent and respectable men. I warned gentlemen then that they would change their language; the blows they aimed fell harmless at the feet of those against whom they were intended to injure. In this movement of my countrywomen I thought was plainly to be discovered the operations of Providence, and a sure sign of the final triumph of universal emancipation! All history, both sacred and profane, both ancient and modern, bears testimony to the efficacy of female influence and power in the cause of human liberty. From the time of the preservation, by the hands of woman, of the great Jewish lawgiver, in his infantile hours, and who was preserved for the purpose of freeing his countrymen from Egyptian bondage, has woman been made a powerful agent in breaking to pieces the rod of the oppressor. With a pure and uncontaminated mind, her actions spring from the deepest recesses of the human heart. Denounce her as you will, you cannot deter her from duty. Pain, sickness, want, poverty, and even death itself form no obstacles in her onward march. Even the tender virgin would dress, as a martyr for the stake, as for the bridal hour, rather than make sacrifice of her purity and duty. The eloquence of the Senate, and clash of arms, are alike powerless when brought in opposition to the influence of pure and virtuous woman. The liberty of the slave seems now to be committed to her charge, and who can doubt her final triumph? I do not. You cannot fight against her and hope for success; and well does the Senator know this; hence this appeal to her feelings to terrify her from that which she believes to be her duty. It is a vain attempt.

The Senator says that it was the principles of the Constitution which carried us through the Revolution. Surely it was; and to use the language of another Senator from a slave State, on a former occasion, these are the very principles on which the Abolitionists plant themselves. It was the principle that all men are born free and equal, that nerved the arm of our fathers in their contest for independence. It was for the natural and inherent rights of man they contended. It is a libel upon the Constitution to say that its object was not liberty, but slavery for millions of the human race.

The Senator, well fearing that all his eloquence and his arguments thus far are but as chaff when weighed in the balance against truth and justice, seems to find consolation in the idea, and says, that which opposes the ulterior object of Abolitionists is that the General Government has no power to act on the subject of slavery, and that the Constitution or Union would not last an hour if the power claimed was exercised by Congress. It is slavery then, not liberty, that makes us one people. To dissolve slavery, is to dissolve the Union. Why require of us to support the Constitution by oath, if the Constitution itself is subject to the power of slavery, and not the moral power of the country? Change the form of the oath which you administer to Senators on taking seats here; swear them to support slavery, and, according to the logic of the gentleman, the Constitution and the Union will both be safe. We hear almost daily threats of dissolving the Union, and from whence do they come? From citizens of the free States? No! From the slave States only. Why wish to dissolve it? The reason is plain—that a new Government may be formed, by which we, as a nation, may be made a slaveholding people. No impartial observer of passing events can, in my humble judgment, doubt the truth of this.

The Senator thinks the Abolitionists in error, if they wish the slaveholder to free his slave. He asks, why denounce him? I cannot admit the truth of the question; but I might well ask the gentleman, and the slaveholders generally, "why are you angry at me because I tell you the truth?" It is the light of truth which the slaveholder cannot endure; a plain, unvarnished tale of what slavery is, he considers a libel upon himself. The fact is, the slaveholder feels the leprosy of slavery upon him. He is anxious to hide the odious disease from the public eye; and the ballot-box and the right of petition, when used against him, he feels as sharp reproof; and, being unwilling to renounce his errors, he tries to escape from their consequences, by making the world believe that he is the persecuted, and not the persecutor. Slaveholders have said here, during this very session, "the fact is, slavery will not bear examination." It is the Senator who denounces Abolitionists for the exercise of their most unquestionable rights, while Abolitionists condemn that only which the Senator himself will acknowledge to be wrong, at all times and under all circumstances; because he admits that, if it was an original question whether slaves should be introduced among us, but few citizens would be found to agree to it, and none more opposed to it than himself. The argument is, that the evil of slavery is incurable; that the attempt to eradicate it would commence a struggle which would exterminate one race or the other. What a lamentable picture of our Government, so often pronounced the best upon earth! The seeds of disease, which were interwoven into its first existence, have now become so incorporated into its frame that they cannot be extracted without dissolving the whole fabric; that we must endure the evil without hope and without complaint. Our very natures must be changed before we can be brought tamely to submit to this doctrine. The evil will be remedied; and, to use the language of Jefferson again, "this people will yet be free." The Senator finds consolation, however, in the midst of this existing evil, in color and caste. The black race (says he) is the strong ground of slavery in our country. Yes, it is color, not right and justice, that is to continue forever slavery in our country. It is prejudice against color which is the strong ground of the slaveholder's hope. Is that prejudice founded in nature, or is it the effect of base and sordid interest? Let the mixed race which we see here, from black to almost perfect white, springing from white fathers, answer this question. Slavery has no just foundation in color; it rests exclusively upon usurpation, tyranny, oppressive fraud, and force. These were its parents in every age and country of the world.

The Senator says, the next or greatest difficulty to emancipation, is the amount of property it would take from the owners. All ideas of right and wrong are confounded in these words: emancipate property, emancipate a horse, or an ox, would not only be an unmeaning, but a ludicrous expression. To emancipate, is to set free from slavery. To emancipate, is to set free a man, not property. The Senator estimates the number of slaves—men now held in bondage—at three millions in the United States. Is this statement made here by the same voice which was heard in this Capitol in favor of the liberties of Greece, and for the emancipation of our South American brethren from political thralldom? It is; and has all its fervor in favor of liberty been exhausted upon foreign countries, so as not to leave a single whisper in favor of three millions of men in our own country, now groaning under the most galling oppression the world ever saw? No, sir. Sordid interest rules the hour. Men are made property, and paper is made money, and the Senator, no doubt, sees in these two peculiar institutions a power which, if united, will be able to accomplish all his wishes. He informs us that some have computed the slaves to be worth the average amount of $500 each. He will estimate within bounds at $400 each. Making the amount twelve hundred million dollars' worth of slave property. I heard this statement, Mr. President, with emotions of the deepest feeling. By what rule of political or commercial arithmetic does the Senator calculate the amount of property in human beings? Can it be fancy or fact, that I hear such calculation, that the people of the United States own twelve hundred millions' (double the amount of all the specie in the world) worth of property in human flesh! And this property is owned, the gentleman informs us, by all classes of society, forming part of all our contracts within our own country and in Europe. I should have been glad, sir, to have been spared the hearing of a declaration of this kind, especially from the high source and the place from which it has emanated.

But the assertion has gone forth that we have twelve hundred millions of slave property at the South; and can any man so close his understanding here as not plainly to perceive that the power of this vast amount of property at the South is now uniting itself to the banking power of the North, in order to govern the destinies of this country? Six hundred millions of banking capital is to be brought into this coalition, and the slave power and the bank power are thus to unite in order to break down the present Administration. There can be no mistake, as I believe, in this matter. The aristocracy of the North, who, by the power of a corrupt banking system, and the aristocracy of the South, by the power of the slave system, both fattening upon the labor of others, are now about to unite in order to make the reign of each perpetual. Is there an independent American to be found who will become the recreant slave to such an unholy combination? Is this another compromise to barter the liberties of the country for personal aggrandizement? "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

The Senator further insists, "that what the law makes property is property." This is the predicate of the gentleman; he has neither facts nor reason to prove it; yet upon this alone does he rest the whole case that negroes are property. I deny both the predicate and the argument. Suppose the Legislature of the Senator's own State should pass a law declaring his wife, his children, his friends, indeed, any white citizen of Kentucky, property, and should they be sold and transferred as such, would the gentleman fold his arms and say, "Yes, they are property, for the law has made them such?" No, sir; he would denounce such law with more vehemence than he now denounces Abolitionists, and would deny the authority of human legislation to accomplish an object so clearly beyond its power.

Human laws, I contend, cannot make human beings property, if human force can do it. If it is competent for our Legislatures to make a black man property, it is competent for them to make a white man the same; and the same objection exists to the power of the people in an organic law for their own government; they cannot make property of each other, and, in the language of the constitution of Indiana, such an act "can only originate in usurpation and tyranny." Dreadful indeed would be the condition of this country if these principles should not only be carried into the ballot-box, but into the presidential chair. The idea that Abolitionists ought to pay for the slaves if they are set free, and that they ought to think of this, is addressed to their fears and not to their judgment. There is no principle of morality or justice that should require them or our citizens generally to do so. To free a slave is to take from usurpation that which it has made property and given to another, and bestow it upon the rightful owner. It is not taking property from its true owner for public use. Men can do with their own as they please, to vary their peace if they wish, but cannot be compelled to do so.

The gentleman repeats the assertion that has been repeated a thousand and one times—that Abolitionists are retarding the emancipation of the slave, and have thrown it back fifty or a hundred years; that they have increased the rigors of slavery, and caused the master to treat his slave with more severity. Slavery, then, is to cease at some period; and because the Abolitionists have said to the slaveholder, "Now is the accepted time," and because he thinks this an improper interference, and not having the Abolitionist in his power, he inflicts his vengeance on his unoffending slave. The moral of this story is, the slaveholder will exercise more cruelty because he is desired to show mercy. I do not envy the Senator the full benefit of his argument. It is no doubt a true picture of the feelings and principles which slavery engenders in the breast of the master. It is in perfect keeping with the threat we almost daily hear, that if petitioners do not cease their efforts in the exercise of their constitutional rights, others will dissolve the Union. These, however, ought all to be esteemed idle assertions and idle threats.

The Senator tells us that the consequences arising from the freedom of slaves would be to reduce the wages of the white laborer. He has furnished us with neither data nor fact upon which this opinion can rest. He, however, would draw a line, on one side of which he would place the slave labor, and on the other free white labor; and looking over the whole, as a general system, both would appear on a perfect equality. I have observed, for some years past, that the southern slaveholder has insisted that his laborers are, in point of integrity, morality, usefulness, and comfort, equal to the laboring population of the North—thus endeavoring to raise the slave, in public estimation, to an equality with the free white laborer of the North; while, on the other hand, the northern aristocrat has, in the same manner, viz: by comparison, endeavored to reduce his laborers to the moral and political condition of the slaves of the South. It is for the free white American citizens to determine whether they will permit such degrading comparisons longer to exist. Already has this spirit broken forth in denunciation of the right of UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE. Will free white laboring citizens take warning before it is too late?

The last, the great, the crying sin of Abolitionists, in the eyes of the Senator, is that they are opposed to colonization, and in favor of amalgamation. It is not necessary to enter now into any of the benefits and advantages of colonization; the Senator has pronounced it the noblest scheme ever devised by man; he says it is powerful but harmless. I have no knowledge of any resulting benefits from the scheme to either race. I have not a doubt as to the real object intended by its founders, it did not arise from principles of humanity and benevolence towards the colored race, but a desire to remove the free of that race beyond the United States, in order to perpetuate and make slavery more secure. The Senator further makes the broad charge, that Abolitionists wish to enforce the unnatural system of amalgamation. We deny the fact, and call on the Senator for proof. The citizens of the free States, the petitioners against slavery, the Abolitionists of the free States in favor of amalgamation! No, sir! If you want evidence of the fact, and reasoning in support of amalgamation, you must look into the slave States; it is there it spreads and flourishes from slave mothers, and presents all possible colors and complexions, from the jet black African to the scarcely-to-be-distinguished white person. Does any one need proof of this fact? Let him take but a few turns through the streets of your capital, and observe those whom he shall meet, and he will be perfectly satisfied. Amalgamation indeed! The charge is made with a very bad grace on the present occasion. No, sir, it is not the negro woman, it is the slave and the contaminating influence of slavery that is the mother of amalgamation. Does the gentleman want facts on this subject? Let him look to the colored race in the free States; it is a rare occurrence there. A colony of blacks, some three or four hundred, were settled, some fifteen or twenty years since, in the county of Brown, a few miles distant from my former residence in Ohio, and I was told by a person living near them, a country merchant with whom they dealt, when conversing with him on this very subject, that he knew of but one instance of a mulatto child being born amongst them for the last fifteen years; and I venture the assertion, had the same colony been settled in a slave State, the cases of a like kind would have been far more numerous. I repeat again, in the words of Dr. Channing, it is a slave country that reeks with licentiousness of this kind, and for proof I refer to the opinions of Judge Harper, of North Carolina, in his defense of southern slavery.

The Senator, as if fearing that he had made his charge too broad, and might fail in proof to sustain it, seems to stop short, and make the inquiry, where is the process of amalgamation to begin; he had heard of no instance of the kind against Abolitionists; they (the Abolitionists) would begin it with the laboring class; and if I understand the Senator correctly, that abolitionism, by throwing together the white and the black laborers, would naturally produce this result. Sir, I regret, I deplore, that such a charge should be made against the laboring class—that class which tills the ground, and, in obedience to the decree of their Maker, eat their bread in the sweat of their face—that class, as Mr. Jefferson says, if God has a chosen people on earth, they are those who thus labor. This charge is calculated for effect, to induce the laboring class to believe that if emancipation takes place, they will be, in the free States, reduced to the same condition as the colored laborer. The reverse of that is the truth of the case. It is the slaveholder now, he who looks upon labor as only fit for a servile race, it is him and his kindred spirits who live upon the labor of others, endeavoring to reduce the white laborer to the condition of the slave. They do not yet claim him as property, but they would exclude him from all participation in the public affairs of the country. It is further said that if the negroes were free, the black would rival the white laborer in the free States. I cannot believe it, while so many facts exist to prove the contrary. Negroes, like the white race, but with stronger feelings, are attached to the place of their birth, and the home of their youth; and the climate of the South is congenial to their natures, more than that of the North. If emancipation should take place at the South, and the negro be freed, from the fear of being made merchandise, they would remove from the free States of the North and West, immediately return to that country, because it is the home of their friends and fathers. Already in Ohio, as far as my knowledge extends, has free white labor (emigrants) from foreign countries, engrossed almost entirely all situations in which male or female labor is found. But, sir, this plea of necessity and convenience is the plea of tyrants. Has not the free black person the same right to the use of his hands as the white person; the same right to contract and labor for what price he pleases? Would the gentleman extend the power of the Government to the regulation of the productive industry of the country? This was his former theory, but put down effectually by the public voice. Taking advantage of the prejudice against labor, the attempt is now being made to begin this same system, by first operating on the poor black laborer. For shame! let us cease from attempts of this kind.

The Senator informs us that the question was asked fifty years ago that is now asked, can the negro be continued forever in bondage. Yes; and it will continue to be asked, in still louder and louder tones. But, says the Senator, we are yet a prosperous and happy nation. Pray, sir, in what part of your country do you find this prosperity and happiness? In the slave States? No, no! There all is weakness, gloom, and despair, while in the free States all is light, business, and activity. What has created the astonishing difference between the gentleman's State and mine; between Kentucky and Ohio? Slavery, the withering curse of slavery, is upon Kentucky, while Ohio is free. Kentucky, the garden of the West, almost the land of promise, possessing all the natural advantages, and more than is possessed by Ohio, is vastly behind in population and wealth. Sir, I can see from the windows of my upper chamber, in the city of Cincinnati, lands in Kentucky which, I am told, can be purchased from ten to fifty dollars per acre, while lands of the same quality, under the same improvements, and the same distance from me in Ohio, would probably sell from one to five hundred dollars per acre. I was told by a friend, a few days before I left home, who had formerly resided in the county of Bourbon, Kentucky—a most excellent county of lands, adjoining, I believe, the county in which the Senator resides—that the white population of that county was more than four hundred less than it was five years since. Will the Senator contend, after a knowledge of these facts, that slavery in this country has been the cause of our prosperity and happiness? No, he cannot. It is because slavery has been excluded and driven from a large proportion of our country that we are a prosperous and happy people.

But its late attempts to force its influence and power into the free States, and deprive our citizens of their unquestionable rights, has been the moving cause of all the riots, burnings, and murders that have taken place on account of Abolitionism; and it has, in some degree, even in the free States, caused mourning, lamentation, and woe. Remove slavery, and the country, the whole country, will recover its natural vigor, and our peace and future prosperity will be placed on a more extensive, safe, and sure foundation. It is a waste of time to answer the allegations that the emancipation of the negro race would induce them to make war on the white race. Every fact in the history of emancipation proves the reverse; and he that will not believe those facts, has darkened his own understanding, that the light of reason can make no impression; he appeals to interest, not to truth, for information on this subject. We do not fear his errors while we are left free to combat them. The Senator implores us to cease all commotion on this subject. Are we to surrender all our rights and privileges, all the official stations of the country, into the hands of the slaveholding power, without a single struggle? Are we to cease all exertions for our own safety, and submit in quiet to the rule of this power? Is the calm of despotism to reign over this land, and the voice of freemen to be no more heard? This sacrifice is required of us in order to sustain slavery. Freemen, will you make it? Will you shut your ears and your sympathies, and withhold from the poor, famished slave a morsel of bread? Can you thus act and expect the blessings of Heaven upon your country? I beseech you to consider for yourselves.

Mr. President, I have been compelled to enter into this discussion from the course pursued by the Senate on the resolution I submitted a few days since. The cry of Abolitionist has been raised against me. If those resolutions are abolitionism, then am I an Abolitionist from the soles of my feet to the crown of my head. If to maintain the rights of the States, the security of the citizen from violence and outrage, if to preserve the supremacy of the laws, if insisting on the right of petition as a medium through which every person subject to the laws has an undoubted right to approach the constitutional authorities of the country, be the doctrines of Abolitionists, they find a response in every beating pulse in my veins. Neither power, nor favor, nor want, nor misery, shall deter me from its support while the vital current continues to flow.

Condemned at home for my opposition to slavery, alone and single handed here, well may I feel tremor and emotion in bearding this lion of slavery in his very den and upon his own ground. I should shrink, sir, at once from this fearful and unequal contest, was I not thoroughly convinced that I am sustained by the power of truth and the best interests of the country.

I listened to the Senator from Kentucky with undivided attention. I was disappointed, sadly disappointed. I had heard of the Senator's tact in making compromises and agreements on this floor; and though opposed in principle to all such proceedings, yet I hoped to hear something upon which we could hang a hope that peace would be restored to the borders of our own States, and all future aggressions upon our citizens from the slave States be prevented. Now, sir, he offers us nothing but unconditional submission or political death; and not political alone, but absolute death. We have counted the cost in this matter, and are determined to live and die free. Let the slaveholder hug his system to his bosom in his own State; we will not go there to disturb him; but, sir, within our own borders we claim to enjoy the same privileges. Even, sir, here, in this District, this ten miles square of common property and common right, the slave power has the assurance to come into this very Hall, and request that we—yes, Mr. President, that my constituents—be denied the right of petition on the subject of slavery in this District. This most extraordinary petition against the right of others to petition on the same subject of theirs, is graciously received and ordered to be printed; psalms sung to it by the slave power; while the petitions I offer, from as honorable, free, high-minded, and patriotic American citizens as any in this District, are spit upon, and turned out of doors as an unclean thing. Genius of liberty! how long will you sleep under this iron power of oppression? Not content with ruling over their own slaves, they claim the power to instruct Congress on the question of receiving petitions; and yet we are tauntingly and sneeringly told that we have nothing to do with the existence of slavery in the country—a suggestion as absurd as it is ridiculous. We are called upon to make laws in favor of slavery in the District, but it is denied that we can make laws against it; and at last the right of petition on the subject, by the people of the free States, is complained of as an improper interference.

I leave it to the Senator to reconcile all these difficulties, absurdities, claims and requests of the people of this District, to the country at large; and I venture the opinion that he will find as much difficulty in producing the belief that he is correct now, that he has found in obtaining the same belief that he was before correct in his views and political course on the subject of banks, internal improvements, protective tariffs, &c., and the regulation, by acts of Congress, of the productive industry of the country, together with all the compromises and coalitions he has entered into for the attainment of those objects. I rejoice, however, that the Senator has made the display he has on this occasion. It is a powerful shake to awaken the sleeping energies of liberty, and his voice, like a trumpet, will call from their slumbers millions of freemen to defend their rights; and the overthrow of his theory now is as sure and certain, by the force of public opinion, as was the overthrow of all his former grand schemes, by the same mighty power.

I feel, Mr. President, as if I had wearied your patience, while I am sure my own bodily powers admonish me to close; but I cannot do so without again reminding my constituents of the greetings that have taken place on the consummation and ratification of the treaty, offensive and defensive, between the slaveholding and bank powers, in order to carry on a war against the liberties of our country, and to put down the present Administration. Yes, there is no voice heard from New England now. Boston and Faneuil Hall are silent as death. The free day laborer is, in prospect, reduced to the political, if not moral, condition of the slave; an ideal line is to divide them in their labor; yes, the same principle is to govern on both sides. Even the farmer, too, will soon be brought into the same fold. It will be again said, with regard to the government of the country, "The farmer with his huge paws upon the statute book, what can he do?" I have endeavored to warn my fellow-citizens of the present and approaching danger, but the dark cloud of slavery is before their eyes, and prevents many of them from seeing the condition of things as they are. The cloud, like the cloud of summer, will soon pass away, and its thunders cease to be heard. Slavery will come to an end, and the sunshine of prosperity warm, invigorate, and bless our whole country.

I do not know, Mr. President, that my voice will ever again be heard on this floor. I now willingly—yes, gladly—return to my constituents, to the people of my own State. I have spent my life amongst them, and the greater portion of it in their service, and they have bestowed upon me their confidence in numerous instances. I feel perfectly conscious that, in the discharge of every trust which they have committed to me, I have, to the best of my abilities, acted solely with a view to the general good, not suffering myself to be influenced by any particular or private interest whatever; and I now challenge those who think I have done otherwise, to lay their finger upon any public act of mine, and prove to the country its injustice or anti-republican tendency. That I have often erred in the selection of means to accomplish important ends I have no doubt; but my belief in the truth of the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, the political creed of President Jefferson, remains unshaken and unsubdued. My greatest regret is that I have not been more zealous, and done more for the cause of individual and political liberty than I have done. I hope, on returning to my home and my friends, to join them again in rekindling the beacon-fires of liberty upon every hill in our State, until their broad glaze shall enlighten every valley; and the song of triumph will soon be heard, for the hearts of our people are in the hands of a just and holy Being, who cannot look upon oppression but with abhorrence; and He can turn them whithersoever He will, as the rivers of water are turned. Though our national sins are many and grievous, yet repentance, like that of ancient Nineveh, may divert from us that impending danger which seems to hang over our heads as by a single hair. That all may be safe, I conclude that the Negro will yet be set free.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE SENATE, February 13, 1839.

On the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal Officers with Elections.

Mr. STRANGE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am not a volunteer in this debate. At the beginning of the session, the Senate thought proper to assign me a place on an important committee, to which the subject now under consideration was referred, and upon it the chairman of that committee presented a long and able report. To the credit of the exclusive authorship of that report, the chairman is entitled. Both its substance and its language are his own. But although I lay no claim to any part of the authorship of the report, I yielded it my hearty assent, and it is due to myself to show that I did not yield that assent hastily, or upon insufficient reasons. Upon the report the most extraordinary attack has been made; perhaps the most violent to be found in the history of this body. I had not the good fortune to hear the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] but I listened attentively to the assault made upon the report by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] who appeared to me to have wrought himself up to a most extravagant pitch of excitement. He spoke of the report as fraught with doctrines subversive of liberty, and so corrupting in their nature, that the Senate ought to undergo a lustration to purify itself from their contaminating effects. I listened to the Senator with equal surprise and disappointment. Surprise at the fury into which he seemed to have wrought himself, and disappointment at the result of his argument. I was not prepared to find his extravagant promises fall so far short of fulfillment, and little expected to see an advocacy of the bill result in its total abandonment.

The Senator stated he was so much surprised and bewildered at the reading of the report, that he was at a loss to know whether he was in the Senate of the United States or in the kingdom of France or of England. I am not at all disposed to question the truth of this statement, for it furnishes the only mode known to me of accounting for the strange statements made by the Senator in relation to the report. No man in his sober senses, in the full possession of all his faculties, could take up that report and extract from it the doctrines ascribed to it by the Senator from Virginia. Those high faculties, that good sense which usually characterize that Senator, were for some reason in abeyance. He must have been, as he himself declares, bewildered; for I cannot suppose (the only remaining alternative) that the Senator would willingly misrepresent what he really understood. So perfect was the Senator's bewilderment, that he not only asserted that certain doctrines were set forth in the report which I insist are not to be found there, but pledged himself to the proof, and proceeded to read therefrom certain passages for that purpose. His first allegation is, that the report inculcates on the office-holders of the General Government the duty of intermeddling with the elections of the country, and is calculated to stir them up to greater exertions. If any one will take the trouble to examine that report, he will find that, so far from inculcating upon the office-holders of the Government improper intermeddling with the elections, its tendency is directly the other way. The following is one of the passages it contains, which is, I think, anything but a persuasion to intermeddle improperly in elections:

"That elections ought to be pure and incorrupt is a principle admitted by all, and no language can be too strong to express the abhorrence felt by the committee against any attempt to destroy this freedom and purity. He who is guilty of either, by bribing or corrupting voters, violating the ballot-box, or setting at naught its voice, forging or suppressing returns, or disobeying the laws enacted for securing any elective right, is guilty of treason against republican institutions, and ought to be regarded by all as a dangerous foe to liberty."

I will now proceed to review the passages cited by the Senator, and, so far as my memory serves me, read them all over again to the Senate. The first is as follows:

"The foundation of representative Government is based upon the intelligence of the citizen, and to insure that intelligence, it is both the right and the duty of every one freely to discuss and communicate, both publicly and privately, such matters as he may suppose will advance the public interest, or inform the public mind. One of the most salutary and effectual agents to promote such interest is an enlightened public opinion. To evolve such opinion, and to give form and direction to the general course of national policy and the future destinies of all, every citizen, whether intrusted with public office or not, has a like deep, abiding, and active interest, and no citizen is at liberty to withdraw himself from this high responsibility, inseparably connected with republican institutions. One of the most celebrated law makers of one of the ancient republics, declared every citizen infamous who refused to take part in the affairs of his country; and the word idiot derived from the language of that republic, bears through all time this impress of their institutions, denoting one who was destitute of the spirit or intelligence requisite for the discharge of this highest duty of a citizen."

"The elective right is not conferred by the Constitution of the United States, but belongs to representative Government, and springs from its very nature; and the very essence of that right, under our institutions, is the right of electing the members of the General and State Governments. The value and the advantages of this right, so far as respects the public, depend upon the knowledge of public measures, and of the qualifications of candidates for public trust, and, consequently, upon the equal and unrestricted freedom of discussing their comparative merits and demerits. The citizen who, by the choice of his fellows, is distinguished by being selected to perform official duties and trusts, is not thereby elevated above them nor degraded below them. He parts with no rights of citizenship, but remains an equal among equals; still connected with them by the strong and enduring ligaments of mutuality of rights and privileges. Under our Constitution the people, not the Government, possess the sovereignty, and the doors of office can be opened only by the powerful charm of the public voice, and no degrading sacrifice of any of the privileges of citizenship, or any separation from the community of rights, feelings, and interests, which bind the people to the Government, is required."

These positions are all general, including every citizen, and not asserting any peculiar rights or duties as belonging to office-holders in relation to elections. Can any dispassionate man discover anything, in any part of the foregoing passage, inciting office-holders to the exercise of improper influence in elections? Is it not true that enlightened public opinion is the basis upon which our institutions rest? Is it not true that free discussion is important to the formation of sound public opinion? And is it not the duty of every man, whether he holds an office or not, to contribute his mite towards enlightening the public mind, and giving to public opinion a direct and healthy current? And is it not also true that those who shrink from that duty are, for the most part, idiots in the more modern acceptation of that word, or men so thoroughly selfish as to be indifferent to everything but their own private concerns? Men so indolent by nature as to decline every species of exertion, or so devoted to the acquisition of fortune as to be totally unmindful of the public weal, so that affairs are so conducted as to enable them to feather well their own nests? The report goes on to say:

"The object of the bill is to render what is lawful and praiseworthy, and in strict conformity with both the letter and spirit of our institutions, for all citizens, criminal in a particular class, who have been honored by the confidence of the people of the whole States."

Where is the incentive in that passage to office-holders to intermeddle with elections? What is there in it not accordant with the strictest propriety? It states what every man must see to be the effect of the bill. It contains solemn truth which no man can doubt who is not willfully blind. The next passage to which the Senator calls our attention is:

"It is as well his inherent right as his duty to discuss and promulgate freely the measures of any Administration, and the character and conduct of those who support or oppose it, as well to control them by the censorship of public opinion, as to subject them to the test of the Constitution. In doing so, he may win the confidence of his fellow-citizens by his declared opinions, or may become identified with some great principle which conciliates their support. All this is innocent and praiseworthy, even if the motive is the acquisition of office, because it promotes the public good. Can it be wise, or even just, to punish as a crime, when a citizen utters office, what was patriotic and praiseworthy while he was seeking it? Yet why should office-seeking and office-holding be thus separated by arbitrary enactments, which bestow honors and confidence upon the one, and penalty and ignominy upon the other, for doing the same act?"

Now, is not all this just and true? Is it not sound doctrine? And would it be pretended by any one that a free discussion of public men and public measures should be forbidden to any citizen? Would any bill containing such a proposal, in plain and undisguised terms, meet with favor from any quarter? And yet all that is asserted in the passage quoted is, in substance, that no such restriction ought to be imposed. The next passage quoted in support of the first charge is the following:

"The committee can perceive no reason for the adoption by Congress of any restriction upon any of what they deem the inherent and inalienable rights of every class of citizens, merely because they have been honored with the confidence of the people."

And does any man see a reason why a citizen should be deprived of his inherent and inalienable rights, merely because he has been appointed to office? I challenge any man in the Senate to assume such ground. Neither the Senator from Virginia, nor any other member, dare assume it. And shall the report be denounced for asserting its untenability? Upon these passages it is that the Senator from Virginia has based his assertion that the report urges the office-holders to an improper interference in the elections of the country. And does not the bare reading of these passages dispel at once the plausibility of the charge? I have said I was surprised that the charge should have been made. But I admit I ought not to have been surprised. After what has occurred under my own observation, my capacity for surprise at any opinion uttered, or any language used by the Senator upon a political subject, should have been exhausted.

And now, having utterly failed to prove the dangerous nature of the report, the Senator goes on to say that he would not have felt himself so imperatively called upon to assail it, could he consider it as the mere work of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, or even as the production of all the committee; but he regards it as an exposition of the opinions and sentiments of a whole political party—by which he evidently meant what is called the Administration party. Now, if the Senator intended to insinuate that any sentiment contained in the report was supplied from any source extraneous to the committee, that it was dictated by that Executive of whom the Senator seems to have conceived such a sudden, violent, and holy horror, he does great injustice to the committee, to the chairman, and still greater injustice to himself. But if he means no more than to assert that the report contains only such doctrines and opinions as are entertained by a great political party of this country, he asserts what is strictly true. It does contain, upon the subject of which it treats, the opinions and doctrines of the purest party of which this country will ever boast; a party of which any man may feel proud to be a member; a party numbering in its ranks a Franklin, a Jefferson, a Madison, a Taylor, a Jackson, and a host of other stars, which have shone the brightest in the political galaxy of our country.

But the Senator further imputes to the report an attempt to degrade the States, and put them upon a level with the private corporations of their own creation. This charge seems to me to be quite as baseless and gratuitous as the one which preceded it. The Senator does not, as in the former case, cite the passages in which he fancies this lurking vice is to be found, but contents himself with making the charge; and I defy any man to point out a portion of the report that at all justifies the imputation. I have, for the purpose of detecting such a vice, if it exists, in vain ransacked the report from end to end. But two or three times are the State governments and corporations mentioned in connection, and in every instance, I believe, the Federal Government is found in the same company; so that if the leveling process is introduced at all, it is by leveling up as well as leveling down. But let the passages speak for themselves:

"While one set of functionaries under the Federal Government, and all those of the State governments, and the officers of the corporations of associated wealth, are left with an unrestricted freedom of speech and of the press, this bill puts gags and fetters upon a few proscribed men, in respect to public men and public measures. Why this discrimination? Are the proscribed officers more corrupt or liable to corruption than other office-holders? Is it to guard against the corrupting influence and patronage of the Federal Administration? If so, the effect of the bill would be still more objectionable, as in degrading them by taking from them the rights common to all others, it would prepare them to become the willing instruments of corruption or ambition. This bill would create a caste among office-holders, deriving their authority from the same high source, the people, and requiring the same high qualifications to discharge their duties."

Now, is there anything in this paragraph drawing a distinction between any classes of officers degrading to the governments of the States? Is it not, on the contrary, the drift of the passage, to disapprove of degrading distinctions which it alleges the bill will create?

"Why [says the report in another place] should those officers be rendered aliens, and be prohibited from the enjoyment of the social right of discussing political subjects, even under the protection of their own household gods, while the other functionaries of the Federal and State Governments, and the officers of the corporations of associated wealth, and the employees of private persons, are permitted to retain the full rights of citizens? This bill degrades the right of suffrage, the guardian of all political rights, by meting it out as a boon in different portions to different citizens, all equally worthy of trust, and distinguished by popular favor, and by placing it under an odious espionage."

Are there here any invidious distinctions or degrading comparisons drawn? On the contrary, are they not, as before, disapproved and complained of? The report goes on to say:

"The committee can find no scales in the Constitution in which to weigh the relative patriotism, integrity, and independence of the functionaries of the Federal and State Governments, and the officers of corporations, or the employees of individuals. They cannot believe that the employees of the Federal Government are more corrupt or corrupting than those of other bodies—corporate or politic, or of individuals."

Is not this precisely the reverse of what is charged? The report declares that greater honesty is not to be found in one class of citizens than another; or, if so, that the committee know of no means of ascertaining its existence: so far is it from placing the officers of the Federal Government upon any point of peculiar elevation, or degrading the State officers and those of corporations to a level below them, as is most unjustly charged by the Senator from Virginia.

From this topic the Senator launches forth into a philippic against what he is pleased to call modern Democracy, one of whose characteristics he charges to be a tendency to curtail legislative power and to extend executive. Democracy is just what it always has been under our institutions. Its distinctive principles consist in tracing political power to its true source, and circumscribing all the departments of the Government strictly within their constitutional limits; and as experience has shown that legislative usurpation is of much more frequent occurrence than executive, against the former has its efforts, through the whole history of our country, been chiefly directed.

The Senator speaks of his early Democracy, and dates it back, I believe, as far as the year 1798, when, without meaning to compliment, I am sure the Senator must have been a very young politician. Against which, then, I pray you, were the celebrated resolutions of that period directed—legislative or executive usurpation? Was it not against the former? Was it not against a law passed by Congress, and not against any supposed misapplication, by the Executive, of power conferred by that law? Every one acquainted with the history of that transaction knows it is so. And we may be well assured, that while we are able to preserve the Constitution from legislative encroachment, we have nothing to fear from the Executive. If a despot should ever complete the overthrow of the institutions of American liberty, it must be when legislative violence has diminished their strength. And of the latter it is that Democracy is justly and particularly watchful. Its principles are now the same that they ever have been. Men may change, Mr. President, but principles never. Yea, men do change, and to justify or conceal their changes, endeavor to create confusion in principles themselves. The principles of the Democracy are now what they were in 1798, and the principles of its opponents are the same, also, however they may seek to disguise them under new names. The principles that distinguished the opponents of Democracy then are the principles that distinguish them now; and what would have made a Federalist of that day, and subsequently a Federal Republican, and still later a National Republican, makes a Whig now. Men may change their principles, and thus the Federalist of one day may be the Democrat of another. But it is only by changing his principles that a man becomes the one from having been the other. The principles themselves are as immutable as truth.

The Senator next goes on to charge the report with stirring up the people to rebellion against the law; and to establish that charge, cites from it the following passage:

"It deserves serious consideration, [says the report,] whether a law like this bill could ever be carried into execution at this day, and under our free institutions—a law which prostrates the freedom of thought, of action, of speech, and of the press, so far as respects a large portion of the most intelligent, respected, and meritorious of our citizens. The great body of the functionaries whom this bill would affect have been honored by the selection of the people, to discharge responsible duties, for their honesty, capacity, and fidelity to the Constitution. The habitual reviler of republican institutions, and of the capacity of the people for self-government, may in vain attempt to fix a stigma upon all officers who derive their appointments from the people, for the purpose of thus gradually undermining their confidence in the Government of their choice; but the people will always be found true to themselves, and will never submit to the execution of a law which deprives their fellow-citizen of his inherent, common, and equal rights simply because they had distinguished him by their favor and preference."

What is there here in the nature of an exhortation to the people to rebellion? What were the famous resolutions of 1798, but an appeal to the people to restore the breaches of the Constitution, not by force and violence, but by the exercise of their sovereign and constitutional powers? And does the Senator venture to complain of those resolutions? But this report does not go even so far as the resolutions; it makes no appeal to the people, but merely utters the voice of warning to this body against the passage of the proposed bill. By the will of our constituents we all profess to be governed, and the report only declares what its framer believes to be the immovable will of our common constituents.

But the Senator chooses to consider it a stirring up of the people, and this he denominates Locofocoism. Now, whether it is Locofocoism or not, it is solemn truth. This word Locofoco is one of those cabalistic terms which a certain class of politicians use to conjure up any accusation it may suit their convenience to fasten upon their adversaries. Its acknowledged unintelligibility relieves them from all obligation to explain, and it fixes a sort of undefined odium upon whomsoever or whatsoever they choose to denounce. Those who use it seem to attach to it no other

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Interference in Elections—Mr. Strange.

SENATE.

idea than that of a nomen generale of whatsoever is odious and detestable to them in politics. At one time, it is agrarianism; at another, a general community of everything, unregulated by law; at a third, hostility to corporations; and at a fourth, it is made to signify a seditious stirring up of the people.

But the Senator doubts whether he is a competent judge of Federalism and Locofocoism. Now, I admit, in a philological sense, no man is competent to define Locofocoism; but if it is to be taken as the proper name of any political party in the country, the Senator is, I think, altogether too modest in disavowing his competency to speak of it. If there is any truth in the maxim, experientia docet, (experience teaches,) the Senator is unusually well qualified to speak of the parties of this country and to define them. He has avowedly belonged to two, and the evidences are pretty strong that he is now uniting himself to a third. He ought, therefore, to be well acquainted with what lies upon the surface of things, palpable to the eye of any discerning man; and if there be any party secrets or mysteries in any of the parties of this country, they, also, cannot fail to be known to him who had been initiated into all.

But, after all, these violent assaults upon the report of the committee are not so much to be wondered at. The report has been very troublesome to the gentlemen on the other side. It so far shook the confidence of the Senator who introduced the bill as to induce him to propose an amendment changing materially its character; and the Senator from Virginia is for abandoning the bill altogether, and substituting in its place a string of resolutions. A general must be much dissatisfied with his position who changes it in the face of an enemy; but this our adversaries ought not to be allowed to do; they have made an issue before the country, and they ought to be required to meet it. It is one of the artifices of war, when a party is weak at home, to endeavor to transfer the scene of strife to the territory of the enemy; and by a similar artifice do the gentlemen seek to turn away observation from the enormities of the bill by directing it to the supposed defects in the report; but to little purpose is it adopted. The report scarcely admits of defense, because, in truth, it has no assailable point. The Senator from Virginia is unquestionably a gentleman of ingenuity and talent, and has come to the onset with a hearty will, if possible, to demolish this report; but every assault made by him has signally failed. His blows were dealt with dexterity enough, but they were unaccompanied with the force of truth. The bill, on the other hand, is assailable at every position; and were a shot directed against every weak point, it would be converted into a perfect riddle—nay, it is uncertain whether it would even hang together.

The bill is founded on a total misconception of our institutions and of existing facts. It is a misconception pervading the whole Federal party. They strangely imagine that there is in the Federal Constitution a cure for all the ills of life. No evil can exist but the powers of this Government are thought competent to reach it. Like the oriental tent spoken of by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] which a man may carry in his waistcoat pocket, it may yet be spread forth so as to cover the army of Xerxes. This is the radical error of that party, and from this root springs forth a legion of errors. From this little fountain issue large streams correspondent in bitterness. The gentlemen read the Constitution as a certain personage is said to utter his prayers—backwards. So far from restricting its action to the province of granted powers, they seem to consider it omnipotent, except so far as its action is expressly restricted. Instead of forbearing to exercise Federal power where the right is doubtful, they exert it often where it is manifest it does not legitimately exist. This is, as I have said, their radical political mistake, and from it numerous errors have sprung up and overspread the land. Many of these errors have even taken possession of the Democratic ranks, and insinuated their corrupting influences into the purest Administration this country has ever seen. It is impossible to associate with bad men and not imbibed corruption. "Evil communications corrupt good manners," said an inspired man; and thus it is that the Democratic politicians, daily associating with the Federalists, and often personally esteeming and admiring the men, become insensibly more or less tainted with their political heresies. It is no wonder, then, that we find it difficult to preserve the Democratic faith pure and unadulterated. Every Democratic Administration has found more or less Federalism creeping into its measures.

But even in an unlimited Government it is acknowledged, as a wise maxim, that much legislation ought to be avoided; that no law should pass until an existing evil, demanding correction, is apparent, and the remedy proposed seems likely to prove efficient, without creating evils greater than that it is intended to remove. The bill under consideration assumes that there is an evil, and proposes a remedy; and in the assumption of that evil, exposes one of the most dangerous and operative errors of the whole Opposition party, viz: that the people and the Government are foreign to each other, and may have separate and distinct interests. So much are they dazzled by British glory, and so accustomed are they to give credit to that country for all that we possess, that they can conceive of no political proposition which would be true in Britain and not true in this country. They forget that our Constitution was formed by the people, that it is, in truth, a mere social compact, and that it is one of the people who is employed in each office necessary to give efficiency to the compact; while the British constitution recognizes the king as the fountain of all honor and power, and all the guarantees of liberty it now contains, consist of concessions made from time to time by him. Here power and authority is entirely official; there it is personal as well as official. Here power and authority is continually falling back into the common mass, to be disposed of anew as it shall determine. There it has a perpetual existence, separated from the mass of the people, into whose hands it can never fall without a revolution. Confounding things so totally dissimilar, naturally leads gentlemen into further errors. They suppose that what is an evil in one country must necessarily be so in another where the same state of things exists, and that the same remedies are applicable. This would be all true, if their first supposition were not altogether erroneous; but, being so, all the conclusions drawn from it are misapplied. But of what does the bill complain? Of bribery? No! That is not practiced, or proper punishment for it is already provided. What, then, is the evil? It is stated in the caption of the bill: "A bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections. To the end that the great powers given to the officers of the Federal Government, and other persons employed in its service, may not be used for the influencing of elections, which ought to be free and incorrupt."

Now, sir, what are those great powers given to Federal officers? Can any man point one of them out? Has the Senator in his bill told us what they are, or indicated even one of them? To use an expression of the Senator from Virginia, he has entirely pretermitted them. I deny their existence. They are among the phantoms which vivid imaginations have of late so frequently made to stalk across the political stage, to frighten men from their propriety. It would have been impossible for the Senator to point out these great powers to which he alludes, and he has therefore taken the more judicious course of assuming their existence as a matter needing no proof. Every man is conscious, in his own experience, of the effect this process has upon the mind. The use of the simple epithet "Cicero, the orator," is much more persuasive to the mind than Cicero was a great and distinguished orator, than the most labored argument. A like course is pursued in the construction of this bill. It assumes as a fact what requires proof, and ingeniously passing by the fact, states the principle also in such obscure terms, that the mind is not a little confused by the semblance of propriety and its real inconsistency with sound doctrine. No one will deny that if office-holders, or any other persons, endeavor to corrupt the voters at an election by bribes or promises, it would be grossly criminal; while at the same time any argument addressed to their reason and patriotism would be highly proper. If the office-holders use the former, their acts are grossly criminal, and they can doubtless be punished by the existing laws; but against the latter there is not, nor ought there to be, any law.

The bill assumes that great powers exist in Federal officers, which are applied unfairly to the control of elections; and this I deny, toto calco. This assumption of the bill is calculated to give force and circulation to one of the most dangerous errors in public opinion, now becoming too prevalent, that office-holders and office-seekers should be an odious class. Why should they be so. It is contrary to practice and opinion in the purest days of ancient liberty. It is contrary to sound opinion now. The man who devotes himself to the service of his country is no fit object for contempt. If a man seeks office by base and dishonorable means, or seeks to retain it when obtained, by any unfair devices, he is a base and dishonest man; but in the receiving or holding office itself there is no dishonor. He who serves his country on the field of battle is honored by all. If it could be ascertained that he had done so from base and dishonorable motives, respect would be withdrawn, and the finger of scorn pointed at him. But if, in that service, it could be discovered that he was moved by no higher consideration than "seeking the bubble, reputation, even in the cannon's mouth," he would be hailed with acclamation. And is it for the American people to think, or say, that he who seeks their favor by fair and honorable means acts unworthily? That he who aspires to distinction, by filling the offices which they confer, is not thereby seeking honor? It has been fashionable of late to hold such doctrines, and this bill follows up the idea, and endeavors to widen the gulf between the people and their official agents. And why has it become fashionable? There are two principal reasons: the one is, that a spirit of avarice is abroad throughout our land, and bending every soul to his sway, and leveling all distinctions but those which money can create. Wealth is the only true badge of honor, and as wealth is seldom obtained in faithful public service, public service has ceased to be honorable. The other reason is obvious. Many who desire office are disappointed, and, like the fox in the fable, cry out "sour grapes," while, like the same fox, they are ready enough to seize upon every cluster that hangs within their reach.

Sir, public opinion upon this subject is fast being perverted, and this bill is calculated to contribute greatly to that perversion. In the sequestered days of the Republic, it was an honor to serve the country in any capacity; and, in the language of the report, every man who shrunk from it was deemed an idiot. The man who seeks the service of his country by honorable means, should be honored. There is but one honorable mode of seeking it, and that is by discharging faithfully the duties of the station he already fills, and fitting himself to fill others well when called upon. Let those who denounce office-holders and office-seekers lay their hands upon their hearts, and answer, whether they do not desire office, and would not hold it if they might. Not one in a million could answer in the negative; and those few would be found mostly among the indolent, the sordid, or the misanthropic. Nothing can be more unfavorable to the stability of our institutions than the spread of this prejudice against office, which Federal men and Federal presses are active in propagating. I had the good fortune the other day to peruse the letter of the celebrated John Taylor, of Caroline, lately brought to the public attention, so replete with instructive matter. Speaking of the operations of the paper monopoly party, he says, among other things:

"It will distract the public mind, detach the national confidence, by falsehood and artifice, from its honest servants, and take advantage of the confusion generated by its own acts avowedly to erect monarchy, under the pretence of restoring order."

This is precisely what is now doing, and the great tendency of the bill under consideration, by stirring up suspicion between the people and their officers, and detaching the confidence of the former from their honest servants. This bill rests upon the basis that the interests of the people and their officers are at variance; and, if that basis be false, the whole fabric must fall. No one would object to persons having common interests consulting together about those interests. The assumption, then, of an existing evil is erroneous; and the necessity, therefore, for a remedy, is without proof.

But passing by the evil for the present, let us look a little to the remedy proposed. Even allowing, for the sake of argument, the evil to exist at all, it is comparatively a small one, while the remedy proposed would introduce evils of the greatest magnitude. It would be like cutting off the head to relieve the toothache, or laying open the heart to diminish arterial action; it is striking at the very vitals of liberty to remove an unseemly pimple from her cheek. What are the evils which the bill would produce? They are numerous, and I will consider a few of them.

I. In the first place it introduces into our legislation the odious principle of distinction. It disunites the interests of the people and the office-holders, and places them on different grounds. The great principle of equality lies at the base of all our institutions, and distinctions, official or otherwise, except mere functionary distinctions, ought carefully to be shunned. If it were possible to have the functional operations of the social compact carried on without singling out individuals to perform them, it would doubtless have been done; and so far our institutions would have more approximated the perfection at which they aim. But it was impossible; and the mere distinction of holding office must necessarily exist.

But it is altogether unwise and foreign to the genius of our institutions to render this distinction more conspicuous; and it is, in principle, a matter of indifference whether this distinction be privative, or one of addition; and, indeed, it is doubtful whether the former is not the more mischievous of the two. For the robbery you practice upon the office-holders they will seek to indemnify themselves by assuming something to which they have no right, and their claim, with the aid of a little sophistry, will probably be sustained. "I am cut off from such and such privileges," they will argue, "and surely it is not unreasonable that I should enjoy such and such privileges in return." A generous people, in some moment of weakness, will allow the plea, and custom, if not law, will establish the right. Besides, it stifles the benevolent feelings of the man, and forces him to pursue, with more undivided aim, his own peculiar interest. Anything which segregates us, as it were, from our kind, or renders us unlike the rest of our species, weakens the claim which that species has upon our kindnesses and services, and separates our interests from theirs. Does not experience prove this in the case of deformed persons? Are they not, with some honorable exceptions, suspicious, malicious, and repulsive in their dispositions? Do they not seek to indemnify themselves, for the contempt which they most unjustly suppose is generally entertained for them, by noting with peculiar severity, the faults, the vices, the follies, and the defects of others?

Again: when distinctions, however degrading in themselves, are associated with honors, while all the other evil effects and degrading distinctions remain, it inclines the subject of this distinction to magnify the honor with which it is associated, and to set upon it an unjust value. The mutilated Asiatic who treads an eastern court forgets, for a time, the wrong done to his nature in contemplation of the honor and power which it brings him, and glories in his shame, and knows no sympathy for those whom an arbitrary monarch may commit to his cruel domination. Just so with the office-holder in this land, upon whom you fasten any degrading distinction. He comes at once falsely to estimate the honors with which it is associated, and strives, as rapidly as possible, to appropriate to himself all that comes within his reach. In the present healthy state of public opinion, a public officer, who assumes official pomp and consequence, is certain to have the finger of scorn pointed at him; and this fixes upon his mind an abiding sense that he has no property in his office, that he is a mere public servant, pro hac vice.

II. If this bill does not rend from their places the pillars of the Constitution, it saps the foundation upon which they rest. It has been well remarked, that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance." By this bill you propose to close the eyes, stop the ears, and seal the lips of those whose peculiar duty it is to watch, and whose positions enable them to watch to most advantage. Constantly employed in the public service, they acquire an intimate knowledge of public affairs and public men. They stand, as it were, upon an eminence, from whence they can look around and see danger approaching from afar, and from any quarter. False alarms they will doubtless often give. But in political matters, the story of the boy and the wolf does not apply. No matter how often the alarm is given, there will be plenty to listen to it; the difficulty is in procuring it to be given. How foolishly, then, should we act in stopping the mouths of those who are best situated for giving it! The proposal of the Opposition to pass this bill reminds me of the fable of the sheep and the wolves. While their dogs remained with the sheep they were in comparative safety; but when the silly sheep were persuaded to surrender their dogs as hostages, the wolves fell upon the sheep and devoured them.

III. But not only would the pillars of the Constitution be shaken by the passage of this bill, but a breach would be made in its own noble fabric. Congress has no right to pass any law not expressly authorized by the Constitution, or necessarily incidental to the exercise of some power expressly granted. So at least every Democrat in this body holds. Now, what clause in the Constitution expressly authorizes the passage of this law? To what granted power is it incidental? If the power exists in either form, under the Constitution, gentlemen can point out the clause in which the grant is contained. They have not done so, and I defy them to do it. Nay, not only is the act not authorized, but it is expressly forbidden. By the first article of the amendments to the Constitution it is declared that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

And is not, I would ask, the liberty of speech assailed by this bill? Does the Constitution make any exception to the exclusion of office-holders from the protection of this clause? Yet the Senator from Virginia says, let us hear no more of arguments drawn from the alien and sedition laws, and their fate under the denunciations of the people of this country. Why should we hear no more? Are not those laws and the present bill so similar that they might well pass for the offspring of the same parent? The bill, as it now stands, is subject to all the objections to the sedition law; and if modified as the Senator from Kentucky proposes, it will then become subject to all the objections to the alien law also. Let us look for a moment to the language of the sedition law:

"That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause to be written, printed, uttered, or published," &c.

What is the language of the bill under consideration?

"That no marshal, &c., shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever," &c.

How similar in their objects the act and the bill. How immediately are both leveled at the liberty of speech and of free discussion. What, then, were the objections of the patriots of 1798 to the sedition law? I will read from that celebrated report of Mr. Madison:

"The second object against which the resolutions protest is the sedition act. Of this it is affirmed: 1. That it exercises a power not delegated by the Constitution. 2. That the power, on the contrary, is expressly forbidden. 3. That this is a power which, more than any other, ought to produce universal alarm; because it is leveled against the right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication thereon, which has ever been justly esteemed the only effectual guardian of every other right."

The report then goes on to show that all these objections apply to the sedition law; and is it not obvious that they apply with equal force to the bill under consideration? And shall we pass a law containing all these odious features, which have been so fully exposed to the American people, in the very able report from which I have read the extract? But I said, if the bill was amended as proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, the objections to the alien law would be brought to bear upon it also. What are those objections? I will call them to the attention of the Senate, from the same source to which I have just adverted:

"Of the alien act, it is affirmed by the resolution: 1. That it exercises a power nowhere delegated to the Federal Government. 2. That it unites legislative and judicial powers to those of the Executive. 3. That this union of power subverts the general principles of free government. 4. That it subverts the particular organization and positive provisions of the Federal Constitution."

It will be found by the reasoning in the report, under the second objection, (with which I will not occupy the Senate,) that the indefinite terms in which the law was couched, gave force, if not existence, to that objection. And with a law so indefinite as the one under consideration, commanding the President to dismiss from office all who shall be guilty of the acts against which the law may be supposed to be directed, will he not be constituted, to a certain extent, legislator, judge, and executive officer? No other judge, or even jury, intervenes to inquire into the facts; and so indefinite are the terms of the bill, that the field of construction is so wide as to amount to legislation, and then the President himself is to execute the law. The President first says what the law shall mean. He then adjudges the culprit to have violated it, as so construed, and finally performs the executive act of dismissal. If this is not confounding all the powers of Government in a single individual, it is difficult to conceive what would be. The bill under consideration, then, combines all the objections to both the alien and the sedition law, and ought to be subjected to the same condemnation, and will doubtless arouse the same popular indignation, should it become a law.

I know it may be said that this law operates upon a peculiar class only, and can never endanger the freedom of the citizens generally. The same might have been said of the alien law. But it was not said, or at least it was not successfully urged. And is it not obvious that, if the principle is once conceded, the security of all is gone? If Congress has a right to legislate with regard to one class of citizens, why may it not with regard to all upon the same subject? It is contended that this is a mere condition annexed to official tenure, and that Congress has a right to prescribe the terms upon which officers created by itself may be held. If the latter proposition be true to any extent, it can be so no further than may be necessary to insure official fitness and fidelity. It cannot be that Congress has an unlimited and capricious right to attach conditions to official tenure. If so, it might require a man to live single, to be deprived of some of his limbs or members, and, under the pretense of official conditions, compel him to submit to every species of tyranny and degradation, and to barter all his rights as a citizen, for the poor privilege of holding office. It is only quasi officers that any law can be made to operate upon, those who may hold office, which may not be made to operate upon every other citizen of the country. Can it be pretended that because a man accepts office, he is bound hand and foot to Congress, that he is so far segregated from the rest of the community, that Congress acquires over him a power greater than that of a master over a slave. All the powers of Congress are to be rigidly and rationally construed, and especially such as may be abused to the oppression and disfranchisement of any citizen.

But in reply to the objection against the removal from office, by the President, it is said that he already possesses that power to an unlimited extent, and this bill will add nothing to it. There is great fallacy in this reply. The present power of removal is held by the President, as the general executive officer of the Government, who is responsible to the people for its proper conduct; and ought, therefore, to have it in his power to dismiss any agent for whom he is not willing to be responsible; and when an officer is removed under that authority, it is only because the President judges him not qualified. His want of qualification may consist in moral delinquency, or in want of capacity, but, in either case, he is dismissed not as a punishment for the past, but as a security for the future. But the bill under consideration enjoins removal expressly as a punishment, and in so doing confounds all constitutional distinctions, and creates evils similar to those for which the odious alien law was responsible.

But the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Rives,] in reply to the constitutional objection to this bill, cites several cases in which he supposes Congress has or may abridge the liberty of speech, and quotes, in the first place, the law passed at this session, prohibiting the carrying or sending a challenge to fight a duel. In the answer, it is proper to remark that this expression in the Constitution, "liberty of speech," has a specific and well-settled meaning, and is synonymous with the right of free discussion, the very thing against which the bill under consideration is leveled. But a right of free discussion is not involved in sending a challenge to fight a duel, which is a thing malum in se, and forbidden by the laws of every civilized nation. The right of Congress, therefore, to prohibit the sending a challenge, is not negated by that clause of the Constitution which forbids the passage of any law "abridging the freedom of speech;" and her right to legislate upon that subject within the District of Columbia is part of her general exclusive legislative power over this District, beyond which she has not attempted, and could not exercise it.

The Senator next supposes the case of an office-holder writing a letter or sending a message to a voter, by which he informs him if he will vote for such a man he will give him such an office; and asks if Congress cannot prohibit and direct the punishment of such an act? I answer, within the District of Columbia it can unquestionably. Such an act, if not actual bribery, it is so very like it that no moral distinction can be drawn between them; and I promise the Senator if he will introduce a bill to prohibit and punish such an act within the District of Columbia, I will willingly vote for it; and if I thought the power of Congress over the subject extended so far, I would vote for it throughout the Union. But how does it happen that no such provision is included in this bill? I suppose, either because no such thing has been practiced, or the laws in relation to it are already sufficiently penal. The Senator lastly refers to the case of a judicial officer going about among the crowd at a court-house, and soliciting jurors to give their verdict in a particular way; and the Senator asks if this would not be a breach of official dignity, and subject the transgressor to impeachment? Unquestionably it would; but as I see no similarity between the case supposed, and the one under consideration, it would be an idle undertaking to point out their differences.

IV. I now proceed to another objection to the bill under consideration, and that is, that it is based upon a radically false notion and estimate of the people of this country. A belief seems to pervade the whole Opposition party, that the people are stupid, ignorant, gullible, and altogether unfit for self-government, and require to be guarded by law against themselves. This I hold to be utterly untrue. If a man acquires influence among the people, it must be upon the strength of a character for integrity and devotion to the interests of the commonwealth, and a capacity for understanding well those interests. But so far from this influence being increased by his promotion to office, it is often, if not generally, greatly diminished. The people are, if anything, over suspicious, but it is erring on the safe side, and, therefore, I will not complain of it. Let them for a moment suspect a man to have any private interest in a question, and his influence, however great before, is at once paralyzed. This interest they are ready enough to suspect in an office-holder, whose established moral worth does not defy suspicion; and hence an office-holder is generally dead at the polls, if he does not actually injure the cause he attempts to support. All experience is in favor of this position, and wherever the Administration has most office-holders, there are its defeats the most signal. It is true, though an office-holder cannot be efficient in favor of the Administration under which he acts, he may be very much so against it. Apparently, then, he is acting against his interests, and the soundest judgment would infer that nothing but the deepest convictions of right, founded upon unquestionable means of knowledge, would induce him so to act.

But a man advocating the administration under which he serves, is scarcely believed, although he backs his assertions by the most convincing proofs. The people are ready enough to adopt the idea that he who has the control of a man's bread, has the control of the man, and to act with correspondent distrust; and in that distrust is the true security against improper influence, and not in legislative enactment. It answers well in declamation to hold up this idea to the people "that control over the man's bread is control over the man," in order to keep them watchful, and the politician deserves no blame for so doing. But it is a fit subject only for declamation, as applied to the politics of our country; for however true as an abstract proposition, there are no facts to give it application. It is not true that the President has control over the bread of the office-holders, for he can neither increase nor diminish their salaries. It is true he may dismiss them from office, but he cannot do so without danger to himself, except upon sufficient reason. So far is it from being true that the President can exercise this control, that it has become exceedingly fashionable for the office-holders to be clamorous against him; and it is little less than a libel upon the people of this country to say that there is danger of their being controlled by the office-holders, or that they may be seduced by them into giving improper votes. A few individuals here and there may possibly be influenced, but no general control can be exercised. Man is frail in his best estate, and may be corrupted; and if the means existed to sufficient extent, bribery might control the elections. But stopping short of that, the agents of the Administration, should it think proper to employ any, would be worse than useless in procuring votes. Happily, the means of bribery are very limited, and the offense is already sufficiently checked by the laws of the States, who possess the only competent authority upon the subject.

V. But there is an objection to the bill, which, if possible, lies still deeper than those before noticed. Whether taken as it stands, or amended as proposed, it is essentially one of the most tyrannical measures ever proposed in this body. I. In the first place, it sets forth the offense proposed to be punished in terms so very indefinite, that an act, inconsiderable in itself, may become the subject of most enormous punishments. It is a maxim lying at the foundation of all wholesome government, that the punishment should, in the sense of the community, bear some proportion to the offense. This principle is by this bill utterly disregarded. If a man shall but say a certain candidate is well qualified for the office to which he aspires, he must, in the present form of the bill, be declared infamous, and fined $500, and, either in its present or amended form, be dismissed from office. Now does any man perceive a just proportion here between the offense and the punishment? Well might the report say the people of this country would never consent to the execution of such a law. They never would agree that a man who holds an office emanating from them should be thus bowed down in a slavery more grinding than that of any African in the country.

2. It is tyrannical, in that it invades the sanctity of the private circle, and begets suspicion and jealousy and caution where the most unbounded confidence and freedom should forever reign. Under it a man's own household may furnish enemies for his destruction. As the bill stands, the hope of gain is held out to them to induce its members to become so; and, should one of them think proper to charge him falsely, there is no mode of rebutting the charge; he cannot prove a negative. The son may unwillingly be made the accuser of his own father; nay, in the progress of depravity, one may be found a swift witness in the destruction of a venerable parent. English history furnishes such instances. The consciousness that the slightest expression may be construed into a persuasion or dissuasion, will cause one member of the same family to look with suspicion upon, and speak with caution before, another. The great value of our institutions of Government is the security and protection they throw around the domestic circle; but when they are rendered the destroyers of all its confidence and innocent freedom, they may truly be said to be worse than war, pestilence, and famine. Let us suppose a case: a venerable man, surrounded by sons and sons-in-law—one who has grown gray in the service of his country—is the holder of an office; his sons and sons-in-law hold conversation in his presence respecting some pending election, and he finds them all inclined to vote in favor of a man whom he knows to be a Catiline at heart, and ready to seize the earliest opportunity of prostrating the institutions of his country; yet is he condemned to silence, or doomed to endure the penalties of this ruthless law! Or, to make the case still stronger, one of these persons, who are by nature entitled to the fruits of his wisdom and experience, turns to him and asks his opinion. His lips are sealed; he dare not utter a word; and from one of the holiest offices of paternal love is cruelly cut off. Can a bill producing such results deserve any countenance from the Senate? Does it not fill every bosom with horror in their contemplation?

3. It is tyrannical, inasmuch as it interferes with the rights of common conversation among neighbors. If a man is so unfortunate as to hold an office, however intimate the footing upon which he may be with a friend, politics; that subject so interesting to every man under a free Government, must be altogether excluded from their conversation. It is impossible to conceive of tyranny more absolute than that which stands forth embodied in this bill.

4. Again, this tyranny is rendered doubly oppressive to its victims from its partial operation. Distinctions are made by it between different classes of office-holders. Misery loves company, and the sorrows of the captive are always embittered by contrasting his condition with that of those who are sporting in the air of freedom. Why is this distinction made among different classes of office-holders? Are those upon whom the law is intended to operate more likely to be mischievous than those who are left free from its fetters? Surely not. The humble officers are the subjects of the law, while the aristocratic officers are left free. The district attorneys, those gentlemen on whose lips dwell the notes of soft persuasion, are left at large to practice such electioneering arts as may suit them. Unfortunately, but few officers are found friendly to the Democratic cause: This is not the time or place to inquire into the reason, but it is a melancholy truth that a very large portion of the lawyers and merchants of the country are opposed to a Democratic administration of the Government.

5. A fifth objection to the bill is, that it forces upon the Executive removal from office. I speak not of it now as I did when I objected to it as an invasion of the Constitution similar to that of the alien law, but in a totally different point of view. How frequently do we hear upon this floor of Executive patronage, and what complaints are made whenever the President exercises his constitutional power of removal? It never happens but the motives of the President are impugned, and the torch of party strife is lighted. This bill proposes greatly to multiply and aggravate this evil. Whenever any one shall be removed under it, the elements of civil strife will be set in motion. Every man removed will have his friends, who will question the propriety of the act. They will conceive that a stigma has been unjustly placed upon one whom they esteem and love, and in their efforts to remove that stigma they will endeavor to hurl the magistrate from his place. Politicians will lay hold of this excitement, and political feuds, now sufficiently bitter, will more and more distract the nation. The fabled apple of discord, if caused to roll abroad through the country, could scarcely be more fruitful in the production of strife.

VI. Another objection to the bill is that it is calculated to degrade morally the holders of office. It will fix upon them a disgraceful mark, and lower them in their own estimation. Who does not know, who has not felt, the sustaining power of a consciousness of being held in high moral estimation by his fellow men against the pressure of temptation? As long as a man can maintain a consciousness of his own moral elevation, there is little danger of his falling into disgraceful acts; but as soon as you force him to place a low estimate on his own moral worth, you accomplish one step, at least, in his downward progress. When you fix on him the stigma of baseness, you go far towards preparing him for base deeds. Upon the general moral elevation of our citizens depends the permanency of our institutions. By degrading your officers, you tend towards the degradation of the people also. "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" and with still more rapidity does moral contagion spread through society. This is, to me, a powerful argument against the bill.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Interference in Elections—Mr. Strange.

SENATE.

But all arguments in favor of the bill having failed, an effort is made to rest it upon that which is always resorted to, for the support of that which has nothing else to sustain it—precedent. And from whence is the precedent drawn? From England! And at the very mention of the name of England, the heart of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] seemed to be warmed with a sort of sacred fire, and he burst forth into an impassioned eulogium upon her institutions. I could not but be reminded of Mr. Hamilton's remark, that the British constitution, with all its corruptions, was the most perfect system of Government that ever existed. We have heard enough, in by-gone years, of English institutions—

Mr. RIVES disclaimed having eulogized British institutions as they existed. He spoke merely of the great principles they contained.

Mr. STRANGE. I certainly did misunderstand the Senator, as he has explained himself, as I doubt not, correctly. But it is not singular I should have misunderstood him, for the drift of the argument was calculated to mislead me. A precedent is cited from England, and the object is to give force to that precedent. The natural mode of doing so was to laud and commend to our favor those institutions, of which the precedent constituted a part, and not to eulogize mere abstract principles, which had no particular connection with the precedent. But let that pass. I believe myself the British constitution has many excellencies; but I believe, also, it is thoroughly soaked with corruption through all its pores. I do not believe, with the Senator, that the free principles of our Government were derived from the British constitution. Those great principles had their existence in the clear heads and pure hearts of the framers of our Constitution. They did not ingraft them into our Constitution because they were in the British. They eschewed the evils of the British constitution; but they did not throw away anything that was good because it happened to be there. I admit they surveyed the long track of ages, and gathered from it a large stock of experience. The history of England formed a portion of their study, and helped them in maturing their great designs; but the great principles upon which they acted existed without the British constitution. Our Constitution contains many things in common with the British, but it is purged of its corruptions; and I, for one, am unwilling to see them restored. Was it because British institutions were free and equal, and just in their operation, that our forefathers fled from the comforts of home and civilization to build up an empire in the western wilderness? I have always heard it was for a very different reason. It was, as I have learned, that they might rear a fabric of liberty, in which they might enjoy, unmolested, those rights and privileges inestimable to them, which the British constitution did not secure. But it is not only insisted that we ought to follow this English precedent, but that, in fact, there is a greater necessity for such a provision here than in England.

We are told, in substance, that liberty is in more danger from the encroachments of the President of the United States than from those of the King of Great Britain, and that because the one is elective and the other hereditary. And is this indeed so? It is wonderful, then, that our forefathers, in their admiration of the British constitution, had not borrowed from it an hereditary monarch along with the other admirable features. It is strange they did not guard against the dangers of an elective Chief Magistrate. Their views, I fancy, must have differed from those of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator then proceeds to point out the enormities which gave rise to the precedent, and draws a glowing picture of the tyranny of the Stuarts. It is a little singular that, among the many tyrannical kings of England, whenever gentlemen wish to portray a tyrant, they pounce upon one of these unfortunate Stuart kings. I am not the advocate of the Stuarts, nor do I deny the right of the people of England to expel this family and choose their own rulers, but I must insist they were not the most tyrannical of the British kings, and that when Britain exchanged the weak and bigoted James for his ungrateful son-in-law, (to say the least of him,) they did not commit themselves to the government of one who was no less a tyrant. But what were the tyrannical acts of these odious Stuarts to which the Senator has called our attention? The first is cloaking with members of Parliament; and it is intimated that similar acts have been practiced in this country. When, I would ask? If the Senator had specified time and place, perhaps a more definite answer might be given to the charge. But how does the Senator know that it has been practiced? Has he anything but vague and uncertain rumor? I admit, if it has been practiced in the sense intimated by the Senator, "it is a grievous fault, and grievously should Caesar (or anybody else) answer it." But does the Senator speak ex cathedra? Does he mean to say it was practiced when he is supposed to have had, in a peculiar degree, the ear of the Executive? If so, he ought to have informed us of this before. There was a time when it was his right, and even his duty, to have made the disclosure. But after having slumbered upon, I will not say his rights, but his duty, for so long a time, it seems a little out of place to make the charge now. It forcibly reminds me of an anecdote which is said to have occurred some years ago in my own town.

There resided a certain preacher, remarkable for his eloquence, and equally so for his high estimate of his own powers. There also resided a lawyer, far advanced in life, who, although not much interested in matters of religion, yet for fashion's sake, or the pleasure derived from listening to the eloquence of the preacher, occasionally went to hear him, and especially of an evening, when a hearty dinner, washed down with a glass or two of good wine, rendered the lawyer rather inclined to doze. Under these circumstances, even the eloquence of the preacher, did not serve always to keep him awake. This rather nettled the divine, who could not bear to think that any intelligent listener could fall asleep under his exhortations. One Sabbath evening he took the lawyer to ask for this violation of decorum, and by way of enforcing his admonition, "Do you not know," said he, "that I will be called upon at the last day to testify against you for all these things?" "If you should be called upon," replied the ready lawyer, "I do not doubt you will willingly testify, for I have always heard the greatest rogues are apt to turn State's evidence." Now I do not mean to apply any opprobrious epithet to the Senator from Virginia, or to insinuate that he has acted dishonestly. I only mean forcibly to convey the idea that a man bringing such charges against an Administration of which he once formed a part, and with which he has since fallen out, does not stand in an enviable position. But if, as I believe, the Senator had nothing but idle rumor whereon to ground his charge, he is certainly to blame in lending the sanction of his name, from the place he occupies, to an accusation so grave, upon such authority, and basing thereupon a serious argument.

The next complaint against the Stuarts is, that circulars were issued advising, commanding, and seducing the people to vote for particular candidates; and the Senator again intimates that the same thing has been practiced in this country, and singles out the Secretary of War as the guilty person. He then burst forth into an impassioned eulogy upon the distinguished gentleman whom he supposes to have been the victim of this interference. Now I am not at all disposed to question the merits of the gentleman on whom the eulogy is bestowed, or to deny its justice. But I must be pardoned for saying it is out of place at present, as the defeat of that gentleman has nothing to do with the subject under discussion. I have high authority for declaring that the charge against the Secretary is altogether founded in misapprehension. If the gentlemen on the other side have any cause to complain of him upon that subject, it is for refusing to intermeddle in the election. It is known to every one, that up to the time of his taking office under the present Administration, no man stood higher before the country, for his talent, his patriotism, and moral worth, than the Secretary of War. On an important occasion he signalized the honor of your flag, more than he could have done had he borne it in triumph over an ensanguined field. But no sooner does he become a member of the Administration, than the shafts of malice are leveled at his fame. Such is the Moloch spirit of party, and that, too, among those who cry out the loudest against party! Nay, more, upon the vague surmises of a party press, a charge is solemnly brought against him upon the floor of the Senate.

These were some of the evils complained of under the Stuarts, and this is the precedent of facts; and these evils, we are told, the glorious Whigs of that day attempted to remedy; and I fancied there was something in the manner and tone of voice, in the allusion to the glorious Whigs of that day, which seemed to glance off to the glorious Whigs of the present day, on this side of the Atlantic; and I thought there was an intimation that the glorious Whigs of this day should imitate the glorious Whigs of that in their noble achievements. There was a time, I think, when the Senator from Virginia would not be found cheering on the Whigs of the present day to any enterprise; when he would have looked upon any triumph of theirs as a triumph over the true interests of the country. What, then, has wrought this change in his opinion and feelings? But I do not desire to assume the office of catechist to the Senator, or to render him my political catechumen. I will content myself with the inquiry, if the Senator does not desire the triumphs of the Whigs of the present day, why this significant stress upon the glorious Whigs of England? But if the glorious precedent must be followed, why stop short? We have seen what was the precedent of fact; let us now see what is the precedent of law. It was not only that office-holders should not meddle in elections, but that they should not vote; and that no public contractor should sit in Parliament. If the precedent is to be our guide and reason for action, why stop short of the point to which it conducts? Is it the intention of gentlemen, when they have carried out the principle of prohibiting interference, to go still further, and adopt all the features of the precedent? There is great force and beauty and propriety in the favorite maxim of the Senator: "It is the first step that costs;" and never was there a time when this maxim more deserved to be heeded. Imagination, following the direction in which this bill points, is incapable of perceiving the termination of its course; but enough is perceived to make us start back with horror. But if gentlemen had thought of pressing their measure to the fullest extent of the precedent, they know that the people of this country are not prepared for such a step. This is a mere tentative measure. The people are first tried with a lighter chain; and when accustomed to that, the heavier will be applied. According to the remark of that great man, a part of whose essay I read from the Globe of yesterday, the tendency of this bill is to weaken the confidence of the people in their officers.

But there is, in truth, no parallel between the complaints of the Whigs of England of that day, and the Whigs of this country at this. The English Whigs complained of the personal interference of the King, or directly through his officers. But the bill is predicated upon a supposed interference of the office-holders, from their own head and imagination, and not upon the instigation of the President. If otherwise, the conclusion of the bill is most lame and impotent. It proposes to make the very man who procures the act to be done punish those who perpetrate it; as if, supposing the President to be so lost to a sense of propriety and official integrity as actually to employ his officers in the management of elections, he would hesitate to retain them in their places after it was done, in defiance of your law. The contrary expectation would be about as reasonable as that of the valiant knight of La Mancha, that his faithful Sancho would flagellate himself unmercifully with many stripes, that the fair Dulcinea might be disenchanted.

But the Senator cites us another precedent, drawn from the Constitution itself, which declares that no public officer shall have a seat in either House of Congress. But this does not meet the difficulties of the present case at all. There is no parity between a constitutional provision and a legislative enactment.

Another precedent is quoted from the laws of Virginia, which prohibit an officer under the United States from holding office under the State of Virginia; and the Senator might have cited similar precedents from other States; but this has nothing to do with the question. No one denies it, and the report assumes that the States have a right to legislate on this subject if they think proper.

"But [says the report] if any mischief has arisen or may arise from this source, the legitimate remedy must be sought and found in the legislation of the several States, whose constitutional duty it is to prescribe the privileges and immunities of their citizens, free from the control of Federal legislation."

But, sir, the subject is an exceedingly delicate one. I deny that any evil exists. But if it does, it had better be borne than to attempt its remedy by the means proposed. If I were conscious of some disease in the eye, however threatening might be its character, sooner than suffer it to be dealt with by an unskillful hand, I would take the chance of any result. This bill is one of the most dangerous assaults upon the integrity of our institutions I have ever known, and is well calculated, if it passes, totally to change them. It is highly mischievous in that by assumption, its tendency is erroneously to impress the public mind as to facts and principles. Now, I do not impute to the Senator from Kentucky, who framed the bill, any design to overthrow the institutions of his country. But I speak of the tendencies of the bill, and believe the state of mind under which it has been brought forward, is happily described in a short newspaper paragraph, which I will take the liberty of reading to the Senate:

"MR. CRITTENDEN'S BILL.—Parties, as well as individuals, are liable to monomania. They are apt to become insane upon particular points, and though a faction may never imagine itself to be a tea-kettle, or to have glass legs, it has been the case with persons who were specifically deranged, yet factions sometimes contrive to possess themselves of an idea which is scarcely less ridiculous. The universal Whig party of the United States is a curious instance of this. Having been continually defeated for a long series of years, under every variety of name and every assumption of principle that ingenuity could devise, they finally came to the conclusion that there must be some diablerie at work—that nothing less than a new element could possibly so often overthrow a body so rich in means, so able, and so remarkably clever. After long and close study which, like much philosophical investigation, overlooked obvious causes as too simple to produce great results, our opponents happened to think of "office-holders," and forthwith believed that they had reached the true reason of their vexatious failures. From that time to the present this compound word has been their resort on every occasion. When preparing for battle, they talk of office-holders, and when flying from the field in discomfiture, they still cry office-holders."

Now, sir, believing, as I do, and as I have had frequent occasion to remark, that if any one suffers from office-holders in elections it is the Administration party, I yet prefer submitting to the evil, such as it is, than to tamper with a subject so very delicate. I think the existing laws, if properly enforced, go far enough, and that an attempt to extend them further would threaten seriously constitutional liberty. I am for adopting the language of the English barons on a remarkable occasion, and hope the Senate will, with one voice, exclaim upon this subject, Nolumus Americanas leges mutare—We are unwilling to change the law of America.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE SENATE, February 16, 1839.

On the bill of Mr. CRITTENDEN to prevent the interference of certain Federal Officers in Elections.

MR. NORVELL said:

MR. PRESIDENT: Before I proceed to present my views of the bill now under consideration, I desire to perform an act of justice to my Whig friends on the other side of the Senate, and to a distinguished statesman of the Republican party, once a member of this body. It was the misfortune of that eminent statesman, in vindicating the removals and appointments made by President Jackson, to utter the sentiment that "to the victor belong the spoils." For that doctrine he has received the unqualified denunciations of the Opposition; and his party friends have shared an equal degree of condemnation for confirming, by their policy, the principle which he avowed. My purpose now is to show that Governor Marcy is not entitled to the credit of first proclaiming this as the rule of political warfare; that its origin is to be traced to a Whig source, and its example and practice to the Federal party of Massachusetts. In the second volume of the Life of Elbridge Gerry, written by James T. Austin, now the able Whig attorney general of that State, and the biographer of Mr. Gerry, I find these passages:

"Mr. Gerry entered upon the office of Governor of Massachusetts twenty-nine years ago. At that time, says his biographer, 'with the directors of political parties the long retirement of Mr. Gerry had given him no opportunity to become intimate. The changes which time had made in the members of the different departments of the Government, had left him almost without personal acquaintance with them; and the desire which his party had to place his name as a candidate at their head, had itself, if there had been no other reason, rendered his advance to the Chief Magistracy wholly independent of all conditions, stipulations, and expectancies. In his own political sentiments, matured as they were by time and experience, he was immovably confirmed; but in regard to individuals or parties, other than as they came recommended by character and conduct, he was impartial, unfettered, and independent. But, after all, what is the worth of a victory if the enemy are allowed to possess the spoils? Of what consequence is it who are masters of the field, so long as the vanquished retain their possessions? The battle between the great political parties had been fought at the ballot-boxes again and again, and constant defeat had embittered and exasperated the disappointed competitors. They beheld, for a long series of years, the honors and emoluments of office, the pride of place and the dignity of station, held by their political adversaries, until the reproach of being a Democrat was considered as impassable a barrier to public station as the want of moral character or intellectual ability.' 'The judicial department, the most stable and the most efficient in its operation, was, from the Chief Justice to the erior of the court, wholly in Federal hands. As a consequence of this the bar, with hardly sufficient exception to be noticed, added all the force of professional character to the Federal cause. The literature of the State, so far as it had official form, was under the same control. Colleges and learned societies seemed to have settled a sort of common law that the honors of science would be as inappropriately bestowed upon Democracy as the chef d'œuvre of taste upon the aborigines of the country.' It had been the policy of the Federalists to inspire the opinion, and it was probably their belief—for self-love is exceedingly credulous of praise—that in their ranks were all the talents, and all the learning, and all the moral character of the country; and as the Romans looked upon the rest of mankind as barbarians, so they were pleased to consider their fellow-citizens on the Democratic side as little better than the Goths and Vandals, in whose power had unfortunately fallen the heritage of the State."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] inquires from what book I have read these passages; and asks whether I do not know that Governor Gerry belonged to my party, and was turned out in one year? If the Senator had not been inattentive, he would have heard it distinctly announced that the book which I have just laid down was the biography of Elbridge Gerry, written by James T. Austin, the present attorney general of Massachusetts. It is the production of a modern Whig, sir, now in the enjoyment of "the spoils" of Federal victory. He it is, and not Governor Marcy, who first proclaimed "the spoils" doctrine, and demanded what was the value of a triumph if the vanquished were suffered "to retain their possessions?" He was describing the practice of the Federal party when in power, their proscription from office of every Democratic Republican, and their strict adherence to the principle, that "to the victor belong the spoils." Sir, I do know that Governor Gerry was of my party. He was not dismissed in one year. He was re-elected; he acted in a spirit of liberality and conciliation towards his opponents during his first term; he deviated from that course in his second.

In the history of parties in England, we have memorable examples of the secession of leaders from their early friends, and the formation of alliances with ancient political adversaries. A cordial union for the common object, the destruction of the existing administration, has always naturally followed. On such occasions, the necessity of breaking down all party names, in order to form a strong body in opposition, has generally been well understood, and urged with mutual ardor and vigor. Ulterior views, and the division of spoils between the new allies, have been postponed until the common enemy has been vanquished. Party spirit, the agitation of variant principles, as between the different members of the coalition, have been deprecated; and measures which might bring them into common concert have been devised, and supported with zeal, until the compact has been consolidated, and capable of moving on with perfect union and harmony.

A conjuncture of this sort is now before our eyes. We see secessions here, and in some of the States, from the great Republican party of the country. We see a coalition formed and forming in the midst of us, to subvert the present Republican Administration. We see party names extinguished, the agitation of discordant principles hushed into profound silence, the ulterior views of rival chieftains suppressed from public observation, and the division of the spoils deferred until the power of parceling them out shall have been completely attained. And, sir, I am much mistaken if the bill before us be not a measure devised to enable the dawning Whig and Conservative coalition to meet on common ground, and to prosecute the war against us without the danger of agitation and discord among the allied leaders of Opposition.

This Government, Mr. President, has been in operation fifty years. It has rarely transcended its limited powers. When it has gone beyond its constitutional boundaries, it has been brought back to its republican tack. It has not interfered with the right of suffrage, which belongs exclusively to the States. The elective franchise, the liberty of speech and of the press, have been left to their regulation. The General Government, except during the short reign of terror in the days of Federal phrensy, acting in the spirit of its chartered grant of power, has abstained from invading any of the reserved rights of the States. The abuses committed at elections by public officers, during the administration of the elder Adams, goaded Mr. Jefferson into the utterance of impressive animadversions upon their conduct. He admonished those of his appointment against the imitation of the example which had been set them. He warned them of the consequences which would result from the pursuit of such a course of interference in the State elections. The distinguished leaders of the Republican opposition to the administration of the younger Adams directed public attention to the corrupting influence of executive patronage, through the medium of officers of executive appointment, upon the elections of the country: President Jackson considered it his duty to denounce the practice of bringing the influence of executive patronage to bear upon the freedom and purity of the elective franchise. But, sir, did Mr. Jefferson ever contemplate the passage of a law to prohibit public officers from freely expressing their opinions upon all political questions, which they might think proper to discuss? Did he propose anything as a remedy for the evil, more than the exertion of a moral influence, the menace of Executive displeasure, to restrain the public officers from improper interference in elections? Did the report of the Senator from Missouri, the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the inaugural address of President Jackson, the report of the Senator from South Carolina, propose to check that interference by fines and perpetual disabilities?

Sir, in the most exasperated state of feeling against the outrages perpetrated by a few public officers at popular elections, it never entered the mind of a Republican statesman, till the present day, to pass penal and proscriptive laws for their prevention and punishment. It was reserved for these enlightened days, these times of Opposition purity, to suggest the extraordinary enactments proposed in the bill now before the Senate. The model for this measure, Mr. President, has been sought and discovered in British history. It has been drawn from the ancient code of omnipotent British parliamentary law. Principle for principle, word for word, letter for letter, the glorious model has been faithfully transcribed. Sir, there is no measure of proscription, there is no attack upon the freedom of individual opinion, there is no degree of punishment, which may not find its precedent in British history, in the reigns of the queens and kings in which the Senator from Kentucky has so industriously hunted up the prototype of his bill. If, says this bill, in effect, your public officer expresses an opinion, remove him from office. If he mingles with his fellow-citizens, and exercises his constitutional right to tell them what he thinks of men or measures, of this candidate or that candidate for their suffrages, fine him, and imprison him until he can pay the fine. If he advances an argument to his fellow-countrymen; if he persuades or dissuades him, cut off his head, sir; disable him from ever holding another public office. You will find precedents for all these things in British history, in the profligate reigns of male tyrants, and of female tyrants, too, in the fast-anchored isle.

Sir, what is the mischief of which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] complains; and what the remedy which his bill suggests for that mischief? The evil is "the interference of certain Federal officers in elections." Well, sir, I unreservedly admit that partial abuses have been committed in this way. I admit that partial evils spring from this source. But in this, as in the other affairs of human life, "all partial evil is universal good." As a matter of propriety and decorum, from feelings of self-respect and respect to public opinion, as representatives of the character and dignity of their Government, your public officers are morally bound to speak and to act, at all times, with decorum and due regard to their fellow-citizens. They are bound to abstain from noise and brawling in political contests. Some of them may occasionally fail in these proper observances. When they do so fail, the correction of the evil is found in public opinion. That invariably condemns them. That counteracts, with effect, the transgressions of the public officer. That excites to greater vigilance, to more zeal, to still more animated exertions, the citizen who witnesses and disapproves of any such misconduct. In the increased ardor of the contest, in the stronger excitement of opposition, the people find the appropriate remedy for the evil, and the ballot-box vindicates their rights, as well as public decency, from any outrage which may have been perpetrated upon them. Besides, sir, the office-holder may be safely left to the office-seeker in the conflict of elections. He who is in pursuit of a favorite object exerts more energy for its attainment than its possessor does to retain it. This is a universal principle of human nature. The Senator from Kentucky is mistaken in supposing that the office-seekers are on the same side with the office-holders. To a partial extent, his position on this point is true; but the great mass of aspirants for office, of those who are active in its pursuit, are in the opposition.

The Senator must remember the outcry with which these walls resounded during the whole administration of General Jackson, against the removals and appointments made by that Administration. That outcry, sir, was echoed and re-echoed from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The removals were declared to be offensive to public purity, to the patriotism and justice of the country, and to the spirit of the Constitution. The "victims" of this policy, as they were feelingly described, excited the warmest sympathies of Senators over the way. They were treated as martyrs to their principles and independence, and received with open arms into the ranks of the Opposition. The removals were denounced as all wrong! The incumbents were entitled to a life estate in their places, unless they had failed in the fulfillment of their official duties. Such, then, was the Whig doctrine. The principle that "to the victors belong the spoils," was pronounced to be odious in the sight of God and man. Every term of obloquy was heaped upon the new appointments. The maledictions of the pure disciples of political Whig religion were poured forth upon every new man brought into office by General Jackson. The great power of this body was frequently invoked to veto the presidential nominations. Well, sir, a stranger in this republican land might suppose, from these facts and from the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, that no office-seekers were to be found among the Opposition; that its members were too pure to seek or accept of station; that not a patriot among them would deign to take an office from which any friend of the Administration had been removed for political cause. Mr. President, two years ago the little State of Rhode Island, one year since the State of Connecticut, three short months past the Empire State of New York, fell into the hands of the political friends of Senators over the way. And what was the immediate result? Sir, in Rhode Island and Connecticut the Republican incumbents were swept by hundreds from office, for political reasons alone. Was there any difficulty in finding pure and patriotic Whigs to supply their places? No, sir; the only difficulty produced by the emergency was in making selections among the crowds of hungry vultures, anxious to fatten upon the public crib. The atrocious injustice, the cruel tyranny, of removals from office, the suffering wives and children, the starving families, of the dismissed officers, were forgotten as things of by-gone days. Memory was bathed in the waters of Lethe, and no longer remembered what had been said and sung prior to the halcyon days of Federal triumph.

In New York, whose able Republican son had been stigmatized as the proclaimer of the "spoils" doctrine, towards whom no epithet of Federal reprobation was too strong for daily utterance, the first days of the Whig saturnalia have been celebrated by the proscription of some of the best public officers ever confided in by the people of that or any other Commonwealth. Sir, her accomplished Secretary of State, the able Comptroller of her financial interests, not less remarkable for his stern integrity and firmness than for his solid talents, the Treasurer, the Attorney General, known here as a man of great ability, and all others that could be stricken down, have been swept from the board; and no virgin timidity, no coy reluctance, no holy horror of removals for political cause, no contempt for the spoils of victory, have presented any obstacle to the elevation of patriotic and office-hating Whigs to the places vacated by these removals. Indeed, sir, the public journals tell us that a multitude of candidates were brought forward, and prepared to fill each and all of the stations. Mr. President, I think that, by this time, the Senator from Kentucky must be willing to admit that the office-seekers are not all on the side of the Administration, and that every opposition to every administration is filled with them. They are ten times more numerous than the office-holders; and they are generally more than a match at elections for the incumbents of public place. These two classes are antagonist interests, and may be relied on to counteract the improper efforts and practices of each other. Between them, the mass of an aspiring people, the public liberty and rights, are in very little danger from either.

The remedy for the evils which I have shown not to be very great, and susceptible of counteraction without the aid of penal laws, is very partially provided in the bill of the honorable Senator. "To the end," says the bill, "that the great powers given to the officers of the Federal Government, and other persons employed in its service, may not be used for the influencing of elections, which ought to be free and incorrupt," marshals, postmasters, land officers, public engineers, custom-house officers, and others connected with these branches of the public service, are prohibited from persuading or dissuading any elector to give his vote at any election, State or Federal. They are prohibited from intermeddling or attempting to influence any of these elections; and for a violation of this enactment, the offending officer is subjected to a fine of $500, and disabled from ever after bearing or executing any office or place of trust whatever under the United States. For the better encouragement of political informers, one half of the fine is to be paid as a reward for the discoveries and disclosures of that honorable description of spies upon the words and actions of their fellow-citizens. Shocking, sir, as this bill is to all my republican notions, of the equal rights of all classes of the American people, there is one thing about it which still more palpably indicates its avowed British origin. With regard to the Secretaries of Departments, the Attorney General, the district attorneys, the publishers of the laws, to say nothing of the members of this House and the other, the very public men who possess the greatest powers, and can exercise the most effective influence over the elections, State and Federal, are exempted from the operation, prohibitions, and penalties of this bill. Our elections may be neither free nor incorrupt from their influence, their persuasions or dissuasions, whether they be sent forth from these Halls in partisan speeches, or directed and brought to bear upon the people from the hundred batteries of the official press throughout the States. Precisely similar was the British statute from which this is taken. The Ministers of State, the Lords and Commons, the law officers of the Crown, might exert all their powers of influence at elections. They might, through their friends, spend thousands, and tens of thousands, to influence and control elections. No fine, no penalty, no disability, could be imposed upon them. They were too high to be reached even by the legislation of an omnipotent British Parliament. These invidious distinctions between the high and the humble, the exemption of the aristocratic few, and the punishment of the mass, who hold and enjoy office and place, may have well comported with the spirit of the British Government, but would not be tolerated in this country, if it were possible to suppose that this bill could ever become a law of the land. Our marshals, postmasters, and collectors, are equal in intelligence, and, I trust, in spirit, too, to those who occupy the highest stations of this Government. And, sir, they will be more wanting in manly feeling, less faithful to themselves than I think they are if they do not bear in perpetual remembrance the authors and supporters of this bill. They will, I trust, "nobly act what they nobly think."

But, sir, you have no power to pass the bill. No part of the Federal Constitution confers upon you any authority to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the elective franchise in the States. You have no right to prescribe the qualifications or conditions upon which any man may vote, either for President or Vice President, either for a member of Congress or a member of a State Legislature. It belongs to the States alone to prescribe the qualifications of voters. The Federal Constitution declares that the House of Representatives of the United States shall be chosen by the electors in each State qualified as electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; that the Senate shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the several States; that the President and Vice President shall be chosen by electors appointed in each State, as its Legislature may direct; and that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, not of the voters, but of its own members. Congress is carefully excluded from all legislation as to the qualifications of electors of both the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government. Congress can abridge neither the freedom of speech nor of the press. Your officers, in accepting appointments, do not cease to be citizens; they surrender none of their freedom of speech; they can be restrained only by that sense of propriety and decorum which every gentleman ought to feel, especially when both his own respectability and the character of his Government may be affected by his conduct. A law of Congress, prohibiting a public officer from debating political questions with his fellow-citizens, punishing him with fines and eternal disabilities for persuading or dissuading them in regard to their votes at elections, would far transcend the seditious law in the enormity of its transgression of the constitutional rights and liberties of the people. The seditious law simply provided for the punishment of slander and seditious publications. This bill enacts the punishment of innocent and laudable opinions expressed by the citizen, if he happens to be a public officer. Sir, no honorable man would accept appointment if this bill should become a law. No man of character, no freeman possessed of the spirit of "the noblest work of God" would deign to serve you in a public capacity with the terrors of this shocking bill of pains and penalties hanging over him. Your offices would fall into ignoble, degraded, and worthless hands. The man who would consent to serve you at the sacrifice of the most precious of his natural and constitutional rights, would merit the scorn and contempt of his fellow-citizens; they would shun and despise him;

"And put in every honest hand a whip,
To lash the rascal naked through the world."

Sir, that merit, those qualities and talents, which entitle the citizen to confidence and public station, are by this bill menaced with proscription and disability, if their possessor shall dare to exercise the liberty of speech common to the humblest and most elevated member of society, and secured to all by a special provision in the Federal Constitution. A brand, sir, is fixed upon merit and ability. This bill divests several classes of public officers of all right to use the least freedom of speech in relation to great questions in which their own interests are as deeply involved as those of any of their fellow-citizens. Your postmasters and marshals, your collectors and land officers, are degraded, insulted, and menaced with the loss of caste in society. Sir, whence do you derive your power to invade the exclusive prerogative of the States, under the pretext of protecting the purity of their elections? Have they demanded your interposition? Have they failed in their duty to themselves? And if they had desired your interference; if they had omitted to protect the purity of the elective franchise, they would have no right to call upon you for the exercise of the extraordinary powers assumed in this bill, except through the medium of an amendment to the Constitution. Are you wiser, more virtuous, more pure, than your predecessors for fifty years past? Are you more enlightened? Have you a higher sense of virtue and patriotism than the illustrious framers of the Federal Charter, under which you occupy stations in this dignified assembly? Sir, we seem like children wanting some amusement for the occupation of our time and minds; and, in the absence of other employment, we have turned upon the parent States, to whom we owe our existence, the very breath of our lives in this body, to tear from them their peculiar, exclusive, and sacred guardianship over the elective franchise, the liberty of speech, and of the press.

But the Senator from Kentucky seems to justify the bill, on the ground that a distinction exists between the public officers and the citizens, and that the citizen possesses rights which ought not to belong to the officer. Sir, this argument is not only a fallacy, but is based upon an assumption not founded in fact. In accepting office, no man ceases to be a citizen. The possession of office neither weakens his intellectual faculties, his ability to discharge his social and political duties, nor does it take from him his equal rights and liberties as a citizen, under the constitution. Sir, under the pretense of preserving the purity of elections, this bill is a palpable attack upon the freedom of sentiment and opinion. Does the Constitution, in broadly and unqualifiedly prohibiting Congress from abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, confer upon Congress a power to punish twenty or thirty thousand of your most intelligent and honorable fellow-citizens for the exercise of that freedom? Does it give you any authority to send your informers into the domestic sanctuary, there to discover and report, for proscription and punishment, what a postmaster or collector may say to persuade or dissuade his neighbor or his son, with regard to his vote at a pending election?

The honorable Senator from Kentucky complains of the asperity and vindictiveness of the report of the Judiciary Committee on this bill, and thinks it extraordinary that it should be treated as a measure of Oriental despotism. He represents the bill as a very innocent and harmless affair, only prohibiting your public officers from persuading or dissuading their fellow-citizens in relation to their votes at elections, and rendering them answerable to the courts of justice for the commission of the offense of speaking on politics, so terrible to all good Whig patriots, and yet so common to all men, and to all parties, in this nation! Sir, the measure is the very essence of despotism over individual opinion, and is the worse for the reason that it inflicts a disgraceful punishment upon one class of citizens, for doing what all have a right to do, under the constitutions of the States and of the United States. For the expression of a judgment in favor of one candidate or against another, at an election, one description of public officers is fined and rendered forever incapable of holding any office, while others may say what they please, may persuade or dissuade any of their fellow-citizens with entire impunity, at all elections, and at all times.

But you, Mr. President, it seems, are restrained from voting in this body, except in the case of an equal division of its members; and, therefore, some of your rights have been taken from you; and, therefore, those of other public officers may be annihilated! Sir, is it possible that human ingenuity could so have tortured itself as to discover any analogy between your case and this bill? Does the Constitution make you a Senator? Does it confer upon you a right to mingle in debate, to speak and vote, in common with Senators? As well might the honorable Senator have illustrated his principle by alluding to the exclusion of the crowds who daily throng these galleries from the right of debating and voting in this Hall. No, sir; what you do here, what you are prohibited from doing here, flows from the Constitution of the land. But are you restrained, as this bill restrains other public officers, from freely discussing any election, from persuading or dissuading your fellow-citizens in your dwelling, upon the hustings at the polls? Is there one word in the Constitution, is there a word to be found in the law of nature or the law of God to punish any citizen, whether an officer or a private individual, for uttering his opinions of candidates selected to represent the interests of all, his own, as well as those of his country?

But collectors cannot be merchants; receivers cannot purchase public lands; marshals cannot buy property sold by them under execution. This, says the honorable Senator, proves that you may put restraints upon your public officers. Now, sir, if this were the fact, these restraints would have altogether a pecuniary character, and they would be designed to secure the fair and impartial execution of the official duties of the officer. They would not affect his opinions, his free soul, his right to speak, to utter his thoughts, to commune with his fellow-citizens. The collector could still purchase goods for himself and his family; the receiver could buy lands from his neighbor; the marshal could purchase property anywhere but at the sales where he officiates as the ministerial officer of justice.

But if these officers do not like the penalties of this bill, let them resign! Sir, this argument of the Senator reminds me of a similar observation made in the British House of Commons. Jack Fuller, alluding to the complaints made by the people against the measures of Parliament and the Ministry, exclaimed, in debate, without as much patriotism as piety, "Those who don't like England, damn them, let them leave it!" Sir, I beg pardon; it is not my oath—I never swear. The honorable Senator is equally patriotic. He tells the public officer whose feelings are outraged, whose spirit is attempted to be subdued and broken down by this bill, that if he does not like office upon these tyrannical and proscriptive terms, let him leave it! Yes, sir; let honest, high-minded, spirited men, who scorn your degrading penalties upon thought and speech, give up their offices, and let them be filled by the base, the abandoned, the degraded outcasts of society. Let your bill drive the independent and honorable citizen from public station, and bring in the starving slave, who would sell his liberty of speech and his soul for the crumbs which fall from the public Treasury.

I cannot follow the honorable Senator through all his inappropriate and fanciful illustrations. Not one of them appeared to me to be applicable to the bill before the Senate. But, sir, he spoke of the Jacobinical doctrines of the report of my able friend from New Jersey. This, Mr. President, was an unfortunate epithet. I, sir, am not very old; but I am old enough to remember the language applied by the supporters of the alien and seditious laws to Mr. Jefferson and the other friends of liberty, who nobly resisted those tributary measures which distinguished that darkest period of our political history. They were denounced a levelers, anarchists, and Jacobins. My honorable friend from New Jersey may well feel proud of the same sort of denunciation from congenial sources. The bill before us is of a kindred nature with the seditious law. The report against it will descend to posterity with no Jacobinical taint upon it. It is a sound, able, Republican vindication of the equal political rights of the American people, whether they be in the walks of private life, or clothed with the honors of public office.

But, says the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the bill does not prohibit the public officer from voting. It does worse, sir. It requires him, if he votes at all, to creep to the polls like a guilty culprit, deposit his vote in the ballot-box, and return home, silent as the grave. He must not commune with his fellow-citizens. He must not assign to him his reasons for voting. He must truly act the part of a "mute," and not dare to open his lips to his friend or neighbor, lest he may be suspected of persuading or dissuading him. He must shrink from the manly bearing which nature and nature's God have stamped upon him, or suffer the pains and penalties, the fines and disabilities of this precious Whig bill. Sir, the Senator from Kentucky might as well have perfected the copy of his British model, by a clause forbidding the public officer to vote.

If, Mr. President, this interference of public officers in elections be so pernicious, so odious, in the eyes of gentlemen, how does it happen that Kentucky has passed no law to punish the executive officers of that State for persuading or dissuading others with regard to their votes? Why is it that no State in the Union has done so? The obsolete statute of New Jersey, cited by the honorable Senator, applies only to the candidates at elections. It does not apply to the officers generally of the State. It is well that it does not. If I comprehend the history of the late election in New Jersey, some of the officers, whose very fate depended on the result, not only intermeddled in the elections, but suppressed the votes of townships, in order to change that result from what it would have been, if the law, the duty of these officers, and common fairness and decency had been observed.

The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives] the other day brought up his columns to the support of his friend from Kentucky. He performed various evolutions, moved down upon the positions of the Senator from New Jersey with all the force which he could bring to bear upon them, and closed his operations by an abandonment of the ground occupied by his ally! The resolutions of the Senator were a sorry stratagem to extricate his new political associates from the difficulty in which the bill had placed them. I trust, sir, that this Senate will not allow them to avail themselves of that stratagem, but will require them to stand or fall upon their own chosen ground.

The Senator considers this subject to be one of great importance to the liberties and destiny of this country. In his imagination, the report of my friend from New Jersey, is evidence that the madness of party is conducting us to the precipice of a despotism equal to that of the Stuarts in England, or the purpled tyrants of imperial Rome. He looks upon the report as a creed and doctrine fatal to public liberty; and his fancy already bodies forth some American Caesar, clothed in imperial robes, crowned with the glittering diadem of royalty, and trampling down the freedom of the nation. Sir, language of this kind, on an occasion affording so little pretext for it, indicates a feverish state of feeling, which has driven the judgment of the honorable Senator from its moorings, but which may readily be explained by the peculiar circumstances in which he has been placed by a change of political position.

I concur with him in the importance of this proposition. It does, sir, strike at the liberties of a large portion of your most enlightened and most honored citizens. It does demonstrate the madness of party. It does prove that even in this sacred Hall, consecrated to equal and just legislation, an odious despotism over the right to speak and to act can be entertained. It does exhibit a disposition here to imitate the invidious and despotic legislation of the British Parliament. But, sir, I trust that a majority of this body will always be found prepared to resist all such propositions, and that they will permit no demagogue to drag the Senate into such palpable infractions of the Constitution. The honorable Senator complains that the report not only justifies the officers of Government in the exercise of the common right which belongs to every citizen, but incites them to intermeddle in elections. Sir, the report properly incites them to assert and vindicate their equal rights, attempted to be violated by this bill; and they would be unworthy of the character of American citizens, if they did not maintain those rights with manly firmness.

The Senator professes to be uninformed of the extent to which modern Democracy admits of an infusion of Federalism into it. My friend from New Jersey is quite able to defend himself from these insinuations. But I will tell the honorable Senator that his Democracy, his Republicanism, appears to have received a sufficient infusion of Conservatism to spoil its former purity; that, indeed, it has been merged in the modern Federalism with which the Conservatism of associated wealth so naturally amalgamates.

Sir, the honorable Senator alleges that the bill before you is of little importance; that the report upon it presents the true issue to the Senate. I do not wonder that gentlemen are anxious to divert public attention from this bill of pains and penalties. It cannot bear the touchstone of public sentiment; but no artifice can be permitted to change the issue from the bill to the report. The bill, sir, is the thing upon which the Senate has to give its vote, and the people to pronounce their judgment. The report will take care of itself. It is but a fair, forcible, and triumphant commentary on the bill, and will prove an extinguisher to it.

The Senator declares that the language of the report, inciting the people to a resistance of the provisions of this bill, is rank radicalism. Sir, radicalism has always been charged upon all oppositions to tyranny, to bank monopolies, and to all other aristocratic tendencies; and if hostility, if resistance, to this unjust and arbitrary bill, be radicalism, the whole mass of the people will, I trust, entitle themselves to the name of radicals.

The honorable Senator has imbibed, from his new position, fresh terrors of Executive patronage and of the Executive veto. He tells us that no King of England, for one hundred years, has dared to veto an act of Parliament; that if he had done so, a storm of public indignation would have swept him from his throne. It is easy, sir, to understand the present drift of the honorable Senator. That gentleman sustained General Jackson in his administration throughout. He has frequently, since he left his friend, called into requisition the example and authority of that illustrious patriot against the measures proposed on this side of the Senate. He supported the resolution expunging a previous vote of the Senate against General Jackson. No whisper of disapprobation was breathed by him in this Senate in relation to the Executive veto upon the bank and distribution bills.

Sir, the Senator has gained new light from new associations; and, after the alleged mischief has been done by the exercise of the executive veto; after he has participated in sustaining that veto, the honorable gentleman is now exerting himself to raise that storm of public indignation, which, he hopes, will sweep the Republican party, with whom he once professed it to be his pride to act, from their ascendancy in the councils of the nation. Sir, I regret to say, that our political history has furnished too many examples for the imitation of the Senator. He has too easily yielded to them. But I will tell him, for his consolation, that few Republican leaders who have gone over to the enemy have survived their desertion with reputation; few have acquired the honors, fewer still the confidence, of the Republican party of the country. Unless he retrace his steps, the Senator will have to look elsewhere for confidence; he will have to rely upon other suffrages for the gratification of his ambition.

The Senator, if I understood him, committed a great mistake in his speech of Tuesday. He seemed to suppose that the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions were mainly directed against the increase of executive patronage. Sir, they were mainly intended to check the assumption of legislative power, in derogation of the rights of the States, by the Congress of the United States. The increase of executive patronage was condemned as the inevitable result of that unconstitutional legislation. The honorable Senator, I fear, is a worse interpreter of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions than my friend from New Jersey, with all the imputed infusion of ancient Federalism into his Democracy. He is now fighting the battles of republican liberty. The Senator has gone over to Philip and his Macedonian phalanx.

Mr. President, I protest against the effort of the Senator to identify the cause of banks and bank monopolies with the State governments. It is true, that the States have been by degrees entrapped into excesses upon this subject. They have been caught in the toils of associated wealth. But many of them have seen their error, and are retracing their steps. The free banking system, either by its success or its failure, will, I hope, extricate State legislation from the pernicious influence which has been too long exercised over it by the banking power.

But the Senator asks, do not the State laws prohibit State officers from holding Federal appointments? Does not the Federal Constitution prohibit certain officers from being elected to seats in this or the other branch of Congress? And are not these disqualifications? Sir, I am surprised that an argument so inapplicable to the enactments of this bill should have been advanced by any Senator on this floor. The Federal Constitution, the State laws, do prohibit, as they ought to prohibit, the same individual from holding incompatible offices. They do not punish him for speaking or acting at elections.

The honorable Senator from Virginia charges a high officer of the Government with the avowal of the principle that, in making appointments, he selects his political friends alone. No Administration could be successfully conducted without a general adherence to this principle. He accuses another high officer of interfering in an election in South Carolina. Sir, what are the facts? I am informed that the friends of a candidate for Congress in that State [Mr. LEGARE] attempted to influence votes in his favor by representing the Secretary of War to be his friend. A gentleman addressed a letter to the Secretary on the subject, and inquired whether the candidate in question was a supporter of the Administration? The answer was, that Mr. Poinsett did not regard him as such. Now, sir, while the name of the Secretary could be clandestinely used on the side of the Conservative candidate, it was all right and proper; but the moment that the Secretary of War was forced into the declaration that he did not regard the gentleman as a friend of the Administration, then the honorable Senator sees in the conduct of that high officer an interference in elections dangerous to public liberty!

The honorable Senator from Virginia has renounced the principles of Democracy. He said, in his speech last evening, that he was not a Democratic Republican; that he did not belong to the Democracy of the country. Sir, I thank him for making the avowal. He has thrown off the mask; he is not of the people; he is against being governed by the people. We shall now understand him; he has changed sides; he has appropriately placed himself in the society of those gentlemen so far advanced in life that they disclaim the knavery of Democracy. The Senator declares that Democratic Republicanism does not belong to the soil of Virginia. Sir, I think I have a right to pronounce the allegation a libel upon her character. Democratic principles, the binding authority of the people, the doctrine of the equal and inalienable rights of the people, subsist nowhere in greater force than in Virginia. Sir, the Senator has retrograded behind the spirit and principles of the age. Democracy, radical Democracy, as near an approach as possible to the enforcement of the popular will, is the spreading light of the times. It is a principle dear to every true Republican.

Sir, permit me, in the language of a late eloquent writer, to say to the Senator that this principle "lies at the foundation of all our institutions." The party must become truly Democratic. "It must go for the whole people; against all monopolies; against all exclusive privileges; against all aristocratic measures; in favor of mild and equal laws; in favor of equal rights, of education, literature, arts, and philosophy. It must plant itself upon the essential equality of man; upon the fact that there is something divine in every man. It must be ever on the side of freedom; sympathize with the oppressed, with all who are struggling for their rights. It must be high toned and moral; confiding in the people, and still more in the immortal vigor of truth and justice." Sir, the man who renounces these principles may well declare that he does not belong to the Democracy of the country. "Parties, merely as parties," says the same profound writer, "are nothing to the masses. Individuals, as individuals, are nothing to them. A Clay, a Webster, a Van Buren, a Calhoun, are nothing to them, any further than they are impersonations of great principles. Show them that this or that man embodies in himself the cause of millions; that in raising him to office the cause of the million is secured, and then, as the representative of that cause, does he become of importance." And let me add, sir, in the prophetic spirit of the same author, that if the present Chief Magistrate "fail in his Administration, it will be because he may fail to identify himself with the popular cause. Let him be really and truly the representative of that cause, and no power on earth can prevent his reelection." The party, sir, can spare the man who disavows the principles of Democracy, as here delineated.

The honorable Senator has frequently expressed his admiration of Edmund Burke. He is not only his admirer, but his imitator. He proudly disdains to answer certain Senators on this floor. Who gave him a right to place himself above any gentleman sent here by a sovereign State? Such an assumption of disdain of his equals, on an occasion of deserting his friends, and disavowing what they supposed to be his Democratic principles, illustrates the temper and political character of the Senator, who has closely followed his great model in these respects. Upon Burke's defection from the English Whigs, Cooke remarks that,

"Although a Whig from political connection, from a concurrence of views upon certain great questions, and from a disapproval of the Tories, he was, nevertheless, never in his heart a friend to popular Government. With the most extended views of philanthropy, he hated the people. His philosophic mind shrank from a contact with the vulgar. To him nothing was so disgusting. He would labor for the advantage of the crowd, but he must be allowed to dispense his blessings from above. So genuine an aristocrat in heart was with great difficulty kept within the pale of Democracy."

Gentlemen may run out the parallel.

The honorable Senator passes a glowing eulogy upon England and English institutions, and declares that we have derived from that glorious country, and her magna charta and bills of rights, all that is valuable in our institutions. Sir, when I heard this extravagant encomium pronounced upon the British institutions and the British Government, I was prepared to expect any change on his part. I could not be surprised at his renunciation last night of the principles of Democracy. That I may not be accused of misapprehending the Senator on this subject, I beg leave to read

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Interference in Elections—Mr. Roane.

SENATE.

the version of his remarks given by his friend in the Baltimore Patriot. Baltimore Opposition journals have, of late, become good authority with the honorable Senator. The reporter says:

"Mr. Wall, with the genuine spirit of a demagogue, had sneered at the legislation of England affording a precedent for this bill, and said, 'such a plant may be indigenous in such a soil.' Mr. Rives noticed this remark, and repelled the sneer and the argument in one of the most glowing, impassioned, and effective passages I ever listened to. 'What soil,' he exclaimed, 'the English soil, the Anglo-Saxon soil? In what soil would we expect to find such a plant indigenous? In what soil has the tree of liberty flourished more than in England? Is it not the land of our glorious ancestors, whence they brought the most valued principles of our Constitution, their love of liberty, and hatred of tyranny and defiance of oppressors, and, above all, that sturdy spirit, which, if now revived, would be the salvation of our present institutions? Whence did your fathers imbibe the principles of the Declaration of Independence, of our bills of rights, and of the great charter of our liberties? Whence but from England? Is that land to be thus dishonored?'"

Sir, the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] was even more extravagant than this in his rapturous plaudits upon the British constitution. He distinctly intimated that liberty was not a native of our soil. We brought it with us from England. It was written in our hearts by our illustrious Anglo-Saxon ancestors. Their institutions, says the honorable Senator, constitute the most magnificent fabric of liberty ever erected under the wide circle of the sun. This oriental language of admiration is not original with the Senator. It was uttered fifty years ago by the father of ultra-Federalism. In his treatise upon the American constitutions, he pronounced the British constitution to be "the most stupendous fabric of human invention." These gentlemen are taking us back to the days of Adams and Hamilton, when admiration of Great Britain was the predominant feeling of their party. They disparage our people and our institutions. We are not indebted to England for our liberty. That tree is indigenous to every soil. It springs up spontaneously in the heart of every man. Liberty is the gift of God to every human being. We are indebted to ourselves, and to our own intrepid revolutionary ancestors, for the freedom we enjoy, and the Democratic institutions which secure that liberty. The sword won those glorious trophies against all the valor and all the insolence of British mercenaries, British tyranny, and British oppression.

Sir, the author of the "History of Party in England" has this passage in reference to the coalition between Mr. Fox and Lord North. I recommend it to the attention of the honorable Senator from Virginia.

"The occurrence of this coalition [says Cooke] is greatly to be deplored, as an example to men who, without any of the power, may nevertheless feel inclined to imitate the errors of Fox. It is to be deplored as a blot upon the character of a great man, as a precedent which strikes at the foundation of political morality, and as a weapon in the hand of those who would destroy all confidence in the honesty of public men."

Mr. President, let me console the honorable Senator in his new position, which he has sufficiently defined to render it quite intelligible, with a quotation from the defense made for himself by Mr. Fox:

"If [said that statesman] men of honor can meet on points of general national concern, I see no reason for calling such a meeting an unnatural junction. It is neither wise nor noble to keep up animosities forever. It is neither just nor condid to keep up animosity when the cause of it is no more. It is not my nature to bear malice, or to live in ill-will. My friendships are perpetual; my enmities are not."

The honorable Senator has sufficiently demonstrated that his enmities are not perpetual. Whether his friendships are so, I leave to the decision of those who have so long and so painfully listened to his denunciations of the measures of his former party friends, witnessed his gradual change of principle in important respects, and seen his adoption of the very language of the Opposition in relation to the exercise of the Executive veto by President Jackson.

Sir, the animation and perseverance of the Senator in his hostility to his early friends are worthy of a better cause. The Senator from New York, two days ago, called up his bill to protect the public moneys in the hands of receiving and disbursing officers. In the face of the prophetic declaration of the Senator from Pennsylvania, assented to by the Senator from Massachusetts, that another bank explosion must soon take place, the gentleman, quick as thought, rose in his place, and offered a substitute to the bill, requiring the public money to be deposited in banks. The second failure of the Mobile Branch Bank, with more than half a million of the funds of the Government in its custody, is disregarded by the Senator, and he seems determined again to place us at the mercy of banks.

The Senator tells us that he has not changed his principles, nor deserted his party. They have abandoned their principles. He stands where he has always stood. Sir, how often have you and I heard excuses of this sort urged in justification of apostasy? Why, sir, the Senator has become the leader of the party on the other side of the Senate. He has put himself into the front ranks of the Opposition. He is their child and their champion. But he denies that he has entered into any coalition with them. I know not that he has made written stipulations with them, but we must judge the tree by its fruit; his bears that only which is palatable to them.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] alleges that the principle of this bill is "to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections," and that the report of the committee ought to have recommended a bill to enforce that principle. Sir, all this sophistry to blind the people to the real character of the bill can be of no avail. The principle of the bill is to deter certain public officers from speaking, writing, or publishing their sentiments on any subject having a bearing upon elections, under the penalty of $500 fine, and perpetual disability to hold any place or station under this Government. The character of the bill is that of an invidious, odious, unconstitutional prohibition of thousands of the freemen of this nation from the exercise of those rights which belong to all our citizens. The bill is a direct attack upon the free and independent exercise of the elective franchise.

The Senator repeats a trite remark, that the young man who is not a Democrat is a fool, and that the old man who is a Democrat is a knave. Well, sir, the honorable Senator is neither young nor old. What, then, is he in politics? I should like to hear him define his position.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky closed his remarks by an appeal to the patriotism and pride of this body. He implored us to sanction this bill, that it might stand among the recorded honors of the Senate, as a monument to its wisdom and virtue, in all time to come. He desired that this Hall might become the honored place where this great sacrifice should be made. Mr. President, this Senate is composed of the ambassadors of the several States, specially sent here as the guardians of their reserved rights and sovereignty. If they were to sanction this bill, they would be faithless to their trust; they would authorize the infraction of the exclusive powers of the States, the liberties of the people, and the independence of the citizen. They would, indeed, render this Hall the dishonored place, where that monstrous sacrifice would be made. And the extinction of individual freedom, the obliteration of the traces of State sovereignty, and the humiliation of the character of this Senate, would constitute a monument of its contempt for the Constitution of its country, and of its degrading subserviency to the domineering will of a party minority, in all ages to come.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. ROANE, OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 15, 1839,

On the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers with elections.

Mr. ROANE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I desire to address the Senate this evening. I have purposely left my own seat, come round to this side of the Chamber, and occupied the vacant chair of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] now absent, in order to be near my friend from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] whom I wished to persuade to yield to me his just title to the floor. He had, on one or two previous occasions, yielded it to others; and but for peculiar circumstances, I would not have now appealed to his liberality. I most sincerely thank him for generously yielding to the peculiar considerations I have presented to him. I am aware, sir, that at this late hour of the evening—[Here propositions were made to adjourn, if Mr. ROANE desired it.] He said no; he hoped that the Senate would not adjourn, but would permit him to proceed this evening. Yes, sir, this 15th day of February, of all the days in the year, is that on which I desire to be heard. This day emancipates me from those considerations of delicacy which, for some time past, have restrained me from saying what I now consider myself free to say, however painful it may be to say it.

Mr. President, a stern sense of that duty which I owe to myself, to those who sent me here, and to those with whom I am here associated in political feelings and principles so congenial to my own, will not permit me longer to maintain that silence which, at all times, I so anxiously desire to observe in this august assembly. My situation here has been, for a long time past, one of pain and delicacy: of pain, because, on the great momentous questions of national policy which have been agitated in this Chamber from the first moment I took my seat in it, I have been constrained, by every dictate of my judgment, every feeling of my heart, and every consideration of patriotism to differ totally from my colleague, with whom I had so fondly and sanguinely, and, I think, justly expected to cooperate on all national, political, and party questions. Finding, to my pain and sorrow, that such cooperation has not existed, I have heretofore, for reasons which will be obvious to the Senate, to the country, and to my colleague, contented myself with giving a silent vote. Those reasons no longer exist. That delicacy, growing out of the peculiar relation which my colleague has for some time past borne towards our mutual constituents, has been this day removed by the action of the General Assembly of Virginia; and I feel that malignity itself cannot now charge me with an effort to intermeddle in that relation.

Besides, sir, my colleague has but very recently fully "defined his position." The course which he has recently hastened to take, the time which he has selected, and the zeal, to say nothing of the temper, which he has manifested in defining his position, would render a longer silence on my part obnoxious to the suspicion that I assented to his views, or was incompetent or afraid to utter a dissent. Sir, I differ from him as wide as the poles; and, in expressing that dissent, I take leave, in his own strong language, to say that I too am an "unterrified Senator of the unterrified Commonwealth of Virginia;" and mean this evening, with the blessing of God, to "define my position" in characters which "he that runs may read." There shall be no doubt about it; no equivocation, no mental reservation, no non-committalism, shall, with my consent, obscure it. I define it, sir, not because I believe that a human being who knows me well can doubt it, but because those who never knew me, and those who are to come after me, when adverting to this memorable chapter in our national history, in which it has been my destiny to bear a part, might, peradventure, draw improper inferences from my total silence. I do not object, sir, to the time my colleague has selected to define his position. The General Assembly of Virginia, my immediate constituents, and whose servant I am, are now in session, and watching with a scrutinizing eye our deliberations in this Chamber. To that Legislature—to a Whig Legislature, as it has been reputed to be—I boldly define my position.

In these days, when novelty and change are all the rage, I can have no hope that the definition I shall give can carry with it the pleasure which that given by my colleague will convey to those for whom it was intended. Of this I am certain, that it will lack one of the best ingredients of every pleasure—surprise. I dare say that my position will be found to be the same plain, old-fashioned, and, I would fain believe, straightforward one which I have held from the first moment that I entered into the service of the people. I have no highland fling to throw off, no ground and lofty tumbling with which to amuse, and no brilliant somersault with which to delight and astonish any person. Mr. President, if I should speak less of the bill which is the immediate subject of deliberation for the Senate, than of other matters, I find my apology and excuse in the many examples which have been set me in this Chamber, and in the comity invariably extended by the Senate to its members. With this introduction, and with a view that I should not seem to have been inattentive to the important, the vital bill now on your table, I beg leave to make a few remarks in regard to it.

Sir, I agree with my colleague in regard to that bill, only so far as he represents it to be one of great and of pervading importance. None could be more so. I might well leave the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, which has, in a masterly manner, exposed the dangers of this bill, to the luminous speech of its author, the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] in defense of its positions; and the bill itself, and the arguments in its favor, to the masterly, and, in my opinion, unanswerable speech of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] Anything from me now would be but a vain attempt to "add a perfume to the violet." But, sir, I differ so totally and entirely from my colleague on this question, that I cannot, and will not forbear to notice some of his points. And, sir, first and foremost, I beg leave to say that I utterly differ from him in the doctrine he urges in defense of this bill, and has often pressed on other occasions—of the "duty of the Government to take care of the people." Sir, I repudiate and utterly deny any such doctrine. It is at war with the genius of our institutions; it is at war with the spirit of the Constitution; it is at war with all my observation and understanding of the practical operation of our Government, from the year 1789 to the present moment. It was the intention of those who framed it, to make this, as near as possible, a Government of the people, identified with them, and finding its only support in their virtue, affections, intelligence, and wisdom. The doctrine, sir, that it is the duty of the Government to take care of the people, is a doctrine much better suited to that country which has a "king that can do no wrong," and a Legislature that is "omnipotent," than to this country, where all the power of the Government is granted by the people; and that power not specifically granted, is specially reserved to them. Sir, England has been glorified in this Chamber, and held up as the fountain of our liberty, and the proper model for our imitation. I will, by-and-by, touch upon that view taken by my colleague; for the present I will only remark on this one great essential difference between the liberty of the people of England and this country. It is this: That all the liberty which the people of England enjoy is by grants forced and extorted from their Government; whilst all the power possessed by the Government of America has been cautiously and sparingly granted by the people, who retained to themselves all that is not plainly and clearly granted. Sir, I acknowledge not this doctrine of the "duty of Government to take care of the people." There is no knowing the dangers and excesses to which it might not lead. I adopt, as my creed, precisely the reverse of such a doctrine, and say that it is the duty of the people to take care of their Government. The Government belongs to them, and not they to the Government. So much, sir, hastily, for this point.

Sir, what is the bill on your table? It proposes to make it highly penal for certain persons holding offices under the General Government to give their opinion, except by a vote at the polls, about any public election whatever, whether for the General or State governments! And this bill is advocated by my colleague! Sir, I do most cordially agree with my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] when he calls it a gag law, and pronounces it to be worse than the "sedition law." That law went to abridge the freedom of the press, and permitted the truth to be given in evidence; and this goes directly and openly "to abridge the freedom and liberty of speech," which is so sacredly guarded by the Constitution. "None of these enumerated office-holders," says the bill, "shall persuade or dissuade any elector to give, or not to give, a vote!" Persuade, sir, means to advise; and advice is most frequently the mere expression of opinion. And, sir, we are told that one hundred thousand freemen of America are to be put under the ban of this odious law, and subjected to the surveillance of the million of base informers, who, by it, are to be rewarded with money for eavesdropping, and distorting and reporting the generous impulses of the freemen of your States, to whom alone is left the power to legislate on the great right of suffrage. There is not a State in this Union that has not legislated on it; that has not passed laws to protect its freedom, and to punish its abuse.

But, sir, why is it that this bill has not embraced all the officers of the General Government? Why has it omitted the highest, who, from their station, their talent, and frequently their wealth, might be supposed to have influence on their countrymen? It has assailed those who, its advocates say, owe their bread to the Government. Yes, sir, we have heard a great deal about custom-house officers, about weighers and gaugers and tidewaiters, as if their "persuasion" or "dissuasion" was to control the destinies of elections. Sir, when we see men filling the second most elevated station in the world interfering in elections—nay, sir, endeavoring to promote their own to the very highest station, it is mockery, indeed, to pass a law to muzzle, to gag, and silence weighers, gaugers, tidewaiters, and quill-drivers! And at last, sir, what is, or has ever been, the power and influence of these "legions," these "Pretorian bands," as my colleague calls them? In the cities, where Government officers are most numerous, the Administration has been defeated. Look to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Richmond. Indeed, sir, look throughout every village even, where "two or three are gathered together" in commerce, and you will see how impotent are all your public officers against the all-corrupting power and influence of money; and yet, sir, we cannot prevail upon these gentlemen, who are willing to abridge the freedom of speech of these poor impotent public officers, to aid us in any effort to rescue the Government and the people of this country from the foul and cruel dominion of associated wealth—of monopolies, of banks. But what does the experience of bygone times say about the dangerous and omnipotent influences of these public officers—these train-bands, these cohorts, and such names, with which they are designated? Surely no one will say that it was by their mighty influence that Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe were kept in office for eight years! And how was it, sir, that the elder and the junior Adams each went by the board, and were merged, and drowned, and sunk forever in the ocean of popular indignation? Their "legions" of public officers were impotent to save them. All their patronage was of no avail.

But why, sir, should I be assailing this bill on these details, when it is to its principles I object? Why should I attack it on the facts I have stated, when, if they were all untrue and unfounded, I should be opposed to it. I am opposed to it, sir, because it is unconstitutional. I am opposed to it because the Congress of the United States have no right to pass any law "abridging the freedom of speech." Nay, I go further, and say they have no right to pass any law abridging the freedom of election, which great subject is left with the States; and it is of the very essence of that freedom, the "right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon." But, sir, this truth is gotten over on the present occasion by a view which, as far as my memory serves me, was not presented by any of the sagacious and bold defenders of the "sedition law." That view is taken by my colleague. It is, that the office-holders are no portion of the people, embraced by the provisions of the Constitution, or whose rights are defended by the celebrated report of Mr. Madison! He informs the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL,] that he does not understand that great work; that he has read it to but little advantage if he does not see that public officers are no portion of the people, contemplated in that unequal defense of constitutional right! I, sir, like my friend from New Jersey, have also read this glorious document, [holding Madison's Report in his hand]—this little book, which I once heard John Randolph call his political BIBLE—to but little purpose, if one hundred thousand free citizens, (the number mentioned by my colleague,) who have rendered themselves respectable enough in their various callings of life to become public officers, are at that moment cut off from the great constitutional rights secured, without exception, to all the people! Officers of the Government not a portion of the people! The proposition is startling; it is, to me, monstrous! I hardly know how to refute it. But, sir, I turn to this sacred paper, the Constitution. You will there find that the word people is mentioned six times, and six times only. I will be as little tedious as possible; but let us look into it. The first time the word occurs is in the preamble: "We the PEOPLE," &c., "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity," &c. Now, sir, it is evident that no office-holders of the Government could be members of the convention that created it; yet, sir, if my colleague's doctrine is correct, that the office-holders are not a portion of the people, it would inevitably follow that those men who now hold offices under the General Government, who are the "POSTERITY" of the then people of the United States, are not entitled to the "blessings of liberty," which that charter intended to secure to "themselves and posterity."

The second occurrence of the word is in the second section of the first article: "Members, &c., shall be chosen every second year, by the PEOPLE of the several States, and the electors in each State," &c. Now, sir, in this place the people are mentioned without restriction; and such of them as are electors, by the State laws, are secured in all the qualifications granted by the laws of the State; and there is no law in any State that I know of—certainly not in Virginia—that deprives Federal officers of any of the rights of other electors.

The third instance occurs in the first amendment to the Constitution: "Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble," &c. Now, sir, if the officers of the Federal Government are not a portion of the people, they lose this inestimable privilege.

The fourth occurrence of this word people in our charter is in the second amendment: "A well regulated militia, &c. The right of the people to bear arms shall not be questioned." Who does not perceive that, under this extraordinary doctrine advanced by my colleague, no public officer embraced in this bill can keep a firelock?

The fifth time this word people is written in the Constitution, is found in the fourth amendment: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be questioned." What security have the poor public officers against search and seizure, if this monstrous doctrine, that they form no portion of the people, is to prevail?

The sixth and last time in which the word people is to be found in the Constitution, is in the tenth amendment: "The powers not delegated to the United States, &c., are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

I am sorry, Mr. President, to have been thus tedious. Who does not see, from this plain, simple reading of the Constitution, that an officer of this Government, who ought to feel at least that he is a freeman, is cut off from every right which this Constitution meant to secure to freemen, if this new and astounding doctrine be true? But, Mr. President, I must pass to other points, as I have much to say on other matters besides this bill.

My colleague says "he does not look upon the report against this bill as the work of an individual, but as a concerted system to sustain the Executive by THE PARTY!" Strange language this from that source. May I ask him what he means by "the party?" What party, sir, does my colleague speak of? It is too early for him to be talking with emphasis about "the party." Such language may evince his feeling towards the "Executive" he is so distressed to see receiving support, but I must be permitted to say that it can have no further effect. It is "ad captandam," and can only be intended to aid in breaking down this Administration. My colleague asks the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] with a flourish, if "we are to understand that Democracy will bear an infusion of Federalism?" I answer yes. Yes, sir, true Democracy will bear an infusion of that Federalism which, when our country is warring with a foreign or a domestic foe, girds on its armor, and, sword in hand, goes forth to the battle-field to encounter its foes, instead of convening at Hartford, or anywhere else, to sell the country to the invading enemy. Good Democracy will bear an infusion of that Federalism which, in all times, will advocate and sustain the inalienable rights of man, the freedom of conscience, the freedom of the press, and of religion, and of speech. My Democracy will bear an infusion of all that; and if my colleague's will bear an infusion of the principles contained in the bill under discussion, I can only say that his is a very different Democracy from mine, or from any I had ever supposed him to possess. I consider this bill much worse than the memorable sedition law. That assailed the freedom of the press, and permitted the truth to be given in evidence. But, sir, this is a gag law; it is a direct violation of the Constitution, because it abridges the freedom of speech, and is demoralizing in its tendency, by creating a host of miserable spies and informers. My colleague objects to the able report of the committee, because, as he says, it intimates that such a law might be resisted, and asks who would resist a law passed with all the constitutional forms? I say to him, sir, that I would. I say to this Senate, and to the world, that I would not regard constitutional forms when the substance was wanting—the Constitution violated, and my liberty usurped. Forms! talk not to me of forms! The alien and sedition laws had all the forms of the Constitution; and had I been on the theater then, I would have resisted them to any and every length, if reason and truth had not timely prevailed over tyranny and injustice. And, sir, should the odious bill on your table become a law, and I ever become a public officer, there is no torture, no rack which the inventive genius of cruelty could devise, which should compel me to relinquish the rights which it proposes to usurp.

My colleague complains of some comparison which has been made between the officers of the Government and bank officers; he contrasts them, and gives the preference to the latter, as being State officers, inasmuch as banks are "State institutions;" and he asks if it is Democratic to deify them? He further tells us that Mr. Jefferson revered "State institutions;" therefore, of course, Mr. Jefferson revered State banks! Sir, I have no hostility to banks; I would do them no violence or injustice; let them go on, and trade and speculate and shock and convulse the country from time to time; I have nothing to say; but, in the sense which my colleague means, I totally deny that they are State institutions. On the contrary, unless they are checked by legislative power, or unless, as has ever been my hope, the evil shall cure itself, they will overshadow, and ultimately overawe, your legitimate, constitutional State institutions—the Departments of the Government.

My colleague has informed the nation that he was the protégé of Mr. Jefferson. I stand here to rescue that great apostle of liberty from the imputation that he revered these State institutions—these State banks. I undertake to say that not a word that ever escaped his lips or his pen warrants the imputation; on the contrary, he thought them inimical to liberty and to virtue. In the many volumes which John Taylor, of Caroline, wrote, there is scarcely a page on which he does not denounce them; and Mr. Jefferson has solemnly said that that great man had never written a word to which he did not give his assent. He said he had read his writings annually, and recommended to the rising youth of the country to do the same. But my colleague says that "State rights" "implies jealousy of Executive power!" It is strange to me how any person professing, as he does, to understand and to admire this little volume, (Madison's Report,) can have fallen into so gross an error. I have only time to refer him to that report, to prove how utterly erroneous is the position. It inculcates on the States a jealousy of their reserved rights against all and every department of the General Government, and utterly repudiates the idea of special and exclusive danger from the Executive; and who does not know Mr. Jefferson's opinions on this subject? He speaks of danger to State rights from all the departments of the Federal Government, but says:

"The judiciary is the subtle corps of sappers and miners, working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric."

No, sir; this exclusive jealousy of Executive power is not sustained by the Constitution, or any of its coterminous expounders. It is a part of modern machinery, worked on the prejudices of the people, by those who want the very power they thus repudiate.

My colleague says, "officers of the Government are not officers of the people." This, to me, is a new and strange doctrine! Whose officers, I ask, are they? Whose officer is he at this moment? Whose officer was he when he was Minister to France? Why, surely, the officer of the people of the United States. According to his doctrine, that no man not immediately selected by the people is their officer, they have no other officers of the Federal Government except the members of the House of Representatives; for even the President and Vice President are chosen indirectly by them to act for them, and are directly responsible to them at the great and controlling bar of public opinion.

My colleague speaks of that "atrociously corrupt doctrine," that "to the victors belong the spoils." Now, Mr. President, I have never paid the least regard to many of these phrases, seized upon by party newspapers and electioneers, and often perverted from their true sense. The one quoted, and that about "glory enough for one day," and hundreds of others, are unworthy of attention. I know not to whom is attributed the above expression; the first time I ever saw it in print, over a responsible signature, was in a letter signed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.]

Mr. TALLMADGE said it was marked with inverted commas.

Mr. ROANE. Be it so. I know not whence came the quotation, or whether the gentleman used it at the time in irony, or derision, or approval. Let it all pass.

My colleague says, "if Mr. Jefferson did not dismiss from office, it was because no instance of interference in elections occurred." Now, sir, I can never forget the hue and cry raised against that great man for turning out the Federalists whom his predecessor had foisted into every department of the Government. When complaints were loudest against him for so doing, he asked what he was to do? for that "none resigned, and but few died." General Washington had declared that "it would be a sort of political suicide to put into office men whose political tenets were adverse to the measures of the General Government." What would that immortal patriot have thought of the odious provisions of the bill before us? But Mr. Jefferson's circular to public officers has been read and appealed to in justification of this bill. That circular only speaks of the public officers so interfering as to control the free exercise of the elective franchise. It speaks not of advice or persuasion. No, sir; that great man, who thought there was no danger to our institutions as long as "reason and truth are left free to combat error," could never have sanctioned this bill. His remedy was to turn out faithless or incompetent officers, whether that infidelity or incompetency arose from intermeddling in elections, or from any other cause. When did he ever recommend to Congress to pass such a law? He knew they had no such power, and that he had ample power to make all his subordinates behave themselves. My colleague asks, when did a minister of England or France ever interfere in an election, as did the Secretary of the War Department last fall, by writing a letter to South Carolina? Now, sir, I have no very intimate acquaintance with ministerial doings in England or France, but I am yet to learn of that scrupulous nicety, that fastidious delicacy on the subject of elections claimed for them by my colleague. I have read, with inexpressible disgust, of the foul corruption openly practiced to secure a seat in the House of Commons of Great Britain. Seats in that body are purchased. Great as seems the salary of your President, instances exist of a much larger amount being paid by a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons. That country, sir, where not one man in many thousands is entitled to suffrage, can, in no manner, form the illustrations for us which gentlemen are so urgently pressing. I respect not the British examples about elections or office-holding.

But, Mr. President, to the other point. I know nothing of the letter of Mr. Poinsett, which has been so harshly spoken of by my colleague. I know not when, to whom, or about what, it was written, or whether it was an original or a responsive letter, and, therefore, cannot defend or condemn its contents. But this much I will say: no man cares or thinks less than I do about what is called dignity of office. The office of Senator of the United States has, by many, been considered in that aspect as second only to that of the President; and I am yet to learn that a Secretary of a Department, having a temporary residence in this city, is to be rendered odious for writing a political letter to his native State, where he has left for a time only, his friends, his property, and all his dearest rights, while a Senator may, with perfect propriety, write letters to a distant State, in which he has no such stake or interest. It will be readily perceived that I allude to a letter written to Pennsylvania, pending an important State election.

Mr. President, I must omit many things I might say in reply about this bill; and say that I utterly disagree with my colleague as to all his mighty compliments on the British system, as affording examples for us. No man is more disposed than I to pay the just tribute to those immortal patriots, who have occasionally risen in that nation, and fallen martyrs to the true spirit of freedom. Locke, Sidney, Russell, Hampden, and others, will be ever dear to the friends of liberty; but I deny that it is to them we owe our freedom. In support of this doctrine, so warmly pressed, allusion has been made to the early settlers of our country. I deny that any support for such principles can be drawn from those men who first landed on the barren rock of Plymouth, the burning sands of Carolina, or the Island of Jamestown. Their history affords no countenance to this doctrine. They fled from the persecution and oppression of that Government, now so lauded by American Senators; they preferred to encounter hunger, and all the terrors of savage man and wild beasts, than to submit longer to the oppression of that Government which is, in this Chamber, exhibited as a model for our imitation. These people were persecuted and oppressed for two hundred years by that Government; they, with filial obedience, during that whole period, were unresisting; but at length were obliged to raise their hand against a cruel parent, and fight, yes fight, for the liberty and freedom we now enjoy. And am I, sir, by subscribing to all the fulsome compliments to the British Government, to charge upon my glorious ancestors the crime of parricide? No, sir; no, sir. I totally deny the truth of the contrast which has been drawn between the two Governments in favor of England. In the conflicts of the Revolution, in the appeals then made to the justice of the mother country, and in drafting our public papers, reference might well be had to British Magna Charta, and to the writings of Locke, and other British patriots. But that time is passed away; we have a Magna Charta of our own, a glorious one—written. Yes, sir, written with a pencil of light. Here it is, sir, [holding aloft the Constitution.] By that sacred instrument do I choose to be guided, without any reference whatever to British "Magna Charta," or British usages; and when ever any measure is proposed, I am willing to adopt the golden rule laid down in Madison's Report to test its constitutionality. "The first question is, whether the power is expressed in the Constitution?" If it be, the question is decided. "If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be, whether it is properly an incident to an expressed power, and necessary to its execution," &c. If by this rule the bill before us is tested, it cannot gain favor with the American people. Nor have we further use for the wrappings of Locke to define our liberty. We have those of Jefferson, Madison, Taylor, and hundreds of others, whose paths we can safely follow.

Sir, those who are perpetually quaffing from the pure fountains, as they call them, of Locke and other British writers, but too frequently, before their thirst is slaked are found drinking from the muddy pool of Filmer; yes, sir, the exploded doctrines of Filmer; that man is not capable of self-government lies at the bottom, and is the necessary inference from all these fine theories drawn from British writings and British practices. My colleague should recollect, in all his learned, and, in my opinion, mistaken applications from England to this country, this great essential difference between the two Governments, which constitutes our great shield. There they have septennial elections and a hereditary monarch; here we have frequent elections and twenty-six separate, independent governments, all watching with ceaseless vigilance the movements of each other, and of the General Government, common to them all; and, sir, if my colleague could look with the same Democratic eye of faith and admiration for the precepts of the immortal Jefferson he has so often professed, he would admit that there is nothing in the character or history of his life, or in any word in his writings, that does not put upon the whole British system the seal of his abhorrence and detestation. Yet, sir, is that system quoted in this Senate as a model for imitation, and as an argument in favor of the present extraordinary and abominable bill! I could cite innumerable passages from the writings of Jefferson to sustain me, if time permitted; but I am admonished to draw to a close on this subject, and pass on to others. I am, sir, a Democrat of the school of 1798. I have never changed my name or my principles. My colleague well recollects Mr. Jefferson's prophetic history of the change of names which the old Hamiltonian Federalists would assume; but I doubt whether his prophetic spirit could keep pace with the extended nomenclature of the present day.

Mr. President, one word more about this jealousy of Executive power. I have shown that it is against Federal power, in all its departments, that the States ought to be jealous. What has been the history of the Government as to this point? Every two years shows you great changes in the popular branch of your Government; and they are very often occurring here by the power of a vigilant people. Yet, sir, in a period of fifty years, there have been only two instances in which the President of the United States has not given satisfaction to his constituents; only twice, in the thirteen elections we have had of a President, have the people expressed their disapprobation of his conduct. Your Congress has passed unconstitutional laws; one or more judges have been impeached; but there has not been an instance yet in which the President of the United States has been impeached. No, sir, with all the bitter opposition which each of them has encountered, not one has yet been impeached! Then, why all this railing against the danger of Executive usurpation? Who does not see that it is unfounded, and all for party aggrandizement? Sir, when, some few years ago, an honorable Senator from Kentucky, now in my eye, [Mr. CLAY,] offered to the Senate a resolution condemning and censuring, in strong terms, the official conduct of the then President of the United States, it was deemed to be a sort of quasi impeachment of that high officer, and my colleague promptly stepped forward, and, by an able speech and an efficient vote, aided to expunge the resolution from your Journals, on which it had been recorded; and yet, sir, he is now alarmed at the mighty "persuasive" powers of these poor gaugers, weighers, and tide-waiters! He is frightened about Executive patronage!

Sir, I must pass on. My colleague, on this subject, as on many others, admonishes us against the "mad dominion" of party spirit. Yes, sir, very much has he said about motives, about party and party tactics and party dictation, and about patriotism and elevated, statesmanlike views, and all that. Not less strange than new is it to hear him thus railing against party!

I have nothing, sir, to do with the patriotism or motives of any gentleman. I only claim for myself all that any Senator can ask and receive on that score; while I set up no special claim to those great statesmanlike views, rising above all party feeling; of which we are so often reminded by my colleague; and whilst I boast not of a patriotism warmer, or motives purer, than those of others, yet, sir, am bold to say, that I am utterly unconscious of ever having been actuated by any vote given in this Chamber by any other consideration than a free, independent, and unbiased desire to promote the public good. I came into this Chamber, and am at this moment, as free as any man in it to pursue on all questions which may arise whatever course my own conscience and judgment shall indicate as most conducive to the best interests of the nation. I had no consistencies to establish, no inconsistencies to reconcile, no resentments to gratify, no heart-burnings to appease, no favors to ask, no hopes to indulge, no fears to allay, and, thank God, no ambition to gratify. I brought with me no bantling scheme of my own; and have most patiently and attentively listened to all that have been proposed by others, to give ease to the public mind, and promote the great interests of our beloved country. And if, sir, like the fabled Monus, there was a glass in my bosom, I would not hesitate to permit all the world to look in upon the operations of my heart, in regard to the great national questions we have agitated in this Chamber. But, Mr. President, candor requires that I should admit that, on such an inspection, it would not be found that those operations were beyond the reach or influence of party. I admit, sir, that they are much controlled by party feelings. I pretend not to be beyond or above the influence of party. I am a party man, and glory in being so; for my heart tells me that my party feelings are the result of an honest and an ardent, though, perhaps, mistaken or misguided, patriotism. I doubt not the word of any gentleman who says he is not influenced by party feelings. But, sir, it is almost inconceivable to me, how any man, who has taken an active part in the late political turmoils of the day, can be free from its influence. Whoever he may be, his temperament is very different from mine, and, I believe, from that of nine tenths of the people of this country, and of England too; and I go further, and say that neither of these countries would long preserve their liberty but for party spirit, and that the great principle of self-preservation will always afford a timely check to its mad or dangerous excesses. Of this truth we have recently had an exemplification at Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, which is consolatory to every lover of the liberty and union of America. Mr. President, in connection with this subject of party spirit, which my colleague now so bitterly reprobates, and in order fully to define my position in regard to some of the leading topics of the day, I beg leave to be permitted to take a brief and rapid review of the present Administration of the Federal Government, and its supporters and opponents.

Throughout America we have recently passed through a convulsive struggle to form a new executive administration. Violent, indeed, was that struggle. That party who, for eight long years, had so bitterly opposed all, ay, sir, indiscriminately all the leading measures of the late Administration, made a bold, grand, and well concerted effort to elect a Chief Magistrate entertaining their own feelings and opinions. Their opponents were equally active and untiring in their exertions to elect one who would, in the main, pursue the course of that reviled Administration; ay, sir, if you choose so to have it, who would "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." They succeeded in those exertions, and elected the present Chief Magistrate. I, sir, in Virginia, in my individual capacity, took a zealous and open part, within my limited sphere of action, in aiding to bring Martin Van Buren, of New York, to the station he now so ably fills, and was one of the organs of Virginia, in her electoral college, to bestow upon him the vote of that ancient Democratic Commonwealth. In that memorable contest, we encountered all that excited, nay, madened, party spirit could address to the ignorance, to the fears, the prejudices, or interests of a virtuous people. The vocabulary of epithet was exhausted and heaped upon us. The foulest names ever given to a party were freely bestowed upon us by our adversaries, and the fairest that ever adorned the friends of liberty were assumed for themselves; but all, all, sir, would not do. The people could not be intimidated or deluded; they could not be "persuaded or dissuaded;" they could not be led or driven to abandon those evident principles of republicanism they had so long and so dearly cherished. In vain, sir, had they been told that Andrew Jackson was a despot, a knave, and a fool; in vain had they been told, in one breath, that he was a self-willed, obstinate, indomitable tyrant, and in the next, that he was a cypher, a supple tool, a mere automaton, vilely used by others; and in vain, also, were they told by these same men that the promises of Martin Van Buren could not be relied on; that he was falsehood and treachery personified; that, notwithstanding his oft-declared opposition to a national bank, he would, in his first message to Congress, recommend one in its most odious form, to be located in his favorite city of New York; and that, mauler all his honeyed words and fair promises about southern rights, and the sacred compromises of the Constitution, he would, before he was warm in the presidential chair, show himself to be in heart and deed, a northern Abolitionist, and much more such prophetic stuff, which I will not waste your precious time to recapitulate. Has he verified the forebodings of these men in any one of these particulars? I ask his friends, and I ask his foes; and for their complete and entire falsification, I appeal to the three calm, luminous, statesmanlike, republican messages he has already sent to the Congress of the United States; and I furthermore appeal to his whole conduct, both public and private, since he has filled the presidential chair.

I have, it is true, heard much difference of opinion about the correctness and practicability of his views in regard to the finance and currency of the country; but I have heard no man yet doubt their constitutionality, or complain of the temper or manner in which they have been submitted to the consideration of Congress. And here permit me, sir, for myself, to say, that I have heard no man yet (and I have listened attentively to all that has been said here, and read much that has been written) who has answered the lucid arguments by which he has sustained them, or shaken the firm, republican, constitutional ground on which his recommendation of an independent Treasury, in which to keep the people's money secure from the clutches of bank or other speculators, is based. Mr. President, believing Martin Van Buren to be a republican, and a statesman of the first order, I came into Congress with a predisposition, nay, sir, I might almost say with a pledge, and predetermination, to support his administration, not right or wrong, sir; no, sir; not to "register his edicts;" no, sir, for I abhor and loath all dependence and vassalage as much, or more, than those who now boast most loudly of their independence and patriotism and disinterestedness. I came here elected by those who contributed to elect him; and I came, sir, I repeat, determined to support his administration as far as I possibly could, with a safe conscience, and not to abandon it for light and trivial causes; and, above all things, for any cause personal to myself. This course, I undertake to say, was expected from me by every man of every party in Virginia. I have thus far given to it an honest support; and, in so doing, my conscience and my judgment sustain my course. Nor, sir, has it been necessary to my support of his administration, that I should concur in all his views and recommendations, any more than that I should have deemed it proper to become its bitter opposer, because I differed with him on any one measure of policy. That, sir, I have done, and am at all times free to do. It cannot be expected that there can, in the nature of the human mind, be a universal concurrence of opinion on every subject, even among those who generally agree. The whole country knows my course, from the first moment I took my seat in the Senate to the present time, in regard to the great subject of the public lands, on which I have differed entirely from many of my political friends; and, sir, had I been associated with my colleague during the administration of General Jackson, when he recommended the same policy in regard to them which is advocated by his successor, I should have differed with him then with the same cordiality with which he now concurs with me.

But, sir, a difference with the Administration on this great subject has not for a moment indicated that it was my duty to oppose it out and out, and affiliate myself with those who avow "uncompromising hostility to Martin Van Buren." No, sir; I have gone on steadily to give to his administration an honest and a conscientious support; and let me add, sir, that as long as I shall remain here, and the President shall advocate the true principles of the Constitution and republican doctrines, as he has thus far done, that support will be continued with unabated zeal and pleasure. Does this, sir, define my position? No, sir; not as fully as I desire. My colleague, who has from time to time, and little by little, "defined his position" towards this Administration, and recently in a manner which none here present doubt or misunderstand, was with me, or rather I should say I was with him, as far as I had an opportunity to know, (and I had many,) in every thought and feeling, during the late warmly-contested presidential election; and, for the life of me, I cannot see why it is that we are now so wide apart in those thoughts and feelings about the Administration and administrators of the Government. I know of no public reasons for this difference, and much less of any private ones. But, sir, either I or my colleague have entirely changed our positions, since we were sent hither; and I am reluctantly driven to put myself upon my country, to say whether it is I who have changed, as is roundly charged by my colleague upon all the friends of the Administration.

Mr. President, before I came here as a Senator, I was personally unacquainted with Martin Van Buren. My colleague knew him intimately; he had served with him in public life; he had stood shoulder to shoulder with him in this Chamber, in resisting the powerful and combined assaults which were made on the great measures of Jackson's administration; he had zealously supported his election to the Presidency; he had voted for me as one of the electors of Virginia, substantially pledged to vote for him; and I have no hesitation in saying, that amidst all the foul charges brought against this then personal stranger to me, the support which my colleague thus gave him strengthened my confidence in the correctness of the vote I had given for him at the polls, and afterwards bestowed upon him as a member of the electoral college. On my arrival here as a Senator, I determined to endeavor, during my stay in this city, to form a personal acquaintance with the President, and to judge for myself in regard to the many charges which had been brought against him. Accident has afforded me a fuller opportunity for this investigation than I could have anticipated; and, sir, I have scanned, with a scrutinizing eye, as far as my poor abilities would enable me, the character, opinions, and conduct of the man. I have, sir, when "the curtain of ceremony was drawn to the skies," and when it was utterly impossible for him to know the operations of my mind, "tented him to the quick." I have looked, but looked in vain, sir, for all those leading characteristic traits non-committalism and management and intrigue and "mighty magic," wherewithal he was so loudly charged. I believe, sir, that his first message to the Congress of the United States has hushed forever all the croakings about his non-committalism; and that all the slang about his magic arts ceased as soon as it was found powerless to dupe and deceive the people.

Does any one pretend that the President has as yet violated any of the principles which those who elected, expected him to maintain? Let the continued, the untiring and remorseless opposition of the far greater part of those who opposed his election answer the question; let those of them who now give either the cold, reluctant approbation of silence, or are willing to receive, as a "good half-way house," the once by them denounced and reviled "pet bank" "experiment," answer the question. And how is it, why is it, that I find my colleague now pulling kindly in the traces with these gentlemen, and charging upon the President "duplicity and deception?" But, sir, he says he was the friend—the best friend—of the President, for that he advised him beforehand—nay, sir, he warned him—not to recommend to Congress his scheme of a sub-Treasury. Ay, sir, he advised the President, and he did not follow his advice; he warned him, and he did not heed his warning, but went on to discharge his high duty according to the dictates of his own judgment and conscience.

Sir, suppose that some kind friend, (and would that he could have found such a one,) knowing or suspecting that my colleague intended to recommend to Congress his favorite "pet bank scheme," had gone to him and told him that it was an exploded experiment; that it had been already fully and fairly tried, and, in his own impressive language, "had signally and mournfully failed," and advised and warned him not to submit it; and that, notwithstanding all this, he thought it his duty to do as he did, and propose it to the nation: does he think that that friend should have manifested towards him the feeling and temper which he, on all occasions, now evinces towards the President?

My colleague has opposed all and every scheme thought of for the custody and disbursement of the public money, except the one which he introduced, which has notoriously met with less favor in Congress and elsewhere than any other yet suggested. He condemns, with unmeasured censure, the President for again recommending to the consideration of Congress a financial plan, which, my colleague says, has been repudiated by the voice of Congress and the nation. He knows that the people have not yet finally or fully passed upon that plan. He knows that it has twice received the sanction of this body, and each time been defeated by a small majority in the other House of Congress; and yet, strange to tell, he who urges this objection to the President's plan, thus sustained, is perpetually pressing on Congress and the nation a scheme which, besides himself, finds but one supporter in the Senate, and very few, indeed, in the other House of Congress, or elsewhere—as though his plan had been less repudiated by the nation than the one submitted by the President, or the President of the United States was less authorized than he to "recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." My colleague is opposed to the Bank of the United States, because, I presume, it is unconstitutional. He is opposed to the sub-Treasury, because it will increase Executive patronage, because it will create two currencies—one for the people, the other (the best) for the office-holders! and, I suppose, because he advised and warned the President not to recommend it; and as to a special deposit scheme, he says that is all a humbug. Nothing, sir, nothing but his own dear scheme of "State-rights banks," or "bank State rights," I forget which he called it, will do for him; and I am free to say that, after the fullest attention I have been able to bestow upon all that he has said in favor of this his darling pet, I can distill from it nothing more than this: that having, on the emergency occasioned by the removal of the deposits in 1834 from the Bank of the United States, voted for the experiment of the State banks as fiscal agents, he is consistent in voting for them again. Yes, sir, every change has been rung on the inconsistency of those who voted for them then, and now, that they have "signally and mournfully" failed to answer the desired purpose, are opposed to trusting them a second time; whilst I have heard from my colleague not a word of reproof against those who then denounced his scheme as fraught with corruption and ruin to the country, and now "damn it with faint praise," or stigmatize it as "a good half-way house." Half way where? half way to what? Why, sir, half way between that constitutional Treasury and that unconstitutional bank, between which, my colleague says, he would pause long before he would make an election!

Mr. President, I beg leave further to define my position, by saying that every day's reflection and observation—nay, that "recent events," if my colleague prefers the phrase—confirm me in my conviction that the money of the people paid for the support of their Government, and no other purpose, should be kept in a Treasury independent of, and uncontrolled by, any other Government, or the creatures of any other Government on earth; and that I will try every possible, feasible scheme which wise, patriotic statesmen can devise, before I will confide the public treasure—the taxes paid and intended by the people for specific purposes—to the uncontrolled custody (as uncontrolled it must be, for I agree with my colleague that a general scheme of special deposits is all a humbug) of any bank; and least of all of banks who owe their existence and allegiance to other Governments, and whom we cannot, therefore, supervise, regulate, control, or punish. If you cannot exercise these powers in regard to these banks, when curators of the public money, it seems most clear to my mind that it should not be intrusted to them; and if you can, it is equally clear that we may bid an eternal adieu to all State rights, except what my colleague is pleased to denominate "bank State rights." Far be it from me, sir, now to go into anything like an argument in favor of the sub-Treasury. That task has long since been ably performed by others. Its principles are before the people; and, like the principles of constitutional liberty and reform on other great occasions, may be slow, but will be sure. It has always been sufficient for me that the system is supported by the plain principles of common sense and common honesty, and is notoriously the only mode contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, who denied to the Government the aid of a national bank, and therefore could not have contemplated or anticipated that of State banks in conjunction with the national Treasury.

Further, sir, to define my position, in contradistinction to that of my colleague, and that which he now occupies in contradistinction to the one he occupied a few years ago, I beg leave to read to the Senate an extract or two from a speech delivered by him in this Chamber in the year 1834, on the occasion of the removal of the deposits. I know, sir, that efforts have been recently made to explain away that speech to mean something very different from what its words clearly import. If he has not, since that speech was delivered, changed his opinion and shifted his ground, then, indeed, is language a most imperfect exponent of thought. I certainly have not changed my opinions on the subject of that speech—it was about gold currency. I shall never forget the pleasure with which I read it, and what golden opinions it obtained for my colleague with the entire Democracy of Virginia, or what heavy denunciations it brought upon him from those with whom he is now cooperating to make this a bank-paper Government. But to the extracts. He then said:

"Of all reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises in its accomplishment the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is beyond comparison the RESTORATION of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be—a hard-money Government. We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of a paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of these evils, supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank."

"Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as PRACTICABLE, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return is to let the Bank of the United States go down. The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realize a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity of the country."

"I conjure gentlemen, then, with ability so eminently fitted for this great work, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate, and bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination—that of a SIMPLE, SOLID, HARD-MONEY Government."

Can language possibly be more plain, intelligible, or impressive than this? Sir, when I read this part of that memorable speech of my colleague, I thought of John Randolph, whose dulcet and peculiar tones of voice, methinks, I can still hear ringing in my ears: "This is a hard-money Government—give me gold and silver—none of your trash—none of your rags—none of your paper money." These were the sentiments of that distinguished man, than whom, none better knew, or more sacredly revered, the meaning and spirit of the Constitution. These were the sentiments of the fathers and cotempo-aneous expounders of the Constitution; and, sir, they were the sentiments of my colleague, when he delivered his speech, in 1834, if I can understand plain English. Yet, sir, I know it has been recently attempted so to explain the above extract, as to give to it a meaning totally different from that which I gave, when I read it first, and which I give now. The word PRACTICABLE is seized upon to pervert its true meaning, and make this a Government of STATE BANK PAPER MONEY. Mr. President, cotemporaneous construction of language is frequently, and most justly, resorted to in cases of doubt or difficulty. It has been a most efficient aid in settling doubtful phrases in our glorious Constitution. We are not without that aid in the present difficulty. Three days after the above speech of my colleague was delivered, Mr. WEBSTER, in a speech on the removal of the deposits, said:

"The second suggestion is that which was made by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] That honorable member pledges himself to bring forward a proposition, having for its object to do away with the paper system altogether, and to return to an entire metallic currency. I do not expect that the honorable member will find much support in such an undertaking. More gold and silver currency, and the entire abolition of paper, is not suited to the times. The idea has something a little too Spartan in it. We might as well think of going to iron at once. If such a result as the gentleman hopes for were even desirable, I regard its attainment as utterly impracticable and hopeless. I lay that scheme, therefore, out of my contemplation."

Mr. CLAY, in a speech on the same subject, said:

"And what are the remedies proposed by those in possession of the Government? None—none. Idle and visionary and chimerical schemes are, indeed, sometimes thrown out; but even they are not seriously proposed. A member, not now in his seat, [Mr. RIVES,] had suggested one of those schemes, which is to banish all paper circulation, and to resort exclusively to hard money. A more wild and impracticable project never entered into the head of man."

Here is cotemporaneous construction for you. With the understanding of two such men, present on the occasion of delivering this speech, with my own understanding of it at the same time, and that of every human being who I heard speak of it, I must be excused for not yielding my opinion to any quibble about the meaning or import or bearing of a single word. I should like to know, sir, whether my colleague is now in favor of the "hard money Government" the framers of the Constitution intended to make ours? I should like to know the advent of the time when he now thinks it will be practicable to "return to a metallic circulation?" As he advised, the Bank of the United States, which he considered the great impediment to his political and financial millennium, was permitted to go down. And I should like, furthermore, to know whether he expects his litter of State banks, trading on all the revenues of the Government, are likely to supply the "ordinary channels of circulation with gold and silver," and to aid in the "effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination—that of a simple, solid, hard money Government?" But, Mr. President, I will not longer dwell on this topic, but go on to define my position in regard to others.

I read attentively, at the earliest opportunity, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the call of my colleague on that officer, in regard to the manner of his executing the law authorizing him to sell the bonds of the Bank of the United States. And here, sir, permit me to remark, that I have not the least doubt but that the course of my colleague on that occasion was strictly parliamentary, because it was permitted; but it was certainly novel and unusual, to say the least of it. On that call he made a long speech, condemning in unmeasured terms that officer on the very points on which, by the permission of the Senate, he was about to seek information. Yes, sir, my colleague made three long speeches against the Secretary of the Treasury; in the first, he prejudged him without hearing; in the second, he condemned him without a trial; and in the third, he attempted to execute him without the "benefit of clergy."

Mr. President, it is a mournful fact, that, owing to the imperfection of language, there is nothing which the wisest man can indite that ingenuity cannot pervert to mean something totally different from what the author intended to convey; and had I, sir, perhaps, read the Secretary's report with the same querulous temper and morbid feeling which seems to possess my colleague in regard to that officer, and also possessed the same ingenuity in collating and construing language to mean exactly what I wish it to mean, I, too, might have discovered black spots, and picked many flaws in it. But I do declare, that after an attentive perusal, with a sincere desire to see them, that report did not strike me as being in any manner obnoxious to the severe criticism and harsh rebukes which my colleague had in anticipation bestowed upon it. After his second speech, his review of the document, in which he confidently asserted that its appearance had fulfilled all its predictions about it, I read it a second time with increased attention, and a similar desire to detect its vices; and I was alike unsuccessful in discovering the frauds and cheats and juggling by which it had been characterized. Nothing upon earth is further from my mind than to believe that Government has any the remotest idea of forming any the slightest connection with the banks, further than is justified by existing laws, is demanded by the creditors themselves of the Government, or grows out of the necessity arising from the neglect, nay, sir, I may almost say the refusal, of Congress to provide and designate sufficient depositories for the funds of the Government. If such an intention were manifested, it would, sir, be for those with whom I act to complain, and complain they would. It would seem to me that it would be a source of pleasure to my colleague, unless, indeed, he goes entirely for victory, and will not use banks at all, except in the precise manner, and to the precise extent, he may think right and proper.

Sir, one of these bonds was sold. There is the solemn, written contract for cash. But my colleague denies that any cash was paid, because, I suppose, the Spanish milled dollars were not lugged all the way from Philadelphia to this city, and counted out to the Treasurer. The money, sir, was wanted for immediate use; and why? Because, sir, Congress sat here from the first Monday in December, 1837, to the 9th day of July, 1838, and did not, till the last moments of the session, make provision to meet the debts of the nation; most of them, too, growing out of appropriations made by that very Congress, when they knew there was not money on hand to meet them. That is the reason the money was wanted for immediate use; but it was not wanted here. It was wanted in Florida, on the Canadian frontier, and at distant points in the far West, and elsewhere, to pay your Army and Navy, and other public creditors; and was, in my opinion, wisely and prudently left in Philadelphia, whence it could be with facility and certainty, and "without cost or charge" to the Government, remitted when or where it was wanted. Sir, is a sale less a cash sale, because my convenience or my interest induces me to leave the proceeds in the hands of the purchaser, subject to my order? My colleague seems to think that the terms of the law, "cash in hand," or "ready money," would require that the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Treasurer, should have actually received into his hands, should have fingered the millions of dollars. Sir, this sale was, to all intents and purposes, a cash sale; it so purports to be in the solemn written contract; it so proved to be, both to the Government and the bank; and ought so to appear to my colleague above all others, as it was for specie, or its equivalent—that is, the notes of specie-paying State banks, which he thinks "as much a constitutional currency as gold and silver," (which I do not.)

Mr. President, it is no part of my present plan to go into an analysis or minute defense of the report of the Secretary. That work has been so luminously and efficiently performed by my friend from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] that a further prosecution of it would be supererogation. This, however, I will say, that after the most careful examination of his conduct, I do deliberately think that when the situation of the country, the peculiar embarrassments of the currency, the emptiness of the Treasury in consequence of the failure of Congress timely to provide ways and means to meet their heavy drafts upon it—his entire privation, ever since the spring of 1837, of the ordinary depositories of the public money, added to the many other difficulties he has had to encounter, shall be duly and impartially estimated—he ought, and will receive the thanks of the country for his steady, patient, and untiring labor, and for his firm, persevering, and successful efforts to keep the currency of the country, as far as existing laws permit, within the range and meaning and limitation of the Constitution. But, Mr. President, the whole tenor and temper of the speeches of my colleague prove, beyond all doubt, on the mind of any man who heard them, that it was not the humble Secretary at whom his barbed and poisoned shafts were aimed. On a former, and a memorable occasion, when another Secretary of the Treasury was the object of bitter denunciation in this Chamber, and was held to be responsible for acts required by the President to be done by him, my colleague proved that the Secretary was but the arm, the organ of the President; and but a few days ago, he said that the present incumbent was his mere "cat's paw." It is not with a "cat's paw" that he has been intending to deal on the present occasion. No, sir, he had higher game in view. It was at the President he aimed his javelin; no man who heard him can doubt it. And, sir, nothing that he said more astonished me than to hear him—yes, sir, him above all other men—reiterating the stale slang about Executive patronage, and the "purse and the sword," and chanting over again the old "doleful jeremiad" about "a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself."

Mr. President, I know nothing about this wonderful thing called Executive patronage. I have never tasted of it, and cannot, therefore, speak of its blighting influence on the moral character and independence of those who bask in its sunshine. There was a time, a few years ago, when it was said to be used to its utmost extent. Complaints of its use, and its abuse, were louder during a portion of General Jackson's administration than ever before, or since. My colleague was in Congress at that time. I do not recollect that he then raised his voice against this corrupting influence; but I do recollect that he received a pretty good slice of the patronage of that day. During the same Administration, when a hero, a military chieftain, a conqueror, a warrior, indeed, who had done bloody service with his sword, sat in your presidential chair, there was a prodigious outcry about this same danger from the "purse and the sword" in the hands of the Executive. My colleague was then a member of this body, and boldly stepped forward to prove that such an idea was absurd and ridiculous, inasmuch as the power to raise money, (the purse,) and the power to raise armies, (the sword,) were both, by the Constitution, confined to Congress. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, in my eye, [Mr. CLAY,] will recollect how fiercely my colleague contested this point with him, and how clearly he put down the inference he had erroneously drawn from an expression of Patrick Henry about the States having parted with the "purse and the sword," by showing that Mr. Henry only meant to say that the States had given to Congress the power to raise money and to raise armies. And, after all this, is it not most strange, passing strange, that now, when a man of peace—a meek, mild, placid man—one whose whole life has been devoted to civil pursuits, and who, I dare say, never had an epaulet on his shoulder or a sword upon his thigh, is the President of the United States, my colleague should feel alarmed about the "purse and the sword" being in the hands of the Executive. Sir, I can scarcely realize this. There is something amusing in the thought of danger from the sword in the hands of our little President. Why, sir, he could hardly lift a grenadier's broadsword; but, sir, it is the danger from these "legions" of officers, these "Pretorian bands," whom our President is to head, sword in hand, and march to the Capitol, that has seized upon the imagination of my colleague. I hope he will get over his uneasiness on that score; and I assure him that it is too late in the day to frighten the people by such talk. If they could not be alarmed by the sword of Andrew Jackson, they will not be afraid of his pacific successor.

But this other terrible thing that we used, in days of panic memory, to hear so much about, and which my colleague has revived, this "power behind the throne greater than the throne itself." Perhaps, sir, if, when my colleague put himself behind the "throne," as he informs us he did, and gave his "advice and his warning," they had been followed, and he thus, in his opinion, became the "power behind the throne greater than the throne itself," we might not now hear from him all these deep lamentations, these bitter denunciations, these fearful forebodings, with which he is attempting to excite the public mind. When, some days ago, I heard my colleague allude to certain Senators on this side of the Chamber in a sarcastic, if not a sneering manner, as the pillars of this Administration, it filled me with strange feelings. I could not inquire where I was and to whom I was listening. Before and at the time, sir, when I was sent to the Senate by Virginia, I know well that that State claimed the proud honor of having on this floor a pillar of this Administration. Yes, sir; a lofty, bright, adamantine pillar; a pillar which had heretofore stood firm and unshaken against the many rude shocks, violent assaults, and wily arts of Whiggery. That pillar was my colleague. I was sent here to twine around and support it; I was sent here to cheer him on in that career which had already rendered him as dear to the Democratic party of America as it had rendered him hateful to the self-styled Whig. My support, I well know, could be but feeble indeed, except in the honest zeal with which it would be rendered; feeble as it might be, little did I think, and deeply have I been disappointed and mortified to find that it has been totally rejected. Feeble as I am, I will stand alone in this Chamber as the pillar of the Democracy of Virginia; and should the edifice be battered down over my head, and crush me to the earth, I had rather be the smallest fragment of such a pillar, which can be raked up from the rubbish, than to be the loftiest and proudest triumphal column which those who contribute to beat it down can ever erect upon its ruins.

Sir, my colleague, strange to tell, deploras most bitterly anything like party? He says "party, party; I go for my country!" Sir, this was an exclamation worthy of Brutus or Cato; but we do not, now-a-days, often see such men as they. Sir, I take no exception to the remark, although the assertion by any one gentleman, that he goes for his country may carry with it the inference that those who differ with him do not. No, sir, I take no exception, because the only way in which we can go efficiently for our country is through the medium of party; and, sir, because there is such a universal admission by the contending parties in this country, that each has at heart the good of the country, that whenever I hear a man who deems it necessary to say that he cares not for party, that he goes for his country, it does not, in the slightest degree, strengthen my estimation of his patriotism. No, sir; far from it. Far be it from me to deny, sir, that my colleague has gone for his country. I have labored too often and too zealously to shield him from the immolating wrath of the Whigs, and to contribute to his elevation, to have doubted that fact. Sir, he has been highly and justly honored by his country. But he should never forget that it was party which conferred upon him all those honors. Sir, I know of no man who has been more emphatically the child, the nursling of party, than my talented colleague. It was party that first sent him, a young man, into the Legislature of Virginia, where it had sent me a few years before. It was party that sent him to the Congress of the United States in the other end of this Capitol—the Democratic party. It was party that sent him thence as Minister to France—the Democratic party. It was party which, on his return to America, sent him to the Senate of the United States—that same Democratic party. It was party that drove him out of this Chamber—THE WHIG PARTY! It was party, sir, the same old Democratic party, that sent him back into it, and it will be party—a new party—the Neutral party, that will send him—I know not where—my sagacious and oft-prophetic friend from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] thinks to the Treasury Department; or, as it is in parlance, often called here, the Exchequer—(a custom, I think, "more honored in the breach than in the observance")—perhaps, for aught I know, to the White House itself; or mayhap to the dignified chair you now fill, in which some—not I; no, not I sir—but in which some say he might be now calmly, quietly, and contentedly sitting if he had not been jostled out of it.

But, sir, to this neutral party. I must, in furtherance of my object, to define my position, say something of it. I wish it to be most distinctly understood, that there is no neutrality in regard to party politics in my composition; and, such is my temperament, that I cannot well conceive how any man (as I before said) who has borne an active share in the storm of party politics which has long raged in our country, can possibly enjoy that state of blessed quiescence and composure. When my colleague first began to file off from those ranks in which he had long stood a prominent and active member, he called himself a Conservative. Yes, sir; we heard then of nothing but the Conservative party—Conservative—a sweet, a honeyed word. But in a little time, those of us who did not agree with this conservative party were called "SUBSERVATIVES," a very harsh and bitter word. These Conservatives, however, soon began to lose much of their sweetness, and became very spicy, and again changed their name, and called themselves the "Spartan band." Yes, sir, we saw the Spartan band, with Leonidas at their head, forcing their way through the strong hosts of Democracy, over to the Whig camp; and now that they "read their title clear" to rank in that camp, they again change their names, and call themselves Neutrals—yes, Neutrals; and we now hear, as if from Jupiter Tonans himself, of nothing but the thunder of the armed neutrality. Now, Mr. President, I have said that I never was, and am not, a neutral in party politics. Should I ever become one; (which is very improbable,) I do sincerely hope that I may be enabled, with Christian meekness, to fold my arms and say, "God bless the Commonwealth;" or, if that divine feeling is denied me, that I may, with the justice of Aristides, and the impartiality of Cato, look upon the battle-field, and suffer no consideration whatever to induce me, in my necessary intercourse between the great belligerents, to deal in articles "contraband of war." And above all things, if the great law of nature and justice, self-defense, shall drive me to arm as a neutral, that I may endeavor to deal my blows with strict impartiality; and, if anything, look rather with a kindly eye to those who had ever been my friends and allies, and with one of suspicion and fear to that party who, through all time, had hated and reviled me. I do not mean, sir, to question or impeach the impartiality with which my colleague will discharge the delicate duty of a neutral armed at all points. I trust that it will be his intention to be strictly impartial in the blows which he says he will have to deal out on the right and the left. I do not know how deeply wounded or how keenly pained have been the great belligerent Whig party, by the blows he has already inflicted on them; but candor compels me to say, that their adversaries, the Administration party, have felt that his sword "was sharper than a serpent's tooth."

But, sir, it may not be amiss to look a little further into this thing of a third party, no matter by what name they may call themselves. None that has ever arisen in this country, or in England, has lived long as a distinct, independent party. It is not consistent with the nature of man, or with the institutions of either of these countries, that such parties can long maintain a distinctive, separate existence; and if a minority or third party could long exist in this country, and wield the power set up for this aforesaid "armed neutrality," to regulate and control the conduct of the other two great parties—that is, to rule the will of the great majority of the people—I, for one, should think it a most deplorable case indeed; and have no hesitation in saying, that the pretension thus set up for this party is more dangerous to the liberty of the people, and more directly hostile to the principles of our blessed Constitution, than any I have ever yet heard urged against them.

Do you, sir, recollect the memorable third party, yclept the minority party, that sprung up about the year 1806? I am sure you do, much better than I. John Randolph of Roanoke was at the head of that party; yes, sir, John Randolph, the great, the talented, the proud, the daring John Randolph, was its head and founder. Compared to any minority party, before or since, it was greatly superior, both in talent and numbers. And what became of it? It melted away; and in a few years not a trace or vestige of it was left:

"Like the snow falls in the river;

A moment white, then gone forever."

It was fierce and formidable for a while; but it soon lost all its strength and dissolved, and its members took their stations in one or the other of the two great contending parties of the day; which, most assuredly, with some slight shades of difference growing out of the altered condition of the country, and a change of name, were the same identical two parties that fought the battle of 1798, and are now again struggling for ascendancy. It may be worthy of remark, as to that minority party, to state that John Randolph, with all his talents and zeal and fiery temper and love of conquest, never set up the pretension to "an armed neutrality." He laid no claim to the delusive inference, speciously drawn by sophistical analogy, and with diplomatic subtlety, from the position of Queen Catherine of Russia—to control the destinies of the nation, and subject the will of the majority to the power of a small minority of the people. No, sir; John Randolph of Roanoke, with all his peculiarities, was, in many respects, one of the purest republicans America has ever had. He adhered with pertinacious nicety to the principles of the Constitution as its framers intended them, and not as its latitudinous construers would have them to be; and, above all things, he valued the great principle at the root of all our institutions, that the majority should govern the minority; and however haughty and aristocratic he might seem in his personal carriage, he more than once, in a manner and under circumstances which evinced his devotion to that great principle, bowed to the "majesty of the people," when ostracised by a majority of their suffrages. No, sir; the great object of the third party, headed by John Randolph, in the year 1806, was to change the minority into a majority; and in that way, and that only, to rule the country. Failing in that plan, the party was dissolved, without a resort to arguments drawn from the position of Queen Catherine of Russia, to break in upon the great principle which lies at the foundation of our institutions. No, sir; John Randolph scorned, knowing that he was in a minority, to exert power in any other way. He scorned to hold the balance and, as did the monkey in the fable who weighed for the two cats, pinch off first from the one scale, and then from the other, till he had robbed them of all their cheese.

Sir, the longest-lived minority party I have ever heard of is the one which has existed for some years past in France, under the name of the third party. What has been its history? In reading, a short time ago, an extract from a French newspaper, I was struck with its speaking of the "Sofa party." I at first supposed that a fourth political party had risen up in France to confound their confusion; but, on reading a little further, I discovered that the writer was speaking of the same old French third party that has made so much noise in the world; and which had acquired the cognomen of the "SOFA PARTY," because—what do you suppose, Mr. President, was the cause? Why, sir, because they are now so reduced in numbers that they can all sit together on a sofa! Such, sir, will be the fate of this Conservative party, this Spartan band, this armed neutrality. They may, sir, have to sit for a season on what, I believe, in some of our churches is denominated the anxious bench; and may, perhaps, be required to subscribe their faith, and give in their experience, before they can gain full admission into the temple of the great church militant of Whiggery, and take their seats on the sofa, alongside with the fathers and elders of that renowned sect.

Mr. President, I am truly sorry that I have been compelled to break silence at all, on this occasion, and pained to be compelled to break it in strains which may not be agreeable to my colleague; but it is the misfortune of this life that most of our sacred duties are of a painful character. The one which I have been constrained to discharge this evening is of that description. Being so, I have postponed its discharge to the last moment, and to a period when none could say that I was interfering in the relations now existing between him and our mutual constituents. No, sir; I have been perfectly content that, without any the least interference on my part, he should manage those relations in his own way. I have meant no personal offense to him. This is not the place in which I would seek to indicate such a feeling, if I entertained it. My difference with him is entirely of a political character; and it has been my pride, and frequently my boast, that that difference had not disturbed our personal relations. I only seek, sir, and this is the only time, according to my notions, (which may have been fastidious,) in which I could find the opportunity to present myself fully and fairly to our mutual constituents, in the antagonistical position which it has been, most unexpectedly and painfully, my misfortune to hold towards my colleague, from the first moment I entered this Chamber to the present. I stand where I did when I was sent hither by Virginia. He, however, has thought proper, at this critical moment, to throw himself, with all his great weight, into one of the scales of that balance in which we are both to be weighed; and it is not in my nature, sir, to permit that in which he has left me to stand alone to "kick the beam," without a solitary feeble struggle to maintain its equipoise.

No man, Mr. President, in this Senate cares less than I do about retaining his seat in this Chamber. I would not, sir, to hold it for life, make an overture for the Whig vote of the Legislature of Virginia, or permit, knowingly, a single man in that Commonwealth to doubt my opinions in regard to this Administration, or any of the leading measures or men of the day. To the Whigs, as a party, I am utterly and absolutely opposed; as individuals, no man is disposed more fully and more liberally to appreciate them than I. Some of the dearest friends of my heart are of them. Both in the General Assembly of Virginia and throughout that Commonwealth, there are Whigs, as they call themselves, whose friendship I am proud to enjoy. I have long enjoyed it. They know that I never did, and never will deceive them.

Now, sir, by way of summing up, and recapitulating the definition I have desired to give of my position, in terms not to be doubted, or misunderstood by any, I take leave to say, that as AT PRESENT ADVISED, I prefer Martin Van Buren as the next President of the United States to any man who, to my knowledge, has been as yet named or thought of as his successor. I give him this preference because I thus far, in the main, approve of his administration of the Government; because he is in favor of a strict construction of the Federal Constitution, as laid down in Madison's celebrated report; because he is opposed to the bank, a bank, or any bank established by Congress, or any other department or power of the General Government; because he is opposed to a system of internal improvement by the General Government; because he is opposed to a protecting tariff, and is for quadrating, as near as possible, the revenue of the country to a reduced expenditure of public money, so as never again, if avoidable, to have a large surplus fund in the Federal Treasury, with which to debauch the State governments and demoralize the people. And, last, though not least, I am for him because he is a "NORTHERN MAN WITH SOUTHERN FEELINGS." Thanks to him for the stand he timely and magnanimously made, and is ever ready in the hour of need or peril to make, for the sacred compromises of the Constitution in regard to that great, vital, and delicate subject which is at this moment a burning torch in the hands of the vile incendiaries of the temple of our liberty and the Union. He did not, sir, wait till the battle had been fought and won before he defined his position to the vile Abolitionists. He stood side by side with us during the "heat and burden of the day." No southern man ought ever to forget his stand on that question.

Mr. President, my colleague has very frequently advised and invoked the Administration members of the Senate, of whom he knows me to be one, to bethink themselves, and pause in their mad career of party, and change their course. Let me now, in turn, most earnestly and most anxiously implore him to pause; yes, sir, to pause—for it is not too late—and reconsider his position and return to the fold of his old Democratic Republican friends, companions, admirers, and supporters. I do assure him that there is not one of them who is not grieved to part with him, and is not still willing to give him the fraternal hug, and forgive and forget all that has passed. We have required no sacrifice by him of his opinion or his conscience on any isolated measures. We are all prone to differ from each other in opinion, and it is the part of charity and kindness to think nothing of minor differences. There is nothing—I know it—there is nothing about which my colleague was ever more mistaken than in the intimation, if not the assertion often made by him, that there was a settled purpose to drive him from the ranks of the Administration party. When the first symptoms of his disaffection were manifested, no mother ever treated her infant babe with more tenderness than his old political associates in this Chamber were disposed to treat him; and they endeavored, to the utmost of their power, and by all their conduct, to afford him no pretext of that kind, if he should ultimately determine to abandon our camp. And may I say to my colleague, that if any newspaper editor or scribbler, or "organ," has injured or slandered him, he should have put it down to the freedom, if not to the licentiousness, of the press; and that, under any circumstances, it is far below the "elevated, statesmanlike feelings" he professes, to make their abuse a justification for leaving a party with whom he has so long cooperated, and who would so willingly have continued in fellowship with him; and of his cooperating with those between whom and him there has been, for an equally long period, a reciprocal hostility of the strongest character.

But, sir, if my colleague will not or cannot continue in communion with us, we may deplore, but we cannot help it. And, sir, as, on a recent occasion, my colleague, imagining that he saw a marriage about to be solemnized between the Government and the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, assumed, in the "name of his country, to forbid the bans," so, sir, should I perceive that a marriage is about to be solemnized between my colleague and the great Whig party, as I certainly believe will be, unless there is the most cunning coquetry on the one side, or should be a cruel jilting on the other, I will assume, in the name and behalf of the Democracy of my country, to confirm and ratify the bans, and give him away in marriage, (and certainly I never expected to stand sponsor to a runaway match;) and, sir, I will, on the solemn occasion, say to his new spouse that we have parted reluctantly with one of our dearest and most favorite children; that if he is treated with kindness and distinction he will be a valuable acquisition to his new connection, for that his dowry is rich indeed, consisting of all those precious family secrets which we never impart to any of our children, except to those of them who, we have good reason to think, will never quit the household, or marry out of the family.

Mr. President, I have done. I have discharged a painful duty. If any one thing, more than all others, could alleviate the painful task, it is the kind and profound attention with which the Senate, exhausted by a session of unusual length, have honored my remarks. My heart assures me that I shall never forget the compliment.

PUNISHMENT OF DEFAULTERS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. HUBBARD,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE SENATE, February 21, 1839,

On the bill providing for the better security of the Public Monies, and for the punishment of Public Defaulters.

Mr. HUBBARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senator from Massachusetts has presented to the Senate extracts from various acts of Congress, defining particularly the duties of certain officers connected with the Treasury Department, alleging that so express and well-defined were these duties, that it was impossible that there could have been any defalcation of any custom-house officer existing for any considerable length of time, without discovery and detection at the Department, had there been a faithful discharge of official duty. The Senator has not, in direct terms, charged upon Secretary of the Treasury any such dereliction of official duty; but the tenor and general character of his remarks, if not so designed, were calculated to make an impression upon the public mind that the recent defalcations in New York and elsewhere were to be attributed to the want of discharging properly and seasonably that supervisory power which the head of the Department was bound, as the Senator says, to exercise. And the Senator has contended that there is no necessity for further legislation on this subject; that we have law enough; all that is required is greater fidelity and diligence in the execution of the law.

It is my purpose, Mr. President, to show, and I trust that I shall be able to show most conclusively, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the discharge of his appropriate duties, could no more have discovered the frauds which have been practiced upon the accounting officers by collectors and receivers than any member of this Senate; that, with the returns of collectors' accounts for settlement, he has nothing to do. Under the laws of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury could not, without usurpation, exercise any control over the officers to whom they were made. Both classes were beyond his reach. He had no agency in their appointment, nor could he have any influence in their removal. They were accountable to a higher officer in our Government for the performance of their respective official functions. From the examination which I have given to this subject, I do not hesitate to declare, in the most unqualified manner, that, whatever may have been the faults of others, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the discharge of his official trust, could not have known of existing defaults in any officer charged with the collection of the public revenue; that there is no neglect of official duty to be imputed to him; that there is no sin of omission, or of commission, in reference to this subject, chargeable upon the head of the Department.

Before, Mr. President, I proceed to show the importance, the indispensable necessity, of further legislation upon this subject; of the additional legal provisions, which may not only lead to the discovery of frauds in the conduct of collectors and receivers, but which shall also bring to certain punishment all such offenders; before I advert to the penal provisions of the bill now before the Senate, the punishment which awaits the offender, the ignominy and disgrace consequential upon the seizure of the public money, I will proceed at once to show what are the provisions of existing laws touching the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the accounting officers of the Department, in order to make good my declaration that no blame can properly attach to the Secretary for any defalcation which may have arisen under his administration of that Department.

The act establishing a Treasury Department was approved September 2, 1789; and this act prescribes with minute exactness the duties of all the officers which then constituted that Department. The officers were a Secretary of the Treasury, a Comptroller, an Auditor, a Treasurer, a Register, and an assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, which assistant shall be appointed by the Secretary. The second section defines all the duties of the Secretary:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of the public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns; and to grant, under the limitations hereinafter established, or to be hereinafter provided, all warrants for money to be issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations made by law; to execute such services relative to the sale of the lands belonging to the United States as may be by law required of him; to make reports, and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, (as he may be required,) respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives or which shall appertain to his office, and generally to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform."

These constitute all the duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of 1789, when that Department was first established. And what is their sum? It would seem to be difficult to misapprehend the precise meaning of the terms of the section contained in the act above recited.

1. "He is to prepare and lay before Congress at the commencement of each session, a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures." "He is to recommend plans for the support of public credit," &c.

"He is to superintend the collection of the revenue." This, I admit, was the express provision of the act of 1789; and from this superintending power, vested as it was in the Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Massachusetts infers that that officer must have been derelict in the performance of that part of his duty, or he would have been able to have discovered and exposed the frauds which had been practiced for such a length of time by the returns of the collector of customs at New York. Let us examine this matter, and let us see whether this supervisory power has not, in effect, been taken from the Secretary of the Treasury, and devolved upon another, in pursuance of an act of Congress. It will be recollected that, by the act of 1789, there was provision made for an assistant secretary, to be appointed by the Secretary himself. By the act of the 8th of May, 1792, it will be found that the "Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the superintendence of the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, as he shall judge best; that the present office of assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury shall be abolished; and that instead thereof there be an officer in the Department of the Treasury, to be denominated Commissioner of the Revenue, who shall be charged with superintending, under the direction of the head of the Department, the collection of the other revenues of the United States," &c.

Under this discretionary power, given by this act to the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be found that, by a circular letter of October 25, 1792, the immediate superintendence of the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage was committed to the First Comptroller of the Treasury; but this delegation of power did not include the disposition and payment of moneys accruing from such duties. At this period of our history—as early as 1792—terminated the superintending power over the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, created by the act of 1789, and those very duties were transferred, in pursuance of law, to, and vested in, the First Comptroller, who has exercised that power under every Administration, from that period to the present time.

It cannot, then, be alleged, with even the shadow of truth, that the Secretary of the Treasury is justly chargeable for gross neglect of official duty in failing to exercise a superintending power over the collectors of the customs, when that power was, in pursuance of law, transferred to another officer in the Department. It cannot be said that the Secretary of the Treasury stands justly chargeable for the defalcations which have recently occurred, and which were undiscovered and undetected, when, by the laws of Congress, that officer is expressly excluded from exercising any jurisdiction whatever over the subject.

My purpose, Mr. President, is to defend the Secretary of the Treasury from the unmeasured and unwarrantable abuse which has been cast upon that officer in Congress and out of Congress—here and elsewhere—for an alleged neglect of official duty with reference to the recent defalcations which have taken place in the city of New York. Whatever may have been the fault of others, the head of the Treasury is blameless. Whatever may have been the neglect of other functionaries, the head of the Treasury Department has never failed to perform his whole duty, with all fidelity and integrity. I know him well; we were educated at the same institution; native citizens of the same State; practicing attorneys in the same courts; fellow-laborers in the same Legislature; and no man who is not less familiar with the official history of that man than I am, but must do him the justice to say, that fidelity and integrity, and the most untiring industry, are prominent characteristics of the present Secretary of the Treasury, in the execution and discharge of the responsible duties of public office.

But what further duties were imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of 1789, from which it can, by any possibility, be inferred that he was to exercise any supervision over the officers of the customs, so as to be enabled, from time to time, to ascertain the exact state of their public accounts? It is said, and said with truth, that "he is to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns;" but it will be found, on referring to the same act, that in the first instance, the Comptroller was "to report to the Secretary the official forms of all papers to be issued in the different offices for collecting the public revenue, and the manner and form of keeping and stating the accounts of the several persons employed therein." This was the business of the Comptroller. He was charged with the superintendence of the collection of the duties on imports, and it became his peculiar duty to submit to the Secretary the forms which he had presented, for his (the Secretary's) approbation. This was all; and it seems to me to be idle to contend that, inasmuch as the Secretary was to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts, and making returns, that he thereby must necessarily make himself, and should make himself, acquainted with the true condition and state of the accounts of the revenue officers, from time to time. The fact is otherwise, and is known to be otherwise. With those accounts the Secretary could not, without a usurpation of power, interfere. Nor could he, in any way or manner, interfere with the specific returns which were made to the accounting officers of the Treasury.

I will endeavor to show to whom those returns were to be made, and by whom they were to be examined. But before doing this, I will proceed and show some further duties the laws of Congress have imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury. By the act of 1789, and by the act of the 25th of April, 1812, the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the performance of certain duties in relation to the public lands; but the returns of all sales are made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. By the act of 10th of February, 1820, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to lay before Congress, on the first Monday of December, annually, or as soon thereafter as possible, the statistical accounts of the commerce of the United States with foreign countries for the preceding year; and, by referring to various acts of Congress, it will be found that certain, but well defined, duties have been, from time to time, imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury; but I state, fearless of contradiction, that, from 1792 to the present time, there cannot be found a single statutory provision requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, or giving any authority to that officer, to supervise the returns of the collectors of the customs, or in any way or manner to control the accounts of collectors and receivers.

But, Mr. President, we are not left in the dark upon this subject. While the law has defined the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, it has, with equal precision, defined the duties of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. And, first, what was the duty of the First Auditor of the Treasury imposed by the express terms of the act of 1789? and what were the duties of the First Comptroller as imposed by the same act? There can be no mistake in this matter. The terms of the act are plain, and whoever is disposed may easily understand its provisions; and, unless there is a disposition to "pierce the Secretary of the Treasury for the sins of others," unless there is a disposition to charge home upon him the default of every subordinate officer, the inspection and fair consideration of those provisions cannot fail to produce conviction, that not upon the Secretary of the Treasury is to be charged any neglect of official duty, by reason of which any portion of the public money has been fraudulently diverted to private use.

By the act of 1789 it is made the duty of the Auditor "to receive all public accounts, and, after examination, to certify the balance, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certicate, to the Comptroller, for his decision thereon: Provided, That if any person whose account shall be so audited be dissatisfied therewith, he may, within six months, appeal to the Comptroller against such settlement."

It, therefore, most clearly results that the Secretary of the Treasury can have nothing to do with the receipt, examination, and adjustment of these accounts of the collectors of the customs; for that duty is imposed upon the Auditor, by the same act which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to submit to Congress an annual statement of the public finances. The Auditor is required to receive and examine these accounts, with the vouchers; and there is no other officer designated in the acts of Congress to whom these accounts, with the vouchers, shall, in the first instance, be transmitted. They are not only to be received and examined with the vouchers, but they are to be adjusted and audited by the Auditor; and a certificate of balance in all cases, with the accounts and vouchers, is to be transmitted, not to the Secretary of the Treasury, for his revision, but to the Comptroller, who is to reexamine all accounts settled by the Auditor, and "to certify the balances arising thereon," not to the Secretary of the Treasury, but to the Register, whose duty it shall be "to preserve such accounts, with their vouchers and certificates;" and whose further duty it is "to transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury copies of the certificates of balances of accounts adjusted, as is herein directed." The accounts, with the vouchers, are nowhere required to be placed with the Secretary of the Treasury, for his examination; but simply a certificate of balances is transmitted to that officer, to enable him not only to make drafts to satisfy the public creditors, but also to enable him to make his annual statement to Congress of receipts and expenditures. It does seem that this highly vigilant and most faithful public officer has been most unjustly assailed with reference to this matter.

I again say that, with the accounts and the vouchers of the collectors of the customs, the Secretary of the Treasury has as little to do as any member of this Senate. I speak not without some authority upon this matter. The time was when it was supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury, from the fact of his being the head of the Treasury Department, had an appellate jurisdiction over this whole subject; and the time was when it was supposed that the President of the United States, from the fact of his being the highest officer under our Government, must necessarily possess a controlling influence over the decisions of those subordinate officers, the Auditor and the Comptroller; and on sundry occasions an appeal has been taken from the decision of the Comptroller to the President himself; and that, too, with reference to these very accounts, the consideration and final decision of which were imposed upon the Auditor and Comptroller by the express terms of the act of 1789, and which duty has not at any subsequent period been in the slightest degree abated or altered. This appeal to the President drew forth the opinion of the law officer of the Government, in relation to the power of the President over that subject, according to the existing laws of the land.

I will subjoin the opinion of the then Attorney General, Mr. Wirt, and I will also add to that, the opinion of the late Attorney General, Mr. Taney, upon the same subject. From their legal opinions, as well as from the language of the act of 1789, there is no room even to doubt that the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Auditor and Comptroller, have the sole and the exclusive jurisdiction over this whole subject, and that their decision is final, and that it is without the power of any other officer of the Government to alter or reverse their decision. Congress, and Congress alone, can grant relief, if injustice has been done to the officer rendering the account. I believe that in no instance, since the act of 1789, has the Secretary of the Treasury undertaken to reexamine the adjudications of the Comptroller. In the language of the ordinance of the 11th of September, 1781, "that, when an account is audited in the manner described, it shall be reported to the Comptroller; and any person who shall think himself aggrieved by the judgment of the Auditor, shall have the privilege of appealing to the Comptroller. In all such appeals, the decision of the Comptroller shall be conclusive." Such were the provisions incorporated into the act of 1789; and in perfect accordance with those provisions has been the opinions of the two Attorneys General above referred to.

In October, 1823, Mr. Wirt gave an opinion, showing that the President has not power to interfere with the duties of the accounting officers of the Treasury; and, if the President can exercise, in pursuance of law, no such power, it will be in vain to urge that such a power of necessity appertains to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Let us carry this principle to the laws which regulate the settlement of public accounts. In the original organization of the Treasury Department (Laws U. S., vol. 2, p. 48,) the duties of the officers are designated specifically. There was one Auditor and one Comptroller. The duty of the Auditor is declared to be to receive all public accounts, and, after examination, to certify the balance, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the Comptroller, for his decision thereon; with this proviso, that if any person be dissatisfied therewith, he may, within six months, appeal to the Comptroller against such settlement. Here the right of appeal stops; there is no proviso for an appeal to the President. With regard to the Comptroller, it directs that it shall be his duty to superintend the adjustment and preservation of all public accounts, to examine all accounts settled by the Auditor, and certify the balances arising thereon to the Register; no right of appeal from his decision to the President."

Again:

"Thus, in every instance, the decision of the Comptroller is declared to be final; and it is manifest that the law contemplated no further examination, by any officer, after such decision.

"How will it be possible for the President to perform these great duties, if he is also to exercise the appellate power of revising and correcting the settlements of all the individual accounts which pass through the hands of the accounting officers? Let it be remembered that, out of the vast multitude of these accounts which are annually settled by these officers, there are very few which are settled to the entire satisfaction of the claimants; and if every dissatisfied claimant has a right to appeal to the President, and to call upon him to revise and correct the settlement, the President would be constrained to abandon the great national objects which are committed to his peculiar care, and become the accountant general of the Government. Nor, if he should devote himself exclusively to the minor object, would he be able to accomplish it: for the whole duties of the five Auditors and two Comptrollers would be accumulated upon him in the last resort, together with all their responsibility for the correctness of the settlements; and, under this responsibility, he would have to perform, single-handed and alone, the whole work which the Legislature has found it necessary to partition out among those seven officers, aided by their respective retinues of clerks.

"My opinion is, that the settlement made of the accounts of individuals, by the accounting officers appointed by law, is final and conclusive, so far as the Executive Department of the Government is concerned. If an individual conceives himself injured by such settlement, his recourse must be to one of the other two branches of Government—the legislative or judicial."

Extract, on the same subject, from an opinion of Roger B. Taney, late Attorney General of the United States, dated April 5, 1832.

"These laws, as well, indeed, as those which preceded them on the same subject, appear to me not to contemplate any appeal to the President, and I think, therefore, that the decision of the Comptroller in this case is conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government, and that the President does not possess the power to enter into the examination of the correctness of the account, for the purpose of taking any measures to repair the errors which the accounting officers appointed by law may have committed. The party who supposes that justice has not been done to him, must seek relief in court, when a suit is brought against him, or may bring his claim to the consideration of Congress; and these, in my opinion, are the only means of redress left to General Taylor, if the accounting officers have erred in their decision."

But let us examine this matter a little further, in order to show that the Secretary of the Treasury can have no concern with the rendition, the settlement, or the final disposition of these accounts of the collector. It will appear that he has no power over the subject in the event that such officers fail to make the returns required by law. By the act of the 15th of May, 1820, it is provided:

"That when any collector of the revenue, receiver of the public money, or other officer, who shall have received the public money, before it is paid into the Treasury of the United States, shall fail to render his account or pay over the same, in the manner or within the time required by law, the Comptroller shall cause to be stated the account of such collector, receiver of public money, or other officer, exhibiting truly the amount due to the United States, and certify the same"— not to the Secretary of the Treasury, but—

"to the agent of the Treasury, who is authorized to issue a warrant of distress against such delinquent officer."

And under the act of the 29th of May, 1830, these statements are required to be made to the Solicitor of the Treasury, for the self-same object. But in all this proceeding the Secretary of the Treasury has no concern; and it is done, and often done, without his knowledge, certainly without his direction. The very organization of these respective offices excludes the idea that the head of the Department can have any concern with the examination and disposition of the accounts of collectors. While to the office of the Secretary may be attached ten or a dozen clerks, to the office of the Auditor on whom devolves, in the first instance, the receipt and examination of accounts with the Government, more than one hundred clerks are attached. And to the office of the Comptroller, whose duty it is to reexamine and ultimately to decide thereon, there is at least one fourth of the clerical force attached to his office which belongs to the Auditor's, and double of that which belongs to the office of the Secretary proper.

In May, 1832, a resolution passed the Senate,

"That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared, and laid before the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a plan for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, with a view to simplify the form of settling and keeping the accounts, and of rendering them more intelligible; of a more equal distribution of the labor and duties; and for abolishing some of the subordinate branches, and reducing the number of clerks in the Executive Departments."

This resolution was referred by the President to the present head of the Treasury Department; and at the commencement of the session of Congress in 1834, the present Secretary of the Treasury presented a detailed report, recommending a reorganization of that Department. Under the head of simplifying the forms of settling and keeping the accounts, and of rendering them more intelligible, the Secretary proposed some important changes in the duties of the Auditors and of the Comptrollers, with a view to the correction of any errors they might commit in the final settlement of public accounts. He also strongly recommended that there should be a commissioner of customs, and that the Comptroller should be relieved from that particular duty; and that he should be charged exclusively with those duties appropriately connected with the settlement and final controlling of accounts with the Government. The creation of such an office, with the appropriate duties defined as they were in that report, could not fail to impose proper checks in the disbursement of the public money, and in passing upon public accounts. But the recommendations of the Secretary were disregarded; for it will be found that the bill which was presented to Congress, consequent upon that report, did not contain the provisions which the Secretary had so strongly recommended. I have alluded to this fact to show that the attention of Congress has been recently directed to this subject; and yet no change whatever, in the mode of receiving and examining public accounts, has been made. It is the same now as it has been ever since 1789.

There is no doubt that, by a general regulation at the Treasury Department, all collectors and receivers of the public moneys are requested to make monthly returns of the aggregate of the receipts and expenditures at their respective offices, and in the districts where a large amount of the public revenue accumulates, weekly statements of their aggregate balances are requested to be made. But, Mr. President, for what purpose are these statements requested to be made? To enable the Secretary to compare them with the returns made to the accounting officers, in order to see whether they agree, or, if not, whether they furnish any intrinsic evidence that there is a wrong, an attempt to conceal the truth in these returns? No, sir; these abstracts, these statements of balances, are made to the Secretary for a totally different purpose, to enable him to discover at once the actual state of the public finances; to enable him to determine where he can draw, with propriety, to satisfy the public creditor, and to furnish him with the means of making to Congress his annual financial report. For the same purpose, the Secretary requires monthly statements of the aggregate amount of bonds, in order that he may be enabled to judge all the means of the Department; and, under the old systems, when bonds taken for customs were twelve, eighteen, and twenty-four months, such returns would enable the Secretary to present, with great precision, what would be the amount of the receipts from those sources in any one year; but since 1832, when the credits were reduced to three and six months, and when at least twenty-five per cent. of the duties on imports are received in cash, it has not been so easy or so certain to calculate on the amount of the annual receipts as it was formerly, under the old system of exclusive and of long credits. But it cannot fail to impress every man that these returns of balances cannot lead to the discovery of fraud where fraud exists, or to detect fraud where fraud is purposed. The running account with the vouchers are never transmitted to the Secretary, for the best of all reasons, that he has never been charged with their examination and adjustment.

In the Secretary's report, to which I have already referred, speaking of a possibility that a combination among officers, or an accident escaping the vigilance of officers, might lead to an improper withdrawal from the Treasury of some part of the public money—whereupon he remarked that, to guard against this, it might be advisable to require, by a standing law, what has been heretofore, at least on two occasions, (in 1794 and 1801,) that is, a periodical examination, by a committee of Congress, into the actual condition of the Treasury. That examination, going beyond the forms and records—beyond the face of all the accounts kept, and even the publication, required by the Constitution, of the receipts and expenditures of all public money—should, in a special manner, whenever the slightest suspicion exists, extend to a close inquiry into the settlement of any accounts; the occasion for every allowance; the rules and extent of all discretionary expenditures; the evidences of the actual amount of the money in the Treasury; or any other circumstance which would tend to detect error, or lead to salutary improvements in any of the existing laws." These all-important suggestions were alike disregarded by Congress. Defalcations had alarmingly occurred under former Administrations, and to guard against any such recurrence, as well as to prevent any improper withdrawal of the public money from the Treasury, the recommendations to which I have referred were submitted, and submitted in answer to a call from the Senate itself. But there has been since no action of Congress upon the subject; and if defalcations have arisen, and those defalcations cannot be charged upon any neglect of official duty in any public officer, it may fairly be considered whether the fault does not lay at the door of Congress—whether there has not been a great omission of public duty in this respect, on the part of the legislative branch of the Government. In view of this matter, and in the discharge of what they believed to be their duty, most emphatically urged upon us by recent events, the Committee on Finance have presented to the Senate the bill now under consideration. I do not propose to go into an examination of its details; that has already been done; but as a whole, it will furnish those guards for the safe-keeping of the public money, which have long been wanted. It will prevent any appropriation of the public funds to private use; it will most effectually lead to the discovery of any frauds which may be attempted by collectors and receivers in making their returns; and what is of the utmost importance, it imposes a severe penalty upon the transgressor. Not only will the accounting officers, if this bill shall be passed, be able to detect fraud, but also to bring to punishment the offender.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that there is law enough, but the fault is in the execution. Then, sir, every Administration, from 1789 to the present period, has been in fault. No, sir; there is a want of legislation upon the subject. More checks are demanded, and more guards are required, to preserve the public money in the hands of collectors, for the exclusive use of the Government. How stands the fact? What has been our history in relation to the defaults of public officers?

I have read the document about which much has been said elsewhere in the course of the present session. I refer to House document No. 111, and which was submitted to the House of Reprerepresentatives in January, 1839; and, if I rightly recollect, that document contained the names of one hundred and fourteen persons who had been collectors of the customs, and were returned as public defaulters. Nine tenths of those defaults occurred under the Administration previous to the last Administration. The laws which the Senator has recited were then in full force; they did not prevent defaults then; they did not then lead to the discovery of frauds. The same laws cannot now effectuate those objects; there is a defect in the law, and that defect the present bill is intended to supply. Why were not those laws sufficient to prevent the defaults of General King, of Mr. Wingate, of General Upham, and of Mr. Swanton? They occurred under the administration of the younger Adams, when those laws were in full force. Why were they not sufficient to detect the default of Robert Arnold, who stands recorded as a defaulter to the amount of more than eighty thousand dollars, with an official bond amounting only to five thousand dollars. This default also occurred under the administration of Mr. Adams; and, from my recollection, the report states that there is no expectation that this amount will be reduced by subsequent receipts. I mention these facts to show that the existing acts of Congress are not sufficient to prevent these frauds, and to preserve in safety the public money for the use of the Government. The imposition is practiced in the return itself; and, if the collector of the customs can induce some half dozen clerks to conceal the fraud, he can make, as he has from time to time made, such false returns to the accounting officers, and furnish to the Secretary weekly such false statements of the aggregate balances as to prevent the discovery and the detection of the fraud. But pass this bill, and you impose such a perfect system of well-ordered checks and guards that no collector, of himself, can make a false return without an immediate discovery of his fraud.

Up to 1835, a practice prevailed that, when the Auditor received the quarterly yearly returns from the collectors, &c., &c., the clerk in the Auditor's office having these returns in charge, was in the habit of handing those returns to a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the sole purpose of entering the footings, so as to show officially to the Secretary the amount of available means at the end of every quarter, to answer the same object, in fact, which the weekly and monthly statements to the Secretary from the collectors, of the aggregate balances, were intended to answer. No vouchers were ever handed with these official returns, and no means could thereby be afforded to the Secretary of the Treasury to detect the fraud, if fraud existed. The only way, as I have before stated, of detecting the fraud, is by a careful examination and comparison of the accounts with the vouchers at the Auditor's office.

This practice is now discontinued, and I have heard it said, among other things, by way of charge against the Secretary of the Treasury, that this was done at the instance of the Secretary. The practice, sir, was discontinued by the clerk in the Auditor's office; and, from inquiry, I have not been able to learn that the oldest clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury ever knew that these returns from the Auditor's office were made for the purpose of making an examination or comparison with any returns which may have been made direct to the Secretary himself. No such comparisons were ever made under any Administration. No such returns were ever made for any such purpose to the Secretary's office from the office of the Auditor.

I cannot close my remarks without again referring to the House document No. 111, in order to show that the existing laws do not afford sufficient checks and guards, and that further legislation is indispensably necessary, with a view to the security of the public money. That document states that William Brown, a collector at New Orleans in 1809, was a defaulter to the amount of more than $107,000; and if I have a right recollection of that case, he became a defaulter, and had actually absconded before the date of the last letter of instructions to him from Mr. Gallatin, the then head of the Treasury Department. Although there had been some little informalities as to the time of making his weekly statement of balances, &c., yet neither from the face of the accounts themselves, nor from any other source, was the Secretary of the Treasury led to suspect that all was not right in the case of this defaulter.

And as the present Secretary's circular to certain receivers has been somewhat severely, and, I think, unjustly animadverted upon, I will take the liberty to transcribe Mr. Gallatin's letter to Mr. Brown, in order to show that the present Secretary has high authority for the course he pursued, and that the sentiments, and even the language, of Mr. Gallatin, in his letter to Mr. Brown in 1809, reproving him for some omissions of duty, are very similar to the language used by Mr. Woodbury in his circular, wherein he undertook to complain for some omissions of official duty, and recommending, properly, in my judgment, a different course, rather than reporting the individual as unworthy of place—and who ought at once to be removed from office. I subjoin a copy of Mr. Gallatin's letter to Mr. Brown:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 4, 1809.

SIR: I have this day received eight weekly returns from you, from the 1st of July to 31st August last, with sundry other returns, some of which bore the post mark of November 13. As the standing instructions of this Department respecting weekly returns, and the particular instructions to you upon that subject, contained in my letter of the 25th of June last, have not been complied with, I take the liberty to repeat that it is indispensable that the weekly returns should be weekly made, and put in the post office immediately after the end of the week to which the return relates.

I have also this day received from the cashier of the office of discount and deposit your receipt for $100,000, taken up from him under the authority contained in my letter of the 9th of March last. It was not my intention, and the tenor of that letter implies it, that the whole of this sum should be drawn at once; but that, after the moneys in your hands were exhausted, you should draw on the bank, from time to time, to meet the debentures, as they should be presented to you for payment. If, therefore, you have not paid away, for debentures, the whole of that sum of $100,000, together with the sums remaining from your collections, and which appear to have amounted, on the 31st of August, to $23,000, you will be pleased, immediately on the receipt of this letter, to refund to the office of discount and deposit as much as may remain in your hands; and will continue, as fast as any moneys come into your hands, to apply them, from week to week, to the reduction of the balance of the advance from the bank, until it is wholly repaid.

I have received no statement of the debentures issued, nor any intimation from you of their amount. From the time when the money was taken up by you, I presume they were issued in the month of September. No statement for that month has been received, although the statement of debentures issued in the subsequent month of October came to hand by the last mail. This is an irregularity which ought not to have taken place. As you are not ignorant of the manner in which all your returns to this Department ought to be made, I must request your particular attention that no omissions or irregularities be permitted hereafter to occur.

You will be pleased to acknowledge the receipt of this letter by the first mail after its arrival.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., Collector, New Orleans.

Mr. President, I have said all that I wish to say. My object in rising was to defend the Secretary of the Treasury from charges which had been so often made, and constantly reiterated against him, on account of some knowledge which it is supposed that officer had of the late defalcations in New York, in such time as to have enabled him to expose the fraud, and to have convicted the wrong doer. It has been my purpose to show that a faithful and vigilant discharge of the appropriate duties of that officer could not, by any possibility, enable him to discover or detect any frauds which any collector, in his official returns, might intend to practice. I have endeavored to show that to the accounting officers of the Treasury belong, and exclusively belong, not only the receipt, examination, and final adjustment of such accounts, but I have also shown that to the First Comptroller belongs the business of superintending the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and that so specific are the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, as pointed out by the existing laws, that without undertaking at his mere motion to perform the official duties of other officers, he could not have discovered any falsities or frauds contained in the return of the collectors of customs or of any of the receivers of the public moneys.

As the friend of the Secretary of the Treasury, I look forward with entire confidence to the publication of the report of the committee of investigation, who have this whole subject in charge; and if justice shall be done to that distinguished officer in that report, as I cannot doubt it will be, I have every reason to believe that he will be entirely exonerated from all blame and from every unworthy imputation. I am perfectly aware of the nature and character of the charges which have been made and circulated against the Secretary of the Treasury, with reference to the recent defalcations in New York, and with reference to other defaults which have recently occurred. But, sir, let the report come; let the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, be faithfully presented to the American people; let party prejudice be laid aside, and a just account given of these transactions, and I have no doubt that it will be discovered that these charges against, and these attacks upon, the public conduct of the Secretary have been made without right and without authority.

It is known to you, Mr. President, it is known to me, it must be known to us all, that most extraordinary allegations have been made against the Secretary, pending the present session of Congress, in this Senate, and out of this Senate. If, sir, there was any reliance to be placed on popular rumor, if the public journals of the times could be regarded as the faithful chronicles of passing events, long before this we had a right to expect to have had the Secretary of the Treasury arraigned before this Senate to answer for high misdemeanors to be preferred against him by the House of Representatives. I have felt some solicitude, some anxiety, to have such a proceeding instituted against my friend. It would be to him the proudest day in his whole life. He would then have the opportunity to meet his accusers face to face; and he would then be able to show forth that integrity of character, that uprightness of purpose, which belongs to him—to convince his accusers, and to satisfy the American people of the great injustice done him.

In conclusion, Mr. President, all that I have to say is, that those who have been so prolific and constant in their charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, have mistaken their aim; for, notwithstanding the attacks which have been made upon, and which are, day following day, repeated against him on this floor and in another part of this Capitol, but little impression is made abroad. It is manifest that intelligent and patriotic portions of the community, (while those things are going on here,) are giving to the Secretary the most gratifying evidence of their unshaken confidence in him, and of their fixed determination to give support to his public and official acts.

SETTLERS IN CREEK INDIAN COUNTRY.

REMARKS OF HON. R. CHAPMAN, OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1839.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate for the relief of certain settlers in the country acquired from the Creek Indians, who lost their improvements, to which they were entitled under the pre-emption law of 1834, by the location of the reservations for chiefs and orphans of that tribe, with an amendment.

Mr. C. said that the amendment reported only changed the phraseology, not the sense, of the bill; and he hoped it would be concurred in. He said that, as the session was so near a close that this bill might not be reached if ordered to the Committee of the Whole, which was the usual course, he asked the House to consider it at once, since it proposed no appropriation, and therefore did not, under the rules of the House, require commitment.

Mr. LINCOLN, having moved to commit the bill, insisted that it proposed an appropriation of land, and consequently was embraced within the rule requiring commitment as much as if an appropriation of money was proposed.

Mr. CHAPMAN said he lamented the necessity, at this time, of resisting the motion to commit; but as that course would probably, if adopted, defeat the bill, he was constrained to oppose it. He said that, as the vote on the motion pending would probably decide the fate of the bill, he must ask the House to indulge him in making a brief explanation of its provisions, and the peculiar claim to relief the individuals had for whose benefit it was intended. He was never disposed to waste the time of the House, especially when so little remained in which to transact the great amount of important public business, and would promise not to consume as much in stating the merits of the bill, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] had in the technical objection he had made to its consideration at this time.

After the treaty with the Creek Indians, these settlers had removed into the territory acquired, and made valuable improvements on fertile land. Indeed, he had been informed that they are much the most valuable improvements in the country. At the passage of the preemption law in 1834, they were completely embraced within its provisions; and, at the time of the first land sale in the Creek country, (in January, 1834,) they were actually settled on their improvements. At that time, the chiefs' and orphans' reserves, authorized by the Creek treaty to be selected, had been already located by Colonel Bright, the agent appointed for that purpose, but upon unimproved though fertile land. After this, and while these settlers were peaceably residing on their own improvements, not even subject to be divested by these contingent locations, (for they had been selected by the agent,) that agent was prevailed upon to remove the locations he had at first made for the chiefs and orphans, and place them on the valuable improvements of these settlers, only rendered more valuable than the lands before located on by the labor and expense of these industrious and enterprising citizens. Mr. C. said it was not certain but that these injured settlers might have successfully resisted the authority and binding effect of the change of locations; but they were too poor to undertake a controversy so expensive; and were forced to give up their homes, and, with their families, seek shelter elsewhere, relying on the justice of this Government to make them compensation for their losses.

Mr. C. said, that very soon after he had the honor of holding a seat on this floor, he had brought this subject before Congress, and made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of these settlers. That bill had been again and again reported by him to this House, but, like many other important measures that propose to relieve only one class of citizens, he had found it impossible to get it directly considered. The bill he had reported proposed nothing more than those individuals were justly entitled to. But still it proposed much more than this. That bill proposed an absolute grant to those settlers of one quarter section of land, subject to private entry, by paying the fees of office only; or a quarter section of other land not settled upon, at Government price. This bill proposes no grant, but only authorizes such settlers who establish the facts I have stated as the ground of their claim by proof, to enter any land at Government price not settled upon.

The advantage this bill proposes is inconsiderable indeed, for in the country to which they are confined, I assure the House, but little land worth more than Government price can be found, if any, not now settled upon. But still they propose to take this bill, rather than submit to further delay, or get nothing.

Mr. C. said he could show precedents for a grant, without price, of three hundred and twenty acres to each settler in Arkansas, under similar circumstances; but for these citizens no such benefit is asked, nor, indeed, anything that can possibly prejudice the Government, for no land sells for more than a fraction over the minimum price, and they are required to pay that much.

Mr. C. said that on several occasions this bill has passed the Senate, and has been lost in this House, either for want of time, or for some objection made to it here. One objection has been heretofore that, under its provisions, a great many might claim who are not entitled. This bill guards against any such frauds; however, since the last session, proof has been made of all who are entitled, which is now on your table, and the whole number does not exceed sixty or sixty-five. He knew most of them personally, and more honest, industrious, respectable citizens cannot be found in any country, nor none more meritorious. He was conscious of having most earnestly pressed the claims of these citizens, since he had been a member of this body. No opportunity had been suffered to pass unimproved, to obtain for them that justice he had been satisfied they were entitled to, before he had a seat here. He had been less fortunate in this House than the able and efficient Senators from his State, in the other, had been in their efforts, and consequently some had insinuated a want of zeal on his part, in pressing this measure; but he would not regard such insinuations, and should, in despite of them, continue to urge their claims.

Pending the motion of Mr. LINCOLN to commit, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion prevailed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. G. HARRISON, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 15, 1839,

Vindicating the doctrines and principles contained in certain resolutions submitted by him to the select committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of the public lands.

The following are the resolutions of Mr. HARRISON:

Resolved, That the powers of the Federal Government result from the compact to which the States are parties, limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and are no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in the compact.

2. That State sovereignties are only diminished by powers specifically enumerated in this compact, or by such as are necessary to carry the specified powers into effect.

3. That there being no terms or conditions mentioned in the Constitution by which new States coming into the Confederacy should be bound or restricted, each and every State, whether now or old, as a member of this Confederacy, has "the same rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence, in all respects whatever," as another; and is as completely sovereign, to all intents and purposes, as it was, or would have been, had the Union never been formed, except only so far as it has given certain rights and powers to the General Government, enumerated in the Constitution, for specified purposes.

4. That the right of exclusive jurisdiction to the utmost limits of State territory is an unqualified and undeniable attribute of sovereignty; and as by the nature of the reserved rights, and the terms of the Constitution, no one State has a greater portion of reserved rights than another, so no other power whatever has any right to interfere, by legislative enactment or otherwise, with the property or rights of property which lie within the acknowledged limits of any of the States, since these are subjects of a local character, and appropriate only for local legislation.

5. Resolved, therefore, As the States of this Confederacy, "in all respects whatever, are equally free, sovereign, and independent," no conditions being imposed or required by the Constitution upon those that might be admitted into the Union, that all restrictions and conditions upon the new States, on their admission, being opposed to the fundamental principles and analogies of the Government, and not sanctioned by the Constitution, are null and void; and that each new State, upon being admitted into the Union, being "as free, sovereign, and independent as the other States, in all respects whatever," was solved, by the act of admission, from all terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations whatever, whether under deeds of cession, ordinances, or compacts, and became, ipso facto, the absolute, unqualified, and uncontrollable sovereign of the soil lying within its respective limits and jurisdiction.

Mr. HARRISON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the investigation which I propose to make of the doctrines and principles set forth in the resolutions which I submitted to the select committee to whom the subject of the public lands was referred, I deem it proper to state, at the threshold, that no extraneous influence whatever induced me to introduce these resolutions, which have been so unceremoniously denounced as "startling, monstrous, and extraordinary." I consulted no human being on the subject. I had no secret or disguised object in view, either personal or political. It was not my wish or intention that the resolutions should be connected with any party, or any influence that was now agitating the country; nor did I look forward to any feeling of popular favor that might be attained by their introduction, since it is my unalterable determination not to apply again for a seat upon this floor upon the expiration of the time I have yet to serve. I have been actuated by higher motives, and influenced by considerations of a more comprehensive and patriotic character. It is my sober and deliberate conviction that these resolutions contain a true exposition of the relative powers and rights of the new States, and advance no doctrine that is not sustained by the Constitution, by the early documentary history of the country, and by all the fundamental principles and analogies of the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] and myself differ widely on the questions involved in this subject. Were I to admit his premises, I should be forced to adopt his conclusions. But I go behind all the positions he has taken, and contend, and shall endeavor to show, that the compacts made between the General Government and the several States that made the cessions, upon which he seems to rely with so much confidence, do not give the power to bind and restrict us, as has been exercised towards us; that they could not give the powers claimed, because, having been made during the existence of the Articles of Confederation, that instrument positively prohibited, and the Constitution of the United States, coming into existence upon the dissolution of the Articles of Confederation, nowhere authorized, the exercise of such powers. I go further: I not only maintain the doctrine that these compacts do not give the powers which are claimed, and if they did, that they are void, because against the express letter of the Articles of Confederation, which were the paramount law of the land at the time these compacts were made; but also, that it never was the intention of those who framed those articles that the Federal Government should have the power of owning the lands lying within the limits of a State: in fact, sir, so far from entertaining any such idea, that they did, in the most positive and unequivocal manner, express a contrary intention. And this I will prove from facts that occurred at that period, constituting a portion of the history of that day, which cannot be met, contradicted, or denied.

In the examination of these resolutions we must look closely at the nature and character of our Government, its Constitution, the object and extent of the powers granted, and of the rights and powers of the several States anterior and subsequent to the formation of the Confederacy. It is in this way that I mean to examine the subject, and endeavor to establish all the principles which I have advanced.

The Federal Government is the creature of the States, made by them for their common benefit; and the Constitution of the United States the great charter of Federal power. The beauty of the system is, that the Federal Government, having been created for certain great national purposes, which could not have been attained so well without a common Union, deriving all its powers from the States that formed it, can exercise none but such as are specifically granted and enumerated in the instrument that contains these powers. And if we desire to know whether the General Government can exercise a particular power, the only guide that we have in making such inquiry is the Constitution. The powers, therefore, of the General Government are binding, so far as they are given, and all laws, compacts, treaties, and ordinances, made without authority from the Constitution, are void.

In section third of article fourth of the Constitution of the United States, we find the power that is given for the admission of new States. It is contained in one short line. It says, "new States may be admitted into the Union." The language is plain and simple. No power is found connected with the power to admit which authorizes the General Government to impose conditions and restrictions upon the new States when admitted into the Union. Now, as the Constitution is an instrument containing delegated powers only, authorizing the Federal Government to exercise such alone as are specifically granted and enumerated, I call upon gentlemen opposed to me on this subject to inform me how, and from whence they get the power to impose conditions upon the new States, which were not and cannot be imposed upon the original thirteen. Is not the power for the admission of the new States full and perfect? Was it left unfinished by the wise men that made the Constitution? Or did they mean that the power expressly granted of admitting new States should carry along with it others of a broader and more unlimited character not enumerated in the grant?

The Constitution says, "the powers not delegated to the United States, by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Now, the power to impose conditions upon the new States is not a delegated power—it cannot be found in the Constitution. And if it be not a delegated power, by what authority are these conditions imposed upon us? The compacts, even if they intended to give such a power, could not do so, as the powers in the Constitution could not be enlarged, altered, or diminished by any compact or ordinance whatever.

With these general remarks upon the character and principles of our Government, I shall proceed to a particular examination of those compacts by which it is contended the new States are bound. But it may be proper to look into the causes which led to these compacts, before examining the compacts themselves, as calculated to explain the objects which were to be gained.

Before and during the revolutionary war many of the States laid claim to a vast extent of vacant territory. These claims excited murmuring and discontent among those who had no such claims, or whose claims were not so clear. They contended that, as the war was carried on by the common sacrifice of blood and treasure, the lands belonging to the Crown of Great Britain should, upon the successful issue of the war, become the common property of all the States, and go to discharge the debt incurred by the war. To quiet the discontent that prevailed, and to obviate the difficulties and troubles that were constantly rising in view, Congress appealed to those States that laid claim to this vacant territory to cede it to the Federal Government, for the purpose of allaying the heartburning which was then corroding the peace and disturbing the good feeling of the Confederacy. No cession was made before the appeal of Congress on the subject; and it is by reference to the acts of Congress alone that we can rightly understand the real objects which they had in view in appealing to the States to make the cession.

The first movement on this subject was the resolution of the 6th September, 1780. This may be regarded as the first dawning of the light which afterwards breaks upon us in full blaze from other acts that followed.

"That having duly considered the several matters to them submitted, they conceive it unnecessary to examine into the merits or policy of the instructions or declaration of the General Assembly of Maryland, or of the remonstrance of the General Assembly of Virginia, as they involve questions, a discussion of which was declined on mature consideration, when the Articles of Confederation were debated; nor, in the opinion of the committee, can such questions be now revived with any prospect of conciliation; and it appears more advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the General Confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of our Army, to the vigor of our councils and success of our measures, to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people; that they are fully persuaded the wisdom of the respective Legislatures will lead them to a full and impartial consideration of a subject so interesting to the United States, and so necessary to the happy establishment of the Federal Union; that they are confirmed in these expectations by a review of the aforementioned act of the Legislature of New York, submitted to their consideration; that this act is expressly calculated to accelerate the Federal alliance, by removing, as far as depends on that State, the impediment arising from the western country, and for that purpose to yield up a portion of territorial claim for the general benefit: Whereupon,

"Resolved, That copies of the several papers referred to the committee be transmitted, with a copy of the report, to the Legislatures of the several States; and that it be earnestly recommended to those States who have claims to the western country, to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may effectually remove the only obstacle to a final ratification of the Articles of Confederation; and that the Legislature of Maryland be earnestly requested to authorize their delegates in Congress to subscribe the said articles."

It is unnecessary to dwell on the language of this report and resolution. The object is manifest. To pay the debt incurred by the war, and to silence the murmuring that was beginning to break forth into audible and serious complaint, was the design of Congress in making the appeal to the States. On the 10th of October, 1780, Congress again addressed the States on the subject. This resolution, it will be seen, is stronger in its terms, and more direct in its meaning, than that of the 6th September:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and HAVE THE SAME RIGHTS OF SOVEREIGNTY, FREEDOM, AND INDEPENDENCE AS THE OTHER STATES; that each State which shall be so formed shall contain a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit. That the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred, since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British posts, or maintaining posts or garrisons within and for the defense, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed."

The language here employed is of a most striking character. Congress solemnly promises the States, upon relinquishing their claims, that the territory so ceded "shall be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and HAVE THE SAME RIGHTS OF SOVEREIGNTY, FREEDOM, AND INDEPENDENCE AS THE OTHER STATES." What were "the rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence" which belonged "to the other States" at that time? How far, and to what extent, were the old States free, sovereign, and independent, at this particular period in the history of our country? "The rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence," which then belonged to them, is our inheritance at this day, which cannot be taken from us by any power on earth. And the compact with Virginia does not conflict with, or in any degree impair, the rights here mentioned. In truth, it confirms all that was promised. The States not yet complying with the earnest appeals that had been made, Congress again addressed them on the same subject, April 18, 1783, through the means of a committee appointed for that purpose, of which Mr. Madison was chairman. Still unsuccessful, Congress made another appeal to the States, in the resolution of the 29th April, 1784, which is in more precise language than the former resolution, as Congress explains, in a definite manner, what was intended by the resolution of 10th October, 1780. This is the resolution:

"Congress, by their resolution of September 6, 1780, having thought it advisable to press upon the States having claims to the western country a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims; by that of the 10th of October, of the same year, having fixed conditions to which the Union should be bound on receiving such cessions; and having again proposed the same subject to those States in their address of April 18, 1783, wherein, stating the national debt and expressing their reliance for its discharge on the prospect of vacant territory, in aid of their resources, they, for that purpose, as well as to obviate disagreeable controversies and confusions, included in the same recommendations a renewal of those of September 6th and of October 10th, 1780, which several recommendations have not yet been complied with:

"Resolved, That the same subject be again presented to the same States, (to the attention of,) that they be urged to consider that the war being now brought to a happy termination by the personal services of our soldiers, the supplies of property by our citizens, and loans of money from them as well as from foreigners, these several creditors have a right to expect that funds shall be provided on which they may rely for their indemnification; that Congress still consider vacant territory as an important resource; and that, therefore, the said States be earnestly pressed, by immediate and liberal cessions, to forward these necessary ends, and to promote the harmony of the Union."

I would here call the particular attention of the House to the language that is here employed. It says:

"Congress, by their resolution of September 6th, 1780, having thought it advisable to press upon the States having claims to the western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims; by that of the 10th October of the same year, HAVING FIXED CONDITIONS TO WHICH THE UNION SHOULD BE BOUND ON RECEIVING SUCH CESSIONS," &c.

What "conditions?" By what was the Union to be bound on receiving such cessions? Why, sir, that new States should be made out of the territory so ceded, which should be admitted with "THE SAME RIGHTS OF FREEDOM, SOVEREIGNTY, AND INDEPENDENCE AS THE OTHER STATES." This was one of the conditions. The other was, that the territory ceded should constitute a source of revenue to pay the debt incurred by the Revolution. Now, if the conditions were fixed by the resolution of October, 1780, by which the Union should be bound on receiving these cessions, I ask, how can they be altered or changed? They still exist for the benefit of the States that were to be carved out of this territory, and which were to be admitted into the Union. These resolutions show not only the motives which impelled Congress to ask that the cessions should be made, but also the consideration which was offered as an inducement to the States to make the cessions. These historical facts are particularly important, as it is presumable they contain all the reasons which influenced Congress to address the States upon the propriety of making the cessions, and especially as they are antecedent to the cessions, as well as the Constitution of the United States.

The cessions, upon these earnest and repeated applications of Congress, were made; and, as it is my object to examine these deeds of cession with a rigid scrutiny, to discover if there be anything in them incompatible with the "rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence" which were promised and guaranteed to the States that might be admitted into the Federal Union, I shall take up and comment upon the deed of cession made by Virginia, as a sample of the whole.

In treating of these deeds of cession, it must be borne in mind that they were compacts made by and entered into between two parties; and also that they were made during the existence of the Articles of Confederation. For, in the examination of these compacts, it will be found that there are expressions in them which cannot be understood without reference to the Articles of Confederation.

It cannot be denied that the State making the cession had the right to impose the conditions, if conformable to the Articles of Confederation, and that the Government accepting them could not afterwards enlarge, add to, or diminish the terms of the cession, without the consent of the other party. Being a compact between two parties, it required the consent of both to make any alteration. What were the conditions upon which Virginia ceded her territory? They were, first, that the ceded territory should be laid out into distinct republican States, which should be admitted into the Union "with the same rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence as the other States," and also that the lands ceded should be a common fund for the benefit of the United States, to be disposed of according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure. These are the two important conditions mentioned in the compact with Virginia; the first conforming to and complying with the conditions that were fixed in the resolution of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780, as explained by that of the 29th of April, 1784. It was upon these conditions that Congress accepted the deed of cession from Virginia. They cannot be altered without the consent of the other party. And if, in the course of this investigation, it should be discovered that in the acts of Congress admitting new States into the Union, there are other conditions than those contained in the deed of cession, they are null and void, because not authorized by the original deed, and the General Government had no power whatever, without the consent of Virginia, to alter the terms and condition of the cession.

There is one most remarkable feature in this deed of cession. Virginia not only cedes all her right, title, and claim to the soil, but to the jurisdiction.

For the purpose of calling the attention of the House to this point, I will read the clause that contains it:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That it shall and may be lawful for the delegates of this State to the Congress of the United States, or such of them as shall be assembled in Congress, and the said delegates, or such of them so assembled, are hereby fully authorized and empowered, for and on behalf of this State, by proper deeds or instruments in writing, under their hands and seals to convey, transfer, assign, and make over unto the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said States, all right, title, and claim, AS WELL OF SOIL AS JURISDICTION, which this

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Lands—Mr. Harrison.

HO. OF REPS.

Commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying, and being to the northwest of the river Ohio, subject to the terms and conditions contained in this before-recited act of Congress of the 13th day of September last; that is to say, upon condition that this territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States, containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

What was that jurisdiction before the cession? When the property, and in possession of the State of Virginia, it was full, complete, and absolute. No other power could limit, restrict, or interfere with it. Where is it now? Does the General Government possess it as full and absolute as Virginia had it before the cession? No, sir. None will venture to advance such doctrine. Where is it then? It was a thing that existed before the cession, and it must still exist somewhere. If it be not found with the General Government, it must be with the States; and if with the States, how came it there? By compact? By any arrangement or understanding between the General Government and the States? None of these. It fell to the States as one of the reserved rights. By the magical influence of sovereignty it attached itself to the powers of the States as being one that was not delegated to the General Government. In reference to jurisdiction as an attribute of sovereignty, Vattel, in his book on the law of nations, says:

"The general domain of the nation over the lands she inhabits is naturally connected with the empire; for, in establishing herself in a vacant country, the nation certainly does not intend to possess it in subjection to any other Power; and can we suppose an independent nation not vested with the absolute command in her domestic concerns? Thus we have already observed (book 1, sec. 205) that in taking possession of a country, the nation is presumed to take possession of its government at the same time. We shall here proceed further, and show the natural connection of these two rights in an independent nation. How could she govern herself, at her own pleasure, in the country she inhabits, if she cannot truly and absolutely dispose of it? And how could she have the full and absolute domain of a place where she has not the command? Another's sovereignty, and the rights it comprehends, must deprive her of the free disposal of that place. And to this eminent domain, which constitutes a part of the sovereignty, (book 1, sec. 244,) and you will the better perceive the intimate connection existing between the domain and the sovereignty of the nation. And, accordingly, what is called the high domain, which is nothing but the domain of the body of the nation, or of the sovereign who represents it, is everywhere considered as inseparable from the sovereignty."

"The sovereignty united to the domain establishes the jurisdiction of the nation in her territories, or the country that belongs to her. It is her province, or that of her sovereign, to exercise justice in all the places under her jurisdiction, to take cognizance of the crimes committed, and the differences that arise in the country."

Here, sir, we have a definition given of the term "jurisdiction," such as must satisfy every one does not belong to the General Government over lands which it claims, lying within the limits of a State. And it is clear that the exercise of such a power on the part of the Government would utterly annihilate every vestige and feature that characterize a State. Mr. Henry, in the debates of the Virginia Convention on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, speaking on the subject of giving up the navigation of the Mississippi, says:

"France has guaranteed to us our sovereignty, and all its appendages. What are its appendages? Are not the rivers and waters that wash the shores of a country appendages inseparable from the right of sovereignty?"

Governor Randolph, in the same debate, said:

"It will, moreover, be contrary to the law of nations to relinquish territorial rights. There is a prohibition naturally resulting from the nature of things, it being contradictory and repugnant to reason and the law of nature and nations to yield the most valuable right of a community, for the exclusive benefit of one part of it."

Mr. Nicholas also said:

"The deprivation of territorial rights was obviously repugnant to the law of nations."

But, sir, I have still other authority of a high character, bearing directly on the point, to which I would particularly call the attention of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PARKER,] who was a member of the select committee to whom this subject was referred, as the authority I am about to read is a decision of the supreme court of the State of New York, delivered by Chief Justice Spencer. The case was this: a murder was committed at Fort Niagara, lying within the limits of the State of New York. The man was tried for the murder, found guilty, and sentenced according to the laws for the crime he had committed. The case was taken up to the supreme court, upon the ground that the State authorities had no jurisdiction of the case, inasmuch as the crime was committed at a place which was the property of the United States. I will now read that part of the decision which relates to the point in question:

"Their possession of this post must be regarded, therefore, as a possession for the State, not against it; it was a friendly occupation, not in derogation of our rights; and we regard it as a fundamental principle that the rights of sovereignty are never to be taken away by implication. In the case of the United States vs. Bevens, (3 Wheaton, 388,) Chief Justice Marshall said: 'The power of exclusive legislation, under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which is jurisdiction, is united with cession of territory, which is to be the free act of the States.' The correctness of this remark is fully admitted; and if the United States had the right of exclusive legislation over the fortress of Niagara, they would have also exclusive jurisdiction; but we are of opinion that the right of exclusive legislation within the territorial limits of any State can be acquired by the United States only in the mode pointed out in the Constitution—by purchase, by consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. The essence of that provision is, that the State shall freely cede the particular place to the United States, for one of the specific and enumerated objects. This jurisdiction cannot be acquired tortuously, or by disseisin of the State; much less can it be acquired by mere occupancy, with the implied or tacit consent of the State, when such occupancy is for the purpose of protection."

"The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States is clearly adapted to the territorial rights of the United States, beyond the limits or boundaries of any of the States, and to their chattel interests, and it therefore drops the expression of exclusive legislation."

Now, sir, I would ask if anything could be stronger, or more directly in point than this which I have just read? The court not only takes the ground that there is but one way in which the Government can acquire or hold lands within the limits of a State, which is by consent of the State; but also, that this acquisition must be for one of the specified and enumerated purposes mentioned in the eighth section of the Constitution of the United States. And they say that the third section of the fourth article has clearly a reference to the territorial rights of the Government beyond the limits of the States, &c. Sir, can language be stronger or plainer than this? Am I not sustained in the broadest position I have taken in my resolutions. I feel confidence, by such high authority, that animates to the struggle, and lifts me above the power of ridicule, as well as the mortification of defeat.

I come now, sir, to the last important condition in this deed of cession. It is:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American Army, shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever: Provided, That the trust hereby reposed in the delegates of this State shall not be executed, unless three of them, at least, are present in Congress."

To understand this rightly, we must go back to the time when the Articles of Confederation were the paramount law of the land, and look at the state of things that existed at this particular period of our history. The eighth article of the Articles of Confederation says:

"All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all the land within each State, granted to, or surveyed for, any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall, from time to time, direct and appoint."

"The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled."

This explains the expression in the deed, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." Each State was to pay its proportional part of the expenses of the Government, according to the proportion mentioned in this article, and the State, not the Government, as is now the case, alone had the right of levying and collecting the taxes necessary to pay her proportion. Now the part just quoted from the deed of cession did not mean, and does not say, that the Federal Government should have the power to hold lands within the limits of a State; for the ninth article of the Confederation, which expressly says that "the territory of no State shall be taken for the benefit of the United States" forbids it. All that was meant by it was, that the proceeds of the land sold, lying "beyond the limits of the States," should go into the general Treasury, according "to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." Suppose, then, a new State had been admitted into the Union during the existence of the Articles of Confederation, what would have been the extent of her sovereignty? Exactly that which was the extent of the sovereignty of one of the old States. And how could this have been ascertained? By a reference alone to the second and ninth articles of the Confederation. The second article says:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, by this Confederation, EXPRESSLY DELEGATED to the United States in Congress assembled."

And the ninth article says:

"Provided also, That no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States."

Can any language be used more direct and pointed than that found in the two articles quoted, to show that a State coming into the Union under the Confederation, would be equal in all the attributes of sovereignty with the old States, and that the territory of no State could be taken for the benefit of the United States? In other words, that the Federal Government had no power to hold lands within the limits of any of the States. The compact, if it is supposed to conflict with the Articles of Confederation, could give no new power, nor alter in any manner whatever the powers which had been vested in the Federal Government by the Confederation. The sovereignty of no State, therefore, could have been limited, as the Confederation did not permit it, and the deed of cession or compact with Virginia did not and could not grant it; and the new State, had one been admitted, would have come into the Confederacy with "the same rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence as the other States." If further proof is wanting on this head, I have that at hand which, it seems to me, is conclusive and irresistible beyond the power of human contradiction. After the adoption of the Confederation, several of the States, not satisfied with many of its provisions, made objections to joining the Confederacy, and consequently remained out of it for some length of time. Among these were Rhode Island and New Jersey, who seemed to object particularly to that clause of the ninth article of the Confederation which says:

"Provided, also, That no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States."

The objection of Rhode Island, is as follows:

"In the ninth article, at the end of the second paragraph, after the words 'for the benefit of the United States,' add 'provided, nevertheless, that all lands within these States, the property of which, before the present war, was vested in the Crown of Great Britain, or out of which quit-rents arise, payable to said Crown, shall be deemed, taken, and considered as the property of these United States, and be disposed of and appropriated by Congress for the benefit of the whole Confederacy, reserving, however, to the States within whose limits such Crown lands may be, the entire and complete jurisdiction thereof.'"

Rejected—ay 1, noes 9. The objection of New Jersey is in the following language:

"The ninth article provides that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States. Whether we are to understand that by territory is intended any land, the property of which was heretofore vested in the Crown of Great Britain, or that no mention of such land is made in the Confederation, we are constrained to observe that the present war, as we always apprehended, was undertaken for the general defense and interest of the confederating Colonies, now the United States. It was ever the confident expectation of this State that the benefits derived from a successful contest were to be general and proportionate; and that the property of the common enemy falling in consequence of a prosperous issue of the war, would belong to the United States and be appropriated to their use. We are therefore, greatly disappointed in finding no provision for empowering the Congress to dispose of such property, but especially the vacant and unpatented lands, commonly called the Crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war and for such other public and general purposes. The jurisdiction ought, in every instance, to belong to the respective States within the charter or determined limits of which such lands may be seated; but reason and justice must decide that the property which existed in the Crown of Great Britain, previous to the present Revolution, ought now to belong to the Congress, in trust for the use and benefit of the United States. They have fought and bled for it in proportion to their respective abilities; and, therefore, the reward ought not to be predilectionally distributed."

These objections were made and rejected in 1778. Here, sir, we find the text of all the speeches and reports which have been made from that day to this on the subject of the public lands. The objections of these States are the very pith and marrow of all that has been said and urged in favor of the old States to what are called the public lands. Mark the language that is used. They are willing that jurisdiction, entire and complete, shall belong to the States in whose limits the lands may lie, but they require that the property in the soil shall be the common property of all the States. If this ninth article did not forbid that any other power should hold a property in the soil of a State, why object to it? If it be said that it was meant to apply to those States that had large claims to vacant territory, what is there in this or any other part of the Confederation that forbids the same application to a new State, had one been admitted during the existence of the Confederation? It applied equally to all; there was no exception, and these States knew the fact; and therefore it is that we find them urging in such earnest and pathetic strains the claims which they considered they had to this vacant territory, and which, by this article, was unjustly withheld from them.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, as he did not desire to reply to the gentleman from Missouri, he hoped he should be allowed to correct the extraordinary misapprehension into which the gentleman had fallen in regard to the effect of the proviso in the ninth article of the Confederation and the deeds of cession.

Mr. HARRISON assenting,

Mr. ROBERTSON proceeded. I purposely avoided, sir, all commentary upon the differences subsisting among the States in the early period of our revolutionary struggle, on the subject of the western lands, because I considered those differences finally adjusted by the compacts of cession and the Federal Constitution. It was immaterial whether the lands belonged to this Government or to the States which claimed them, since, in either case, the terms of the compacts and the provisions of the Constitution must be carried into effect. But if the gentleman will go beyond these instruments, he will find that Virginia claimed all the lands within the limits of her ancient charters long before the Confederacy was formed; and actually proclaimed these as her rightful boundaries in her State constitution, adopted prior to the declaration of American independence. Early in 1778, her Legislature authorized the raising of a regiment for the defense of her western frontier. Colonel Clark was appointed to command it, and reduced the forts of Kaskias and St. Vincennes, both of them, at the time, in the possession of the British, adding the right by conquest to that by grant. The Articles of Confederation were signed in July, 1778. In resisting the pretensions of the other States, Virginia denied that the United States held any territory, but in right of some one State, and relied on the proviso in the ninth article, referred to by the gentleman from Missouri, as reserving her sovereignty and jurisdiction within her limits. Without that proviso, she would not have acceded to the Confederacy. And it is strange that the gentleman from Missouri should rely on that or any other article of the Confederation to defeat the rights it was intended to secure, more especially when, as he himself tells us, that article was objected to by some of the States, and their objections overruled with but one dissenting voice.

There is nothing in the Articles of Confederation to sustain the argument that all the lands within the limits of the States belong to the State in which they be. The expression is, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States. But that is a very different proposition. The territory within the new States was ceded to the United States before those new States were created. It belonged then to the United States, and their disposition of it consequently does not deprive any State of territory; since no State can be deprived of what does not belong to it. These deeds of cession were equally as obligatory as the Articles of Confederation. We must comply with the conditions of the grant or restore the property. But, sir, the Articles of Confederation were abrogated by the Federal Constitution, which, as I have shown, ratified the compacts of cession. The ordinances made under those compacts, the very terms on which the new States have been admitted into the Union, and their own State constitutions, all declare that they shall never interfere with the primary disposition of the soil by the United States. Can any obligation then, sir, be more binding?

Nor is there anything in the objections of New Jersey and Rhode Island, referred to by the gentleman from Missouri, to support his idea that the Federal Government cannot hold lands within a State. If anything, they prove exactly the reverse. Those States proposed that a cession should be made of the soil to the Confederacy; the States making it to retain the jurisdiction. This offer was evidently intended as a concession to induce a surrender. It was not accepted. But the offer itself proceeds upon a ground at war with the principle asserted by the gentleman from Missouri; for it necessarily supposes that the right of soil might be in the United States as to lands within the limits of a State, while the State retained the right of jurisdiction.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman's explanation, I think, does not avail him. It was before Congress that the objections of Rhode Island and New Jersey were made, who alone had the right to determine upon the matter. They rejected the objections; and stronger negative testimony cannot be brought, in my opinion, to show the clear intention of Congress that no such power was granted by the Confederation as that claimed by the gentleman. But, sir, I cannot now digress to notice the gentleman's explanation further at this time. I must resume the subject where I left off when the gentleman asked me to give way. I was then speaking, I believe, of the objections of New Jersey. There is one fact connected with the objections of this State—a most strange and extraordinary circumstance—which must lead the mind irresistibly to the conclusion, that the views which I have taken on this subject are correct; and in inviting the attention of the House and of the country to the fact to which I have just alluded, I must say that the personal regard which I entertain for the delegation from that State, and the respect which I would wish always to show to the States of this Confederacy, forbid me from using that language which the occasion would otherwise call for, and justify. Sir, what is the spectacle now exhibited by the State of New Jersey before this nation and before the world? Why, sir, that she is guilty of a suppression veri in a report made during this very winter, by her Legislature, upon the subject of the public lands, in which, in pretending to quote the objections made by her in 1778, she leaves out three of the most important lines in that objection. And these lines, Mr. Speaker, are in the middle of the objection, before and after which she goes on to make the quotation. The lines left out commence at the words "the jurisdiction," &c., and go to the word "but," inclusive, which immediately precedes the words "reason and justice," &c. Sir, is this fair play? Is it honorable for a sovereign State of this Confederacy to be guilty of such an artifice?

Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave to explain.

Mr. HARRISON yielding the floor,

Mr. RANDOLPH said, lest he might not have another opportunity, he would ask leave to explain. He said he had not observed the discrepancy noticed by the gentleman from Missouri till this moment; yet the explanation was obvious. The report of 1839 purports to give a mere "extract" from "a statement of reasons" of the Legislature of 1778, against ratifying the Articles of Confederation; it neither gives the commencement nor conclusion of the sixth objection, but, beginning in the middle of a sentence, it quotes only so much of the objection as refers to the reason thereof, leaving out the three lines relating to what had been a vexed question, viz: where the jurisdiction over the public lands should be. That, the Legislature thought, had nothing to do with the object of the quotation, nor, in fact, since the cession of the States and the adoption of the Constitution, with the subject-matter of the objection itself. Her only omission, then, is that of two inverted commas, which would have divided the quotation instead of leaving it entire.

Mr. HARRISON. I am aware, sir, that the question made by the late Legislature of that State does not commence with the sixth objection, nor end with it. But, from the place where the quotation was commenced, down to the conclusion of it, the whole of the objection is continuous, in language and meaning, and therefore important. And I am sure that no disinterested mind can look at the omission without readily seeing that it was purposely made. She had the best of all reasons for making the omission, for the lines that were omitted contained the essence of the doctrines I am now contending for, which she found to be a stumbling-block to the great object she had in view. Sir, the conduct of the Legislature of New Jersey, on this occasion, fortifies me in all my views, and gives me the strongest assurance in the force and power of my positions by the tacit acknowledgment she had thus secretly made.

But, Mr. Speaker, the ordinance of 1787 is referred to, and is made to cut a conspicuous figure in this debate. This, as well as the compact, is relied upon as a source from whence the power is derived of stripping the new States of those rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence, which belong to the other States. This, too, like the deed of cession from Virginia, was made during the existence of the Confederation, and had an immediate reference to it, as will be seen upon examination of some of the striking and important provisions of that instrument.

I do not mean to assert the doctrine that the ordinance, upon the adoption of the Constitution, became null and void; nor will I admit, as some contend, that it is not only binding, but unalterable, in its provisions. It is immaterial to me, in this discussion, in what light it is regarded. In either point of view, my purpose will be equally answered. But I must confess it is a strange document to be called a compact; for "it is ordained and declared that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent," &c. It is not declared to be a compact made between two existing parties, able and competent to contract, but simply ordained that "the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact," &c. It is, besides, a very strange idea that a compact can be made by one party only; for the people "in said Territory" were not represented; they had no agent to act for them; none that could attend to and take care of their interests; and as for the States "in said territory," there was not one in existence at the time; so that the General Government, in the usual exercise of its kind and paternal care, made a compact with a party that had no existence; and most amply provided, I must in candor confess, for its own particular interests in the outrages which it committed, in anticipation, upon the rights of the States that were yet to come into the Union, and for whose admission such liberal and generous provisions were so amply provided.

But, sir, good or bad, binding or not, I maintain that this ordinance, so far as it conflicts with the deed of cession, or imposes restrictions not to be found in the deed of cession, is void; because, the deed being a compact made between two parties, it cannot be altered, in any respect, without the consent of the other party. Independently of this, the new States have a right to demand the fulfillment of your promises according to the letter of your bond, and you cannot escape by falling back upon powers which it requires no ingenuity to prove are arbitrary and tyrannical. The simple question in this stage of our investigation is, does the ordinance impose conditions not found in the deed of cession? This no one can doubt or deny, as the fourth article not only prohibits the new States from interfering with the primary disposal of the soil, but actually takes from them the privilege of imposing a tax upon the lands claimed by the Government—a right that has always been regarded as an inherent attribute of sovereignty. These restrictions are directly opposed to all that is contained in the deed of cession, and, I contend, are void, because not authorized by that instrument, nor imposed with the consent of Virginia.

That the consent of Virginia is necessary to make any change in her compact with the Government, is conclusively proven by the fact, that the Government, wishing to alter the terms of the deed, applied to the State of Virginia for that purpose, and her consent was obtained. Here, sir, is the resolution of Congress in which the application I speak of was made:

"Resolved, That it be, and it hereby is, recommended to the Legislature of Virginia to take into consideration their act of cession, and revise the same so far as to empower the United States in Congress assembled to make such a division of the territory of the United States, lying northerly and westerly of the river Ohio, into distinct republican States, not more than five, nor less than three, as the situation of that country and future circumstances may require; which States shall hereafter become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States, in conformity with the resolution of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780."

Virginia gave her consent in an act of her Legislature of the 30th December, 1788, allowing the alteration only which is to be found in the fifth article of the ordinance. Why was it necessary to apply to Virginia to have this alteration made, if the compact was not equally binding upon both parties, and could not be changed or altered without the consent of both? If it was necessary to make the application to have an alteration made in one particular, is it not equally incumbent to make a similar application to have any others made? If the ordinance altered the deed of cession, or undertook to extend and enlarge its powers, the proposition is clear to my mind that not only is the ordinance void, so far as the alteration goes, but the ordinance itself, supposing it to be a compact, upon every acknowledged principle of construction within the range of civil and national jurisprudence, is also void, for having violated the solemn engagements of the deed of cession, which were unrepented, still in full force and effect, and which were prior in point of time, and paramount in its obligations, to this ordinance.

But admitting that the ordinance is binding; if binding in part it is binding for the whole, and if binding upon us, so also is it upon the General Government; for, according to the doctrine of some gentlemen, it is unalterable without common consent, and this consent has never been given. Now, let us test it according to this doctrine, and see how far it is compatible with the change produced in the Government by the adoption of the Constitution, and what are, in fact, the present rights of the new States under this unalterable and unaltered compact. To show this point clearly, and the consequences of this preposterous doctrine, I must call your attention to a portion of the fourth article of this instrument:

"The said territory, and the States which may be formed therein, shall forever remain a part of this Confederacy. &c. The inhabitants and settlers in the said territory shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts contracted, or to be contracted, and a proportional part of the expenses of Government, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States, and the taxes for paying their proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislature of the district or districts, or new States, as in the original States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled."

The mode here mentioned of levying and collecting taxes is the mode adopted by the Confederation; and if the ordinance be unalterable, that is the only mode now by which taxes can be raised off of the new States. The alternative is inevitable. The change in the character of the Government produced by the adoption of the Constitution, according to the doctrine that the ordinance is unalterable, did not, and could not, affect this article, because there is no clause in the Constitution which specifically alluded to and altered the provisions of this article; and the Constitution of the United States, if it did not affect the ordinance as an integral thing, did not, therefore, affect it in any of its parts. If it be true, therefore, that the ordinance is unalterable, I ask why is it you have not complied with the provisions in this article, which you bound yourselves to perform, and which was required of you by all that is sacred in the obligations that flow from reciprocal engagements? It is you that have disregarded plighted faith and your own solemn stipulations.

But this ordinance is inconsistent with itself. It says, in one part, that "whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." And in another part, it not only contains the prohibition that the new States shall not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, but asserts, in imperious language, that "no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States." Does this arbitrary edict, forbidding the new States from exercising one of the highest and most unquestionable attributes of sovereignty, place us "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever?" Is the power to tax, of the original States, limited or restrained in any particular? Can it be done? Has the General Government the power to lay even the smallest restrictions on their right to do so? If such a power does exist, with what propriety can it be said that we are upon "an equal footing in all respects whatever with the original States?" The practical explanation which you have given of this stipulation, renders it supremely ridiculous to every intelligent and disinterested mind.

As the Articles of Confederation expired with the birth of the Constitution, it becomes a grave question how far the adoption of the Constitution affected the condition of things which existed under the Confederation. That the change most materially affected the relative powers and rights of the States and the Federal Government, will not be disputed. The powers of the Federal Government, like those under the Confederation, being granted only, were greatly enlarged. That the change which the formation of the Constitution produced in the character of the Federal Government, altered also the nature of the relations which subsisted with the Government under these compacts, is, to my mind, equally clear. To comprehend this rightly, we must take a survey of the objects contemplated by the change; of the powers that were granted; the rights that were affected, and the consequences that were produced.

The Constitution, like the Articles of Confederation, is an instrument containing powers granted for specific and enumerated purposes, only more full and extensive than those in the Confederation. The second article of the Confederation says:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

—showing conclusively that no power could be claimed or exercised unless "expressly delegated." The clause in the Constitution differs in language only. It says:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Both instruments contain none but delegated powers, allowing the exercise of such only as were expressly mentioned and enumerated. And the peculiar and striking characteristic of both is, that they were the creatures of another power, and had, and could have had, no existence until called forth by the fiat of the States that formed the Confederacy.

Now, in reference to the compacts so often alluded to, had it been the intention of the framers of either to retain and exercise the power of owning and disposing of the lands lying within the limits of a State, it would have been expressed in so many words, in terms that could not have been misapplied and language that could not have been misunderstood. There was every inducement to be explicit; they were framing an instrument that was to contain a grant of powers for specific and enumerated purposes; and were, at the same time, embodying in the same instrument the powers that were necessary to carry out and accomplish the great objects for which the Confederacy was formed.

If it was intended that the General Government should hold a property in the soil within the limits of a State, how easily could it have been so expressed, especially as the ninth article of the Confederation had prohibited the territory of any State being taken for the benefit of the United States. This was a strong reason why, if they meant that such a power should belong to the Federal Government, it should have been expressed plainly and unequivocally in the Constitution as one of the powers belonging to the Government.

In fixing and defining the grants and limitations of power between the two, could anything have been more just and prudent than the explicit avowal on the part of the framers of the Constitution, that this was a necessary power, and should belong to the Federal Government? Certainly not. And the omission to make this one of the specific and enumerated grants of power, is conclusive that it was not asked for, and never was intended to be claimed.

I have thus, so far as relates to the grant of the power in question, been reasoning from analogy. I will now recur to historical facts to show that it never was the intention of the fathers of the country to give such a power to the Federal Government as the one now claimed.

In the Federal Convention, when discussing the propriety of admitting new States into the Union, and fixing the terms upon which they should be admitted, propositions to give the power now claimed were submitted and rejected. Regarding the debates that took place, and the various propositions that were submitted in the Convention, as a proper, and perhaps the best, exponent we can get, in all doubtful questions, as to the real intention and meaning of the Convention, I will now trouble the House with a few extracts from the Journals of that body to show that I am correct in the positions I have taken. It is well known, as a historical fact, that Maryland objected to coming into the Union for several reasons, and did not come into the Union until all the others had joined it. One of the propositions made by this State, which had been raised as an objection on her part, and which was submitted to the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, is this:

"The Legislature of the United States shall have power to erect new States within, as well as without, the territory claimed by the several States, or either of them, and admit the same into the Union: Provided, That nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to affect the claim of the United States to vacant lands ceded to them by the late treaty of peace."

Here we have a broad proposition, comprehending in its scope all that is now claimed; a proposition clear in its object, plain in its terms, and direct in its meaning. Had it been adopted, the question as to the property of the United States, in the lands lying within the limits of the new States, would have been definitively settled. If it had been the intention to give the power which is now claimed, why was it rejected? Is more positive evidence wanting of the intention of the Convention than this? For, if they intended to confer such a power upon the Federal Government, why reject the identical proposition which undertook to give it? It is impossible to bring stronger testimony to show that the powers over the new States, mentioned in the ordinance, were not intended to be embraced in the Constitution. And therefore I say the change produced by the adoption of the Constitution in the character of the Government, annulled and set aside this ordinance.

But let us trace a little further the proceedings of the convention on this subject, and it will be seen that every step corroborates my position. On the same day it was moved and seconded to add the following clause:

"Nor shall any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts thereof, without the consent of the Legislature of such States, as well as of the Legislature of the United States."

Upon which it was moved to add the following:

"Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this Constitu- tion shall be construed to affect the claim of the United States to vacant lands ceded to them by the late treaty of peace."

This was withdrawn, and the following offered:

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to alter the claims of the United States or of the individual States to the western territory; but all such claims may be examined into and decided upon by the Supreme Court of the United States."

This, on motion, was postponed, and the following presented and adopted, and which now constitutes the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution:

"The Legislature shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. And nothing in this Constitution contained shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims, either of the United States or of any particular State."

Now, sir, I would ask why all these various propositions, commencing with one that was broad enough to include beyond any doubt the power now contended for, if it had been the intention and object of the convention to give such a power to the General Government? Can any other meaning be given to the third section as it now stands, by any rule or principle of fair construction, than what has been given it by the supreme court of the State of New York, that it meant only such vacant territory of the United States as was "beyond the limits or boundaries of the several States?" None, none, sir, can be given. The construction of that court cannot be successfully met, and the whole proceedings of the convention which I have just read lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the power claimed was not given, and never was intended to be given, to the General Government. The proceedings in the convention that formed the Constitution bear a striking resemblance to the proceedings of Congress on the objections of Rhode Island and New Jersey to the ninth article of the Confederation. Both clearly show that the intention of giving such a power to the General Government as the one now set up never was entertained; nay, more, so far from entertaining it, that they actually rejected, in both instances, the very propositions which were brought forward to confer the power.

But to show, further, that the Constitution paid no regard to the ordinance, it is only necessary to show that the ordinance is in direct opposition to the Constitution. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that I referred, in the course of my remarks, to the fourth article of the ordinance, with the view of showing the particular mode by which taxes, going into the common Treasury, were to be collected from the new States that might be formed out of this new territory. This mode is identical with that mentioned in the Confederation. The new States, by the fourth article of this "unalterable" compact, were to pay taxes according to the proportion mentioned in the Confederation. Now, if the Constitution did not alter this compact, which was "unalterable," this is still the mode, and the only mode, by which you can collect taxes from the new States. There is none other, because the Constitution not affecting this compact, which was ordained to be "unalterable," this compact is still binding upon the country, in all its parts and provisions, as the paramount law of the land. If this view of the subject be correct, then, even supposing the compact, otherwise considered, to be binding upon us, I contend that it is void, because the Government has failed to comply with the solemn engagements which devolved upon it by the provisions of this fourth article. But, sir, can we really suppose that the framers of the Constitution would have permitted such a discrepancy to exist on the subject of collecting its taxes as that found in this article, and that which now exists under the Constitution? We have still further evidence in that clause of the Constitution which gives to the Government the power of holding land within the limits of a State, with its consent, for certain purposes, such as arsenals, dock-yards, &c., that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that further power than is there expressed and conferred should be exercised by the Government over the territory of a State. For can it be supposed, will any one allege, that they were so neglectful of their duties, so forgetful of the interests of their country, and so unmindful of the powers necessary to be granted, if they intended to claim and exercise the right to the soil lying within the limits of a State, as to omit to give, in express terms, the specific power which is now set up by implication?

Upon the supposition that the lands within the new States belong to the General Government, I desire to know whether, being the property of the Government, the Government has "exclusive jurisdiction" over them or not? And if not, why? The land, according to the doctrine of the day, is as much the property of the Government as though the Government had acquired it under the particular section in the Constitution which gives to the Government the power of holding lands within the limits of a State, with the consent of said State, for some one or other of the specific purposes enumerated in the particular section to which I allude. And why not, therefore, exercise "exclusive jurisdiction?" If the power is not given to exercise "exclusive jurisdiction," why not exercise "jurisdiction" under the third section of the fourth article? If you have a right to the lands according to the Constitution—and I deny that you can get it any other way—why not exercise "jurisdiction?" As a test upon this point, I would particularly call the attention of State-rights men to the views which I am now submitting. The General Government has the right—which, so far as I know, has never been doubted—of constructing works of internal improvement within the District of Columbia. Why? Because the power to do so is expressly given. So, also, has the Government the power to construct and carry on such works in the Territories. Why? Because the land within the Territories is the absolute and undoubted property of the United States; and, by the third section of the fourth article, the Congress of the United States has power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States.

Now, as the General Government can exercise the power of constructing works of internal improvement within the District of Columbia, I wish to know of those gentlemen who believe that the General Government has no power to construct such works within the limits of a State, whether the Government, being the owner of the lands, has or can exercise such a power within those new States where the lands belong to the Government? If it can, then the Constitution is one thing with the old States, which cannot be extended or enlarged, and another thing with the new States, that may be stretched like a piece of gum elastic. But, if no such power can be exercised within those States where the lands belong to the General Government, I call upon those gentlemen to inform me why it cannot be done. Within the Territories of the United States, where the lands are the property of the General Government, such a power can be exercised. But the lands lying within the limits of the new States belong, also, to the Government, and I ask why is it that this same power cannot be equally exercised in either case, since in both the Government has the exclusive property to the soil? The right to the soil is no more limited in the one case than in the other. But the right of the Government to exercise jurisdiction and its legislative powers is not equally great in both instances. Why? Where is the prohibitory clause in the Constitution that forbids it? Do not gentlemen see the force of the position, and the application of the argument? I leave the point for them to settle.

Before leaving this branch of the subject, I must call your attention to another striking circumstance in the history of these compacts. It is a remarkable fact, that Virginia herself has given, in practice, an interpretation to the compact, which sustains the position I have assumed. By the terms of the compact, a certain tract of country lying within the limits of the present State of Kentucky, between Green river and the Tennessee river, were specifically set apart for the Virginia troops upon the Continental establishment, and in case the quantity should prove insufficient, the deficiency was to be made up "in good lands, to be laid off between the rivers Sciota and Little Miami." The lands lying between Green river and the Tennessee river were not applied agreeably to the terms of the compact. Virginia, in giving her assent to Kentucky becoming a State of the Union, permitted Kentucky to use and appropriate these lands as her own. Kentucky has sold these lands, and applied the proceeds to her own benefit. What right had Virginia, directly or indirectly, to permit the State of Kentucky to claim and sell these lands for her own benefit, if it be true that the compact is binding, and the lands ceded under the compact are the common property of the United States, and are to be disposed of for their benefit alone? It may be replied that these lands were not ceded. Grant it. But if the lands ceded were ceded for the common benefit of all the States, Kentucky having claimed as her own the lands lying between the Green river and the Tennessee river, how could "the deficiency" be made up without intrenching upon those that were ceded for the common benefit of all? The lands which lay between the Sciota and the Little Miami were not to be touched until those in Kentucky had been exhausted. And as those in Kentucky were not applied in the way contemplated by the compact, it is impossible that the lands lying between the Sciota and the Little Miami could be sufficient to make up the deficiency, without taking more than was originally expected under the compact, and the common fund had, of course, to be taken to supply the deficiency. Why did Virginia permit this? For what reason did she permit Kentucky to claim and dispose of, for her own benefit, those lands that were specifically set apart to pay her own soldiers on the Continental establishment? She could have done it upon no other ground than that the lands, upon the admission of a State, included within the limits of that State, became absolutely the property of the State; or that the compact did not bear, and was never meant to bear, the construction which more recent times have given it.

But, sir, it may be said that my arguments and reasoning apply only to the States made in the Northwestern Territory, and not to those embraced within the limits of the territory acquired from France. I proceed to give a passing notice to this point.

By the third article of the treaty between France and the United States it is provided that "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States."

Here, sir, you find an express provision for the inhabitants of the ceded territory to be incorporated in the Union, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, and nowhere any power given to impose conditions or restrictions. The charter of their rights was as broad as the principles of the Federal Constitution, and there were no compacts or ordinances to cramp their energies and entangle them in the mazes of political absurdity.

But, sir, let me ask, and I ask the question emphatically, why impose conditions and restrictions upon the new States? Where is the necessity? For what reason are they to come into the Union fettered and handcuffed? The very act of imposing these conditions and restrictions is an acknowledgment of their sovereignty, and that, by virtue of their sovereign rights, they would otherwise be entitled, indisputably, to the right to the soil without them. If, then, without these restrictions, they would be free and sovereign, the question naturally occurs, to what extent free and sovereign? Beyond that of the old States? Impossible. It is forbidden by the Constitution. Less so than the old States? Neither can this be. The Constitution is the equal guarantee in both cases. What, then, would be the real extent of their freedom and sovereignty? Why, sir, that they would be "AS FREE AND SOVEREIGN AS THE OLD STATES." What are we to understand by the freedom and sovereignty of the old States? The Declaration of Independence will tell us what was meant by this freedom and sovereignty anterior to the formation of the Confederacy. The Articles of Confederation will inform us of their extent under the Confederation; and a reference to the Constitution will furnish us a guide for the purpose of learning what they now are. The Declaration of Independence says:

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Lands—Mr. Harrison.

Ho. OF REPS.

"We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown; and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, AND TO DO ALL OTHER ACTS AND THINGS WHICH INDEPENDENT STATES MAY OF RIGHT DO."

Here, sir, you have a full and unequivocal explanation of what was meant by "free and independent States" at that day. And it must not be forgotten that the word "State" is applied to Great Britain, evidently meaning by the application of the term that it was an independent Power. If, then, these States had all the attributes of sovereignty which belong to other independent Powers, how far was that sovereignty limited by the Confederation? Exactly to the extent mentioned in the second article. Now, sir, I put the question to the House and the country, are the new States, with the conditions and restrictions that are imposed upon them, as free, sovereign, and independent as the old States? No, sir, they are not. And the conclusion is inevitable that all such conditions and restrictions are therefore void.

But, sir, I am answered by some, and told that we are bound by our compacts—the compacts we made with the General Government at the time of our admission into the Union. I reply, by asking if any compact, ordinance, or treaty, can give a new power to the Constitution? Can it enlarge, diminish, or in any respect whatever modify the powers of the Constitution? They must conform to the Constitution, and not the Constitution to them. There is no use for a Constitution if such means can change its character. The Constitution never had and never can have but such as are granted powers. The power must be delegated, or it cannot be used. But the States—the new States—gave up certain rights and powers. Did they, indeed? Upon whose stern demand were they given up? We were forced to do it, or not allowed to come into the Union. But, granting that they did give up what you required of them, can the General Government receive them? By what authority can she receive rights and powers which diminish the freedom and independence of the new States, and enlarge the sphere of her own? If a State can give up one power to the General Government, she can give up another, until all are given up; and if a new State can do this, there is nothing to prevent one of the old ones from doing the same. And, sir, if such a thing can take place, then the General Government can destroy the Constitution, and break down all its barriers, by the simple contrivance of compacts. One of the rights which we have given up, is the right of taxing your lands, a right which belongs to and is inseparable from sovereignty. It is the right which gives to a State the power of carrying on its operations. It is the salient principle of political existence; the fundamental element of the life, the action, and the vigor of all communities.

If it be true that we have given up the rights as contended for, then indeed have we not only given up sovereign rights which belong to the other States of this Confederacy, but also that inherent right of self preservation which belongs to every people, and lies at the bottom of all Governments. You have, for instance, in the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, immense bodies of land subject to inundation, and covered with impenetrable swamps, that are the fruitful sources of disease and death. They have been untouched ever since the country was acquired from France, without an effort on your part to remove the evil. According to your doctrine, we, although free and independent States, being as free, sovereign, and independent as the old States, cannot do it, because the lands are yours, and any attempt on our part to do so would be a trespass upon your domain, which might, perhaps, subject us to an action for trespass committed upon so much of your lands covered with water. Have we no power to abate such a nuisance without being called to an account for it? Have we not the right, common to all Governments on earth, of taking care of our people and preserving their health and their lives from the contagious effects of such loathsome and fatal nuisances? Will any man here tell me that a community of people may exist as a government without the power of protecting itself from destruction? I turn with disgust from the thought. It is an inherent, indefeasible, and inalienable right, which we cannot give away, and which cannot be taken from us without sweeping from under us the very foundations upon which are built the liberties of all just Governments.

According to the right which you claim, you fetter us in such a way as to deprive us, too, of all the means of moving on with the march of the age in all those works of internal improvement which constitute the glory of those who have undertaken them; those works which are almost annihilating distance and time, infusing a new life into society, reorganizing the elements out of which it is composed, and developing powers and resources which the startled senses can scarcely yet realize. We cannot construct a road or dig a canal without your permission. The lands are yours, and we would be violating public faith if we dared to exercise those common attributes of sovereignty which belong to all Governments—of carrying on a system of internal improvement, according to our own will. We cannot improve the condition of our people; we cannot contribute to our own prosperity; we cannot increase the facilities of communication for either traveling or carrying our surplus produce to market; we cannot develop our resources; we can do nothing that an independent State ought to do. Wherever we turn we see your iron grasp; wherever we move we feel its power. Should we desire to construct a road or dig a canal, we must do as you did when you were, as we are now, colonies of an unrelenting Power, to propitiate whose favor, and to get what your very necessities required, you were compelled to kneel in the attitude of a servile applicant, beseeching and supplicating at the footstool of power for those as favors which nature and nature's God gave you as your rights. If we want but the right of way to construct a work of internal improvement, in the bountiful overflows of your kindness and generosity, we must supplicate you year after year, and bear with unrelenting humility the taunts which are always thrown upon us, that we design secretly to "plunder" you, or that it is the project of some knavish speculation. Sir, to my knowledge, application has been made to you, time after time, for the right of way only to construct a railroad from the Iron Mountain, in my State, one of the greatest natural curiosities in the known world, to the Mississippi river; and to this hour we have not yet succeeded in this most modest and moderate request.

It is thus, sir, that we are deprived of all those facilities which lead on to the advancement and prosperity of a people, and stimulate them to noble exertion.

But, in another point of view, I contend that the compacts which you have made with the new States are void, for a non-compliance on your part of those stipulations which you have obligated yourselves to perform.

It will be seen, by a reference to all the compacts made between the new States and the General Government, that the Government bound itself to apply a certain portion of the money arising from the sales of the lands to construct roads from the waters of the Atlantic to the several States respectively. The States, on their part, agreed to certain conditions that were required, and which are mentioned in the compact. Have you kept your promises with the States? Have you observed the obligations which you solemnly stipulated to perform? Where are the roads you were to make? Many of these compacts have been made for more than twenty years; and, with the exception of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, you have not made a move, nor have you even evinced an intention of making a move, towards fulfilling the solemn obligations of your plighted faith. Tell me not of the promises that would be broken, the faith that would be violated by the propositions I have introduced. Where is your own faith? Have you kept it? What excuse can you render to the injured States who have relied so long and so implicitly on your plighted word? Have we not, in every instance, and to the very letter, kept all the promises we made you? Have you ever complained of us for a violation of faith? And yet we are constantly having homilies preached to us about the observance of public faith! The conditions and stipulations which were entered into at the time of the admission of the States were mutual and concurrent. They were made for the reciprocal benefit of both parties. We have performed, on our part, all that you required, and all that can be demanded. You have done nothing; and in the face of this gross violation of your own obligations, you give us a lecture about the importance of preserving public faith. Now, sir, by every principle of the construction of compacts, where there are mutual obligations to be performed by both, a non-compliance on the part of one for an unreasonable length of time, of those engagements which the party was bound to perform, discharges the other party from the performance of his obligations, and completely and effectually annuls the agreement.

But some gentlemen take the ground that there is no power in the Constitution that authorizes the General Government to construct works of internal improvement. If there be none, then these compacts are void, because the Government entered into an engagement to fulfill an impossible obligation—to execute a power which did not belong to them, the consideration for which formed the stipulations which the States, on their part, assumed. When gentlemen who hold this doctrine talk of our violating public faith, they have reason to be more prudent and circumspect when they look upon this act of the Government—an act that transcends in enormity a breach of promise, or a violation of faith; for, having no power to carry out and perform its obligations, it was the double act of fraud and deception to come under such responsibilities.

I know, sir, that my doctrines are unpalatable. Many are startled and seem terrified at the boldness of my propositions. But, sir, the doctrine is not new. Would to God I could claim to be the author of it. It has justice, truth, and reason as the eternal foundation upon which it rests, and defies the test of human scrutiny, and the searching analysis of the profoundest ability. The same doctrine has found advocates in other quarters, and in other times. Ohio took the ground in a memorial to Congress, in which, although she was asking the permission of Congress to sell her sixteenth section, she claimed it as an inherent right to do, of her own accord, all that she requested of Congress. And where is Ohio now? Faithless to all her former professions and doctrines, she has taken sides with those that denigrate us plunderers and land pirates. Rich in population, rich in resources, with but a few acres of the public lands remaining unsold within her limits, she turns traitor to all her former principles, and, with gracious complacency, undertakes to preach to us lectures upon the enormity of violating public faith! This is the unkindest cut of all. And I cannot think of it without being forcibly reminded of the memorable expression of Cæsar in the hands of his assassins, when his eye caught the form of his friend Brutus among them, "Et tu Brute."

Tennessee also took the same ground after she became a State, and the difficulty which grew out of it between her and North Carolina, as the lands lying within her limits were to go mainly for the benefit of North Carolina, was not settled until in 1806, when, by an act of Congress, the matter was compromised and arranged.

Indiana in 1829 assumed the ground as broadly as I have done, without qualification or reservation. Whether she is to act the part of Ohio I will not say; but I must acknowledge I have my suspicions.

Louisiana and Illinois seem, from certain memorials of theirs, to be strongly inclined to the doctrine, although they have not assumed the doctrine in broad terms. But, sir, it is not alone the new States, or those from the new States, that have taken this ground. Some gentlemen from the old States, as eminent for their standing as their acknowledged abilities and talents, have taken and advocated the same doctrines; and I am proud of the opportunity of bringing to my aid the names of such men as Tazewell and John Taylor of Caroline, who have afforded to the world a practical illustration of their sincerity in the State-rights doctrine, by openly avowing and advocating the doctrines I speak of.

Now, sir, I feel no hesitation in saying, if I had not the long established prejudices of the House and of the country to contend against, if it were not for the sacra auri fames, the accursed thirst for gold, whose rapacious spirit is devouring and swallowing up all that is pure and holy in the great and fundamental principles of our Government, I should confidently expect to reach their convictions, and to break forever the power of that incubus which has been so long pressing down upon our bosoms, stifling our breath, repressing our energies, paralyzing our efforts, and blasting all our hopes. I should expect to see us very soon occupying that position of equality among the States of this Confederacy, which is its broad foundation, and upon which the whole structure is erected, entire in its form, and perfect in all its parts. Tell me why it is that you see every State represented equally in the Senate of the United States, but upon the beautiful and sublime idea that equality in rights, equality in power, equality in sovereignty, is the all-pervading and life-giving principle of this Confederacy?

Sir, let me say to you, if you would consult your own interests—if you would look to the great cause of human advancement, and to the onward principles of genuine liberty—if you would steadfastly fix your eye upon the true causes of a nation's glory—upon those elastic springs in the action and conduct of man, which, like the little rivulets that burst from the mountain's side, and move on their placid course to swell the volume of the mighty river, contribute to enlarge the circle of the power, the wealth, and the greatness of a people, you would at once release your grasp, and draw out from our sides the iron claws which have been so long fastened in our vitals.

Let me beg you to look at and examine the document I hold in my hands. Here is that which tells a nation's power, and speaks a people's wealth. It contains estimates of the exports and imports of New Orleans and Mobile, which the Secretary of the Treasury was kind enough to furnish me upon an application I made to him for the purpose of using it on this occasion. It speaks a language more eloquent and more forcible than any I can employ. It points out to you in letters of light your true policy. Considering how we have been cramped and oppressed by your course towards us, the facts which it conveys can scarcely be credited. I will give the aggregate, without wearying your patience with the details. The aggregate of the gross amount of duties secured in the district of New Orleans from the 31st of December, 1804, to the close of the year 1837, is $35,093,965 81. At Mobile, $1,332,143 90. The aggregate amount of exports from New Orleans, from the 1st of October, 1820, to the 1st of September, 1837—a period of about seventeen years—is $290,160,409; and the amount of imports for the same length of time is $138,351,357. In the district of Mobile the exports are stated to be $53,508,999, and the imports $4,460,101. Here, sir, you see the source of our wealth, which may give you some faint idea of our power and resources. Can a parallel be found anywhere in the whole bounds of our vast country? The exports from New Orleans are more than double the imports, and from Mobile about twelve times the amount of imports. The duties which accrue from these sources bring you more clear revenue than the millions of the public lands you have sold.

If, under the peculiar circumstances of embarrassment and oppression which much the larger portion of the great valley of the Mississippi has labored under, we can exhibit to you such proud results, let me ask you to consider what we would have been, what you would have been had we been placed under different circumstances, with more latitude for exertion, more freedom for enterprise? But with the power which you claim, and which you have so perseveringly exercised, of unlimited authority over the public lands within the limits of the States, you have with it unlimited authority over our wealth, prosperity, and happiness. We are cramped, fettered by the strong arm of inexorable power, whose shackles we cannot break. You have locked up our resources by reservations, and denied to us the very gifts and bounties of Heaven by the rigor of your system. You have even denied to us the salt of the earth, by reserving from sale the saline lands and salt springs, and hermetically closed in the bowels of the earth the untold and incalculable wealth which lies embossed in its depths. Nay, more; instead of disposing of the lands according to the express terms of the deeds of cession, you have withheld them from sale, expecting an enhancement in their value by our industry and labor; and thus in another respect violated an obligation and disregarded a plighted faith which had their birth with the deeds of cession. And instead of disposing of the lands, as you should have done, according to the compact, you descended to the low and contemptible business of leasing your lands, thus creating a system of landlord and tenant—a state of ignominious dependence between the Government and the citizens of the country, wholly incompatible with the genius, the spirit, and the principles of the Government. Give it up. Abandon it forever. Raise us up from that state of colonial degradation, deliver us from that condition of humiliating vassalage in which the exercise of unfeeling power has so long kept us. Assume for once in the history of the country your own proud and elevated position, in exercising only such legitimate grants of power as were expressly given you, and thus fulfill the high destinies which the holy enthusiasm of the consecrated fathers of the country expected of you.

All that we ask is, to be equal with the other States of this Confederacy in freedom, sovereignty, and independence. Grant us only this, and you will see this whole country, like the giant that gathered strength in his wrestle with Hercules every time he touched the earth, spring up, with an elastic bound, to new vigor and power, and the proud galaxy that adorns your stars and your stripes shine forth with a rich splendor which nothing but regenerated liberty can give. Enable us to make our roads and canals, to carry on our works of internal improvements, to manage our own internal police, as our genius and necessities may require, and you will soon witness the wonderful change which the uncontrolled and plastic power of self-government can alone accomplish, the waste lands speedily sold and settled, the desert made to smile and blossom as the garden, the country improved and cultivated to its utmost limits, industry stimulated, labor rewarded with rich returns, the people prosperous and happy, and the country rich in every blessing. What a guarantee to the perpetuity and stability of the Government, living in the hearts of its own people, and borrowing its own luster and glory from their proud, prosperous, and independent condition! And permit me to tell you that, deep and firm as may be the foundations of our country, still deeper will they be made by the policy which is before you. Let me beseech you to cast aside your prejudices, to throw off from your eyes the scales which have so long blinded you, and come up to this mighty and momentous question with nothing but the holy impulses of patriotism directing your heart; and you will see inscribed upon our banners TRUTH and JUSTICE, as all for which we would appeal to you, or ask at your hands. Our strength will be yours. The glory that may surround us will radiate its effulgence to every portion of our common country, and the same destiny that awaits us and our children will be indissolubly connected with your own; and should any great event, in the changes of life and the vicissitudes of the affairs of nations, ever take place to pull up the deep foundations of our Government, and tear down our noble edifice, let me tell you that, in the general wreck of the liberties of the country, the last spark will be found flickering on the plains of the West, in the domiciles of the humble tillers of the earth.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. BUCHANAN,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 14, 1839,

On the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal Officers with Elections.

Mr. BUCHANAN said:

Mr. President: The question raised for discussion by the bill now before the Senate is very simple in its character. This bill proposes to punish, by a fine of $500—the one moiety payable to the informer and the other to the United States—and by a perpetual disability to hold office under the United States, any officer of this Government, below the rank of a district attorney, who “shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for the choice of any person to be elector of President and Vice President of the United States,” or to be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or to be a Governor or Lieutenant Governor, or Senator or Representative, within any State of the Union, “or for the choice of any person to serve in any public office established by the law of any of the States.” The officers of the United States against whom the penalties of this bill are denounced, consist of marshals and their deputies, postmasters and their deputies, receivers and registers of land officers and their deputies and clerks, surveyors general of the public lands and their deputies and assistants, collectors, surveyors, naval officers, weighers, gaugers, appraisers, or other officers or persons concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any branch thereof; and engineers, officers, or agents, employed or concerned in the execution or superintendence of any of the public works.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] before he commenced his remarks, moved to amend the bill by striking from it the pecuniary penalty and perpetual disability against these officers, and substituting, in their stead, the penalty of a removal from office by the President, upon the production of evidence satisfactory to him that any of them had been guilty of the offense. Now, for myself, I shall not vote for this amendment. I will not take advantage of the amiable weakness of my friend from Kentucky, in yielding to the solicitations of others that which his own judgment approved. I will more especially not give such a vote, because the proposed amendment makes no change in the principle of the bill. There is a beautiful harmony and consistency in its provisions as it came fresh from its author which ought to be preserved. I shall not assist in marring any of its fair proportions. Let it remain in its perfect original form, and let his friends upon this floor come up to the baptismal font, and act as its sponsors; and let its avowed principles be recognized as the established doctrines of the political church to which they are all devoted. No, sir, no; if a village postmaster should dare to exercise the freedom of speech, guaranteed to him by an antiquated instrument called the Constitution of the United States, and have the audacity “to endeavor to persuade any elector” to vote for Martin Van Buren, or what would be a much more aggravated offense, dissuade any good Whig from voting for the other distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] a mere forfeiture of his office would bear no just proportion to the enormity of the crime. Let such a daring criminal be fined $500; let him be disqualified forever from holding any office under the Government; and let him be pointed at as a man of blasted reputation all the days of his life. With honest Dogberry, in the play of “Much ado about Nothing,” I pronounce the offense to be “flat burglary as ever was committed.”

There is another reason why I shall vote against the amendment. An issue has been fairly made between the Senator from Kentucky and my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] who, from what we have heard in the course of this debate, has but a few shattered planks left on which he can escape from a total shipwreck of his fair fame. In mercy to him I would not remove any of them. Let him have a chance for his life. He has dared to make a report against the bill in its original form, as it was referred to the committee of which he is the chairman; and for this cause has encountered all the withering denunciations of the Senators from Kentucky and Virginia, [Messrs. CRITTENDEN and RIVES.] In justice to him, the aspect of the question should not now be changed. Let us, then, have the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill, against which his report was directed.

It would seem almost unnecessary to discuss the question whether this bill be constitutional or not; as the Senator from Kentucky, throughout the whole course of his argument, never once attempted to point to any clause of the Constitution on which it could be supported. It is true that he did cite some precedents in our legislation which he supposes to have a bearing on the subject; but which, I shall undertake to prove hereafter, are wholly inapplicable. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has gone further into the argument, and has attempted to prove that this bill is constitutional. At the proper time I shall endeavor to furnish the proper answer to his remarks. By-the-by, this Constitution is a terrible bugbear. Whilst a member of the other House, I once heard an old gentleman exclaim, when it was cited against one of his favorite measures, "what a vast deal of good it prevents us from doing!" After this bill shall have passed it will be a bugbear no longer, so far as the freedom of speech or of the press is concerned. It will not then alarm even political children.

The gentlemen have a precedent for their bill. Yes, sir, they have a precedent in the sedition law; but it does not go far enough for their purpose. That law, which is the only true precedent on which this bill can be founded, and on which alone it can be sustained, permitted every man to write and to publish what he pleased concerning public men and public measures, and only held him responsible in case his charges should prove to be false. But this bill is a gag law. It goes to the fountain at once, and prohibits the officer not only from writing, but from speaking anything good, bad, or indifferent, whether true or false, on any subject whatever which may affect any pending election, from that of a President down to a constable. It has a much broader sweep than the sedition law, which did not interfere with the liberty of speech, however much it may have abridged the freedom of the press. Indeed, among the more enlightened despotisms of Europe, I know not one which prohibits the freedom of speech on all public subjects; it is only in free and enlightened America that we propose actually to insert the gag. The sedition law was bad enough, God knows; but it extended only to the use of the pen, not to that of the tongue. There is, therefore, no parallel between the two cases.

Had it not been for the existence of the sedition law, I should have supposed it to be impossible that there could have been two opinions in regard to the utter unconstitutionality of this bill. The Constitution, in language so plain as to leave no room for misconstruction, declares that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." The rule is universal. There is no exception. This bill proposes not only to abridge, but utterly to destroy the freedom of speech and of the press; to interdict their use altogether to the enumerated officers, on all questions touching the election of any officer of the Federal or State Government. A plain man would naturally suppose that, barely to state the contradiction between the Constitution and this bill was to decide the question. Not so. An ingenious and astute lawyer, in favor of a liberal construction of that instrument, can, by inference and ingenuity, confer powers upon Congress in direct violation both of its letter and its spirit, and of which its framers never once dreamed. Such was the power to pass the sedition law. That law ingrafted one limitation upon the freedom of the press. It, in effect, changed the meaning of the general terms, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," and excepted from their operation any law which might be passed to punish libels against the President, the Government, or either House of Congress. The present bill, in principle at least, proceeds much further. It excepts from the general prohibition of the Constitution the power of punishing all persons holding offices under the Government of the United States who shall dare either to speak or to write at all on questions which may affect the result of any election. This interpolation must be inserted, before gentlemen can show any power to pass the present bill. They cannot advance one step in their argument without it. This Constitution can never be construed according to the meaning of its framers but by men of plain, well-informed, and practical judgment. Common sense is its best expounder. Ingenious men disposed to raise one implication upon another in favor of Federal power, and to make each previous precedent the foundation on which to proceed another step in the march towards consolidation, may soon make it mean anything or nothing. The liberties of this country can only be preserved by a strict construction of the enumerated powers granted by the States to Congress.

Before I proceed further in my argument against the constitutionality of this bill, it will be proper that I should develop some of its latent beauties. I desire to delineate a little more precisely its character—to present some of its striking features, and to show what it is in principle, and what it will prove to be in practice.

There are twenty-six sovereign States in this Confederacy, united by a Federal compact, called the Constitution of the United States. Each individual elector in this country sustains two distinct characters. He is a citizen of some one of the States, and he is also a citizen of the United States. He is bound to perform the duties of a good citizen both towards his own State and towards the United States. Now, what does this bill propose? In the older States of this Confederacy, all the Federal officers which we have in the interior are postmasters. It is true that at our ports of entry there are custom-house officers; but in Pennsylvania, for example, from the Schuylkill to the Ohio and to Lake Erie, our people scarcely feel their connection with the General Government, except through the medium of the Post Office Department. These postmasters are very numerous. They are planted at every village and at every cross road. They are agents for disseminating information throughout the country. I might probably say that in nine instances out of ten the office is scarcely worth holding, on account of its pecuniary emoluments. In most cases, the postmaster accepts it for the accommodation of his neighbors. Now, this postmaster is generally a man of property and of character, having a deep stake in the community, and in the faithful administration and execution of the laws. Two candidates are presented to the people for office; say that of a justice of the peace.

If one of these village postmasters should, in the exercise of his unquestionable rights as a citizen of Pennsylvania, advise his neighbor to vote for one of these candidates, and against the other, this bill dooms him to a fine of $500, and to a perpetual disqualification from ever holding any office under the Government of the United States. No matter whether the merits which he may have ascribed to one of the candidates be true as Holy Writ, and the delinquencies which he may have charged against the other may be susceptible of the clearest proof, this will not arrest the vengeance of the bill. He is doomed to remain mute, although his dearest interests may be involved, or incur its penalties. A gag is to be put into his mouth, and he is to be punished if he dare to express a preference for one candidate over the other. And let me tell the gentleman, these postmasters hold all sorts of political opinions. In my own State a considerable proportion of their number are Whigs and Antislavery, opposed to the present Administration. I might cite other examples to depict the enormity of this bill, but I consider it wholly unnecessary. I might ascend from the justice of the peace or the constable, through all the gradations of elective office, State and Federal, to the President of the United States, and show that, at each ascending grade, the violation of the rights of the citizen becomes more and more outrageous. I might enumerate the weighers and the gaugers, and the other proscribed classes of inferior office-holders, and paint the mad and wanton injustice which this bill would inflict upon them. But enough.

The man who would accept office upon such terms must forfeit all self-respect, and would become at once a fit tool for corruption and for despotism. He must be degraded in his own eyes, and degraded in the eyes of his fellow-citizens below the rank of a freeman. If you desire to depreciate the Government itself under which we live, you cannot do it more effectually than by placing such a stigma on its officers.

Why, sir, you could not, by any possibility, carry such a law into execution. If it should pass to-morrow, it would fall a dead letter upon your statute-book. I would not advocate a forcible resistance to any law, and do not believe that such was the intention of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. WALL,] when he spoke of resistance; but does not the Senator from Virginia know that laws may be passed of a character so odious that nobody could be found to carry them into execution? Such are all laws which are entirely opposed to the spirit of the age, and the united and overwhelming current of public opinion. I firmly believe this to be the character of the present bill.

But suppose me to be mistaken in this opinion, and that the law could be carried into execution, what would be the consequences? The doomed officer, the postmaster, the weigher, or the gauger, is placed in the midst of a thinking, acting, busy population. Everything around him is proceeding with the impetuosity of steam. Public opinion is marching onward with giant strides. The officer is talked at and talked to, daily and hourly, by the surrounding multitude, whilst the law compels him to close his lips in silence. Under such circumstances, it would be impossible for human nature long to refrain. What then? If he utters a syllable on any of the exciting political topics of the day, and these are all involved in the perpetual canvass which is proceeding for offices, high and low, he is at once seized upon by some harpy of an informer. This bill offers a most tempting bribe to such eavesdroppers. It would soon call into existence such a race, to dog and surround every officer, and to catch up every incautious word which might be construed into an endeavor to persuade or dissuade an elector. Each individual in society is stimulated by this bill to become a common informer, by the tempting offer of a bribe of $250 in each particular case. The proscribed officer thus becomes his prey, and, in most cases, will be glad to compromise with him for the payment of a great part, or the whole, of the penalty of $500, in order to avoid the stigma of perpetual disability to hold any office under this Government.

There is another remark which I desire to make on this branch of the subject. Whenever you attempt to violate the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution, a thousand evils, of which you have never dreamed, present themselves in the perspective. This law can alone be executed by the courts of the United States. Where are they situated? In the large States, such as Pennsylvania or Virginia, they are held at great distances from each other. A postmaster in either of these States, the income of whose office does not exceed fifty dollars per annum, may be dragged from home, a distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles, to stand his trial under this bill before a Federal court. The expense would be enormous, whilst he is obliged to appear before a tribunal far from the place where his character and that of his prosecutor, are known and appreciated. Under such circumstances, he would almost be certain to become the victim of the common informer, under this most unjust and unconstitutional law. He would either be convicted, or compelled to buy his peace at almost any price.

In conferring the powers enumerated in the Constitution on the Federal Government, the States expressly reserved to themselves respectively, or to their people, all the powers not delegated by it to the United States, or prohibited by it to the States. Now I would ask the Senator from Kentucky when, or where, or how, has the

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Interference in Elections—Mr. Buchanan.

SENATE.

State of Pennsylvania surrendered to Congress the right of depriving any of her citizens, who may accept office under the General Government, of the freedom of speech or of the press? Where is it declared by the Constitution, either in express terms, or from what clause can it be fairly inferred, that Congress may make a forfeiture of the dearest of all political rights an indispensable condition of office? Each one of the people of Pennsylvania, under her constitution and laws, is secured in the inalienable right of speaking his thoughts. The State, as well as each individual citizen, has the deepest interest in the preservation of this right. I ask the gentleman to lay his finger on the clause of the Constitution by which it has been surrendered. Where is it declared, or from what can it be inferred, that because the States have yielded to the Federal Government their citizens to execute public trusts under the General Government, therefore they have yielded the rights of those citizens to express their opinions freely concerning public men and public measure? The proposition appears to me to be full of absurdity. In regard to the qualifications of electors, the States have granted no power whatever to the United States. This subject they have expressly reserved from Federal control. The Legislatures of the States, and they alone, under the Constitution, possess the power of prescribing the qualifications of the electors of members of the House of Representatives in Congress. They have reserved the same power to themselves in regard to voters for the choice of electors for President and Vice President.

What, then, does this bill attempt? To separate two things which reason and the Almighty himself have united beyond all power of separation. You might as well attempt, by arbitrary laws, to separate human life from the power of breathing the vital air, as to detach the elective franchise from freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press. In this atmosphere alone can it live and move and have its being. To speak his thoughts is every free elector's inalienable right. Freedom of speech and of the press are both the sword and the shield of our Republican institutions. To declare that, when the citizens of a State accept office from the General Government, they thereby forfeit this right to express an opinion in relation to the public concerns of their own State and of the nation, is palpable tyranny. In the language referred to in the report, "it puts bridles into their mouths and saddles upon their backs," and degrades them from the rank of a reasoning animal. The English precedent of the Senator was wiser, much wiser, in depriving these officers of the right of suffrage altogether. It does not attempt to separate, by the power of man, two things which Heaven itself has indissolubly united.

If, therefore, the Constitution contained no express provision whatever prohibiting Congress from passing any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, I think I have shown conclusively that the power to pass this bill could not be inferred from any of its express grants of power. But the Constitution is not silent on the subject. Before its adoption by the States, it was dreaded by the jealous patriots of the day, that the Federal Government might usurp the liberties of the people by attacking the liberty of speech and of the press. They, therefore, insisted upon the insertion of an express provision, as an amendment, which, in all time to come, would prevent Congress from interfering with these inestimable rights. The amendment to which I have referred was adopted, and these rights were expressly excepted from the powers of the Federal Government. And yet, in the very face of this express negative of Federal power, we find the Senator from Kentucky coming forward with his bill declaring direct war against any exercise of the freedom of speech and of the press by those citizens of the States who happen to be office-holders under the General Government.

But, says the Senator from Virginia, Congress possess, and have exercised, the unquestionable power of creating officers under the Constitution; and they may, therefore, annex to the holding of these offices such a condition as that prescribed by the bill, or rather the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. Now, sir, what is this but to say that Congress may declare that any citizen of Pennsylvania who accepts a Federal office shall take it upon condition that it shall be forfeited the moment he exercises the dearest political right guaranteed to him and every other citizen by the Constitution of the United States. Can Congress impose any such condition upon an office? If they can, they can repeal the most solemn provision of the Constitution, and render it a dead letter in regard to every person in the employment of the General Government. All mankind may then speak and publish what they please, except those individuals who have been selected, I hope, generally, for their integrity and ability, to execute the important public trusts of the country.

The Senator from Kentucky has adduced several precedents to prove that similar powers have been already exercised by Congress in other cases. Let us examine them for a moment. Congress, says he, has declared that an Indian agent who shall himself trade with the Indians, shall be punished for this act. But why? It is because this agent is vested with the power of granting to our citizens licenses to trade with the Indians, and thus to take care that they shall not be imposed upon and cheated. To allow him, therefore, to trade with them himself, would be to make him a judge in his own cause, and to withdraw from them that protection which the law intended. Besides, Congress have received from the States, by the Constitution, the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. The whole subject is thus placed under their control. What, then, is this precedent worth? Is not the trading of an Indian agent with the Indians an express and palpable violation of a duty necessarily involved in his office? Can anything be clearer than the power and the duty of Congress to punish him for this offense? But what interference can there be between the performance of the duties required by law from a postmaster, or from any other of the proscribed officers, and his expression of an opinion to his neighbor, either for or against any candidate for public office? If the postmaster, for example, performs his whole official duty, if he receives and delivers the letters intrusted to his care, and regularly settles his accounts with the Department, what human power can arbitrarily place a gag in his mouth, and declare that he shall be punished for exercising the freedom of speech and of the press, upon the pretext that the exercise of these rights of a freeman are inconsistent with the duties of his office? You might just as well punish him or deprive him of his office for speaking or writing on natural philosophy or mathematics, or any other scientific subject. You would have the same power to violate that clause in the Constitution conferring upon every man the free exercise of religion, and punish him for expressing his opinion on religious subjects, for attending prayer meetings or bible societies, or for endeavoring to persuade or dissuade any member of the religious society to which he belongs in relation to the choice of its pastor. The principle is precisely the same in both cases. Your whole power hath this extent—no more. You can punish the officer for neglecting or for violating the duties which appropriately belong to his office. You cannot repeal the Constitution by declaring it to be an official duty that he shall abandon the constitutional right of speaking his thoughts upon any subject whatsoever, whether religious, scientific, or political. In other words, you have no right to declare that he shall become a slave when he becomes an officer.

A similar answer, if it were necessary, might be given to the Senator's other precedents. Officers of the customs are prohibited from owning any vessel or cargo under a pecuniary penalty. And why? Because they themselves are to direct and superintend the entry of vessels and cargoes belonging to other persons, and the collection of duties; and to allow them to transact this business for themselves, would be to make them judges in their own cause. It would be an evident violation of the duty naturally attached to their office. But will any one contend that their constitutional freedom of speech, in regard to candidates for office, is incompatible with the proper entry or unloading of vessels engaged either in foreign commerce or the coasting trade?

So the register of a land office is prohibited from entering lands in his own name; or, in other words, from selling lands to himself.

Such are the precedents which the Senator has cited to justify himself in depriving the officers embraced by his bill of the right of freedom of speech and of the press.

But I do not mean even to rest the constitutional question here. From the very nature of the Constitution itself, two great political parties must ever exist in this country. You may call them by what names you will, their principles must ever continue to be the same. The one, dreading Federal power, will ever be friendly to a strict construction of the powers delegated to the Federal Government and to State rights. The other, equally dreading Federal weakness, will ever advocate such a liberal construction of the Constitution as will confer upon the General Government as much power as possible, consistently with a free interpretation of the terms of the instrument. The one party is alarmed at the danger of consolidation; the other at that of disunion. In the days of the elder Adams, the party friendly to a liberal construction of the Constitution got into power. And what did they do? Among other things, in the very face of that clause of the Constitution which prohibited Congress from passing any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, they passed the sedition law. What were its provisions? It punished false scandalous, and malicious libels against the Government of the United States, either House or Congress, or the President, by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

At the present day it would be useless to waste the time of the Senate in proving that this law was a violation of the Constitution. It is now admitted that Congress, in passing it, had transgressed their powers. If any principle has been established beyond a doubt by the almost unanimous opinion of the people of the United States, it is that the sedition law was unconstitutional. Such is the strong and universal feeling against it, that if it could now be revived, the authors would probably meet a similar fate with those deluded and desperate men in France who have themselves lately fallen victims upon the same altar on which they had determined to sacrifice the liberty of the press.

The popular odium which followed this law was not so much excited by its particular provisions, as by the fact that any law upon the subject was a violation of the Constitution, and would establish a precedent for giving such a construction to it as would swallow up the rights of the States, and of their people, in the gulf of Federal power.

The Constitution had declared that "Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Its framers well knew that, under the laws of each of the States composing this Union, libels were punishable. They, therefore, left the character of all officers created under the Constitution and laws of the United States to be protected by the laws of the several States. They were afraid to give this Government any authority over the subject of libels, lest its colossal power might be wielded against the liberty of the press. Congress were, therefore, prohibited from passing any law upon the subject, whether good or bad. It was not merely because the law was unjust in itself, though it was bad enough Heaven knows, that the indignant Republicans of that day rose against it; but it was because it violated the Constitution. It expired by its own limitation in March, 1801; but not until it had utterly prostrated the political party which gave it birth.

Now, sir, I shall say a few words concerning the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798: although the Senator from Virginia may consider it sacrilege in me to discuss this subject. I have at all times, ever since I read and understood these resolutions, held to the political doctrines which they inculcate; and I can assure the Senator I have studied them with care. I will read a few extracts from the Virginia resolutions. The General Assembly, in the third resolution,

"Doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact, to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact."

And in the fourth resolution they express their deep regret "That a spirit has, in sundry instances, been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its powers by forced constructions of the constitutional charter which defines them."

In regard to the sedition law, they declare that its passage was the exercise of

"A power not delegated by the Constitution; but, on the contrary, expressly and positively forbidden by one of the amendments thereto; a power which, more than any other, ought to produce universal alarm, because it is leveled against that right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed the only effectual guardian of every other right."

Now, sir, what is the essence, what is the root of all these resolutions? It consists of one plain, clear, fundamental principle, from which all others proceed as branches. It is this: that patriotism—that the permanence of our institutions—that all the principles of correct construction require that the Federal Government shall be limited to the express powers granted to it by the States, and that no implied powers shall ever be exercised, except such as are evidently and plainly necessary to carry the express powers into effect. This is the foundation, the corner stone, the vital principle of all the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. It was because the sedition law violated this principle that the republican statesmen of Virginia and Kentucky opposed it with such a determined spirit. It was, as Mr. Madison says in his report, because such a loose construction of the Constitution as would bring this law within its pale, would lay the foundation from which the friends of a strong central Government might proceed to rob the States and the people of their liberties, and establish a consolidated Government. It was the first stride towards a limited monarchy.

The Federalists of that day honestly believed that the Government should be strengthened at the center, and that the pulsations of the heart were not powerful enough to extend a wholesome circulation to the extremities. They, therefore, used every effort to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government by construction. This was the touchstone which then divided parties, and which will continue to divide them until, which God forbid, the Government itself shall cease to exist.

Now, sir, if I have correctly stated the principle which runs through all the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, I would ask whether the bill now before the Senate is not a more palpable violation of this principle than the sedition law. I shall now proceed to establish this position.

In the first place, then, the sedition law did not interfere with the freedom of speech. The citizen might speak what he thought, and say what he pleased, without subjecting himself to its penalties. Under the despotisms of Europe there is a strict censorship over the press. Everything written for publication must undergo the supervision and correction of a Government censor before it can be published. In the most despotic countries, however, some indulgence is granted to the liberty of speech on political questions. The bill establishes more than a universal censorship over the freedom of speech. It compels the officer to be silent altogether on political questions. He dare not utter a word without incurring its penalties. In this country, every public question connects itself with our elections. If there be two candidates for any State Legislature, and the election should turn upon internal improvements, or the division of a county, the officer is as much exposed to the universal sweep of this bill, in case he utters a word in favor of the one or against the other, as though it were the presidential election. He is equally doomed to silence in the one case as in the other. Such tyranny is unknown to the sedition law.

Whilst I was abroad, some years ago, I heard an anecdote highly creditable to the King of Prussia, who, although a despot, is, by his subjects, called a Democratic King. The revolutionary war of Poland against Russia was then raging, and the Polish subjects of the Prussian King were highly excited in favor of their brethren under the dominion of Russia. They talked very freely in favor of taking part in the contest; of casting off the Prussian yoke, and uniting with their brethren in reestablishing the independence of Poland. The counselors of the King advised him to prohibit and punish this freedom of speech; he answered that he would do no such thing; that he would suffer them to express their opinions, and that there was less danger that they would rise against his Government than if they remained silent. This was the remark of a liberal and wise man, who had been instructed in the school of adversity.

But, in this favored land of liberty, in the nineteenth century, we are about to deny to our citizens the privilege of speaking their thoughts. This is the first attempt which I have ever known or read of, either in England or this country, to punish the expression of opinions relative to candidates for office as a crime. If ever this was done in England, even in the reigns of the Tudors or the Stuarts, it must have been a Star Chamber offense. In the more enlightened despotisms of Europe they will learn, with astonishment, that a bill has been introduced into the Senate of the United States proposing to punish a postmaster for expressing his opinion in favor of a candidate for office, as if this were an enormous crime, with a fine of five hundred dollars, and a perpetual disability to hold any other office under the Government. Even under the common law of England, oral slander is not punishable as a crime. The party injured by it is left to his private remedy.

In the second place, the sedition law, although it did abridge, did not, like this bill, totally destroy the freedom of the press. The sedition law deprived no man of the right or the power, in the first instance, to write and publish to the world any strictures upon the Government which he might think proper. To be sure, if, in exercising this privilege, he violated the truth, he was made responsible to its penalties. This bill reaches the very fountains of thought. Its object is to prevent its victims from speaking or writing at all. No matter how innocent, or praiseworthy, or true, may be the conversation or the publication, still if it can be construed into an endeavor to persuade any elector to give his vote for a particular candidate, he is doomed to a fine of $500, and a perpetual disability to hold office.

Again: under the sedition law, the accused was permitted to protect himself against its penalties, by giving the truth of his charge in evidence. Any individual who had accused the President of the United States of being a bad and dangerous man, who was aiming a blow at the liberties of his country, and desired to usurp the powers of the Government by a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, was protected by this law from all responsibility, provided he could prove the truth of these allegations to the satisfaction of a court and jury of his countrymen. Not so the present bill. If a postmaster, or a land officer, or a weigher, or a gauger, should endeavor to dissuade any elector from voting for a particular candidate, and should say that this candidate has been guilty of a crime, and therefore his election would be dangerous to the country, and is brought before a court and jury for trial under this bill, he must be convicted, although he may be able to prove the truth of his charge by evidence as clear as a sunbeam. The old English maxim, "the greater the truth the greater the libel," is again revived, with some show of reason; because the language of truth would be more powerful in persuading or dissuading an elector than that of falsehood. Although every member of the court and the jury might personally know that what the accused had uttered was the truth, yet, under the provisions of this bill, they would be bound to convict and sentence him to suffer its penalties.

I think I have thus established my position, that this bill is worse, and more glaringly unconstitutional, than the sedition law.

I now approach the argument of the Senator from Virginia in favor of the constitutionality of this bill. The old argument in favor of the sedition law, as stated by Mr. Madison in his report, was that the general phrases in the preamble and one clause in the Constitution, were sufficiently powerful to extend the limited grants of power contained in the body of the instrument, and to confer upon Congress the authority to enact any law they might think proper for the common defense and the general welfare. This doctrine has long since been exploded, and was not adverted to by the Senator from Virginia. We are informed, by the same authority, that another argument used was, that all the State Legislatures had passed laws for the punishment of libels; and that, therefore, the same power belonged to the Government of the United States. A similar argument could not be urged by the Senator in support of this bill; because no State Legislature ever has, and I will venture to say no State Legislature ever will pass such a bill as that now before the Senate. To what argument then did the Senator resort? I shall endeavor to state it fairly. He asks, if a judge were to use the freedom of speech or of the press in canvassing the merits of a cause before the people, which it would become his duty afterwards to decide, would it be an abridgment of this freedom to punish him for such conduct? I answer, certainly not. But does not the gentleman perceive that the offense in this case is substantive and independent, and amounts to a total violation of his official duty, for which he ought to be impeached? The language, oral or printed, which he has used, is the mere agent which he has employed in the commission of the offense. This argument is a begging of the question; for it assumes that, under the Constitution, Congress possesses the power to punish one citizen for persuading another, by fair argument, to give his vote for or against any candidate for office. This is the very principle to be established.

Again he asks, suppose one of the officers embraced by the bill were to use the freedom of speech or of the press, in saying to an elector, if you will give your vote for such a candidate, I will procure you an office: would not such an officer be punishable? I answer, certainly he would, under the State laws; because this would be an attempt to procure a vote by corrupt and improper means. It is a distinct offense, the punishment of which in no manner interferes with the liberty of speech or the press when exercised to accomplish constitutional purposes. A similar answer might be given to his interrogatory in regard to giving a challenge, by word or by writing, to fight a duel. The last question, which capped the climax of his argument, was, if a man be guilty of a false and malicious libel against an innocent person, may you not punish him, under the Constitution, without invading the freedom of speech or the press, because it is not the words he may use which you punish, but the falsehood of the charge, the evil intention, and the injury inflicted? I ask the Senator if this argument is not a justification of the sedition law to the fullest extent? I have taken down the Senator's words, and cannot be mistaken in their meaning. What did the sedition law declare? That the authors of "false, scandalous, and malicious" libels, with the evil intentions enumerated in the act, should incur its penalties. It was not the mere words published that were punished, but it was their falsehood, their malice, and their evil intention. The constitutionality of the sedition law is, therefore, embraced not only within the spirit, but within the very words, of the Senator's argument. Has he not, however unconsciously, defended the sedition law? This argument, to my knowledge, never occurred to those who passed that law; but it is one which, if well founded, would give us the power to-morrow to pass another sedition law.

Do not Senators perceive that the passage of this bill would utterly disfranchise a large and respectable class of our people? Under it, what would be the condition of all the editors of your political journals, whose business and whose duty it is to enlighten public opinion in regard to the merits or demerits of candidates for office? Pass this law, and you declare that no editor of a public paper, of either party, is capable or worthy of holding any of the proscribed offices. He must at once either abandon his paper, and with it the means of supporting himself and his family, or he must surrender any little office which he may hold under the Government.

And yet this bill is supported by my friend from Virginia, who, to use his own language, "has been imbued with the principles of democracy, and a regard for State rights, from his earliest youth." If such a charge should ever be made against him hereafter, his speech and his vote in favor of this bill will acquit him before any court in Christendom where the truth may be given in evidence. I yet trust that he may never vote for its passage.

Every measure of this kind betrays a want of confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the American people. It is founded on a distrust of their judgment and integrity. Do you suppose that when a man is appointed a collector or a postmaster he acquires any more influence over the people than he had before? No, sir! On the contrary, his influence is often diminished instead of being increased. The people of this country are abundantly capable of judging whether he is most influenced by love of country or love of office. If they should determine that his motives are purely mercenary for supporting a political party, this will destroy his influence. If he be a noisy, violent, and meddling politician, he will do the Administration under which he has been appointed much more harm than good. Let me assure gentlemen that the people are able to take care of themselves. They do not require the interposition of Congress to prevent them from being deceived and led astray by the influence of office-holders. Whilst this is my fixed opinion, I think the number of Federal officers ought to be strictly limited to the actual necessities of the Government. Pursue this course, and, my life for it, all the land officers and postmasters and weighers and gaugers which you shall send abroad over the country can never influence the people to betray their own cause. For my own part, I entertain the most perfect confidence in their intelligence as well as integrity.

That office-holders possess comparatively but little influence over the people, will conclusively appear from the brief history of the last two years, the period during which this dreaded man, Mr. Van Buren, has been in office. What has all this alarming influence of the office-holders effected at the only points where they are to be found in any considerable number? In the city of Philadelphia, notwithstanding all the influence of the custom-house, the post office, and the mint, the majority, at the last election, against the Administration was tremendous, being, I believe, upwards of four thousand. The Pretorian guards, as they have been called, performed but little service on that day in that city. On the other hand, look at the interior of Pennsylvania. There the Governor, whose patronage within the limits of the State was as great, under the old constitution, as that of the King of England, had filled every office with enemies of the present Administration. Of this I do not complain; for, whether right or wrong, it has been the long-established practice of both political parties. It is true that many of the postmasters were friendly to the Administration; but it is equally certain that a large proportion of them warmly espoused the cause of the Opposition. What was the result? Those yielding this vast patronage were entirely routed, notwithstanding the exertions of the office-holders. Gentlemen may quiet their alarms, and be assured that the people cannot be persuaded to abandon their principles by the influence of men in office.

Again: let us look at the State of New York for another example. There the Albany Regency were seated in power. The Democratic party was well drilled. All the office-holders of the State and of the city were friendly to the Administration. Besides, in my opinion, they fought in the righteous cause; and this same abused Albany Regency, who were their leaders, was composed of as able and as honest men as were ever at the head of any State government. What was the result there? With all this official power and patronage, both of the State and Federal Governments, we were beaten, horse, foot, and dragoons. There is not the least necessity for passing an unconstitutional law to save the people from the influence of the office-holders.

Have we not been beaten in all the large cities of the Union, where only there are Federal officers in any considerable number? What has been our fate in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and New Orleans? We have been vanquished in all of them. The hobgoblins and chimeras dire respecting the influence of office-holders which terrify gentlemen, exist only in their own imagination. The people of this country are not the tame and servile creatures who can be seduced from their purpose by the persuasion of the office-holders. It is true that in 1828 I did say that the office-holders were the enlisted soldiers of that Administration by which they were sustained. This was too strong an expression. But admit them to be enlisted soldiers; and whilst I do not deny them some influence, there is no danger to be apprehended from it as long as there is virtue and intelligence among our people.

And here I hope the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me for suggesting to him an amendment to his bill. He has, I think, made one or two mistakes in the classification of his officers; though, in the general, it is sufficiently perfect. The principle would seem to have been to separate what may be called the aristocracy of office-holders from the plebeians. Those of the elevated class are still permitted to enjoy the freedom of speech and of the press, whilst the hard working operatives among them are denied this privilege. The heads of Departments and bureaus, the officers of the Army and Navy, the superintendents and officers of our mints, and our district attorneys, are not affected by the bill. These gentlemen are privileged by their elevation. They are too high to be reached by its provisions. Who, then, ought to care whether weighers and gaugers, and village postmasters, and hard-handed draymen, and such inferior people, shall be permitted to express their thoughts on public affairs? I would suggest, however, that the collectors of our principal sea-ports, the marshals of our extensive judicial districts, and the postmasters in our principal cities, receive compensation sufficient to enable them to figure in "good society." They ought to rank with the district attorneys, and should be elevated from the plebeian to the patrician rank of office-holders. They ought to be allowed the freedom of speech and of the press. As to the subordinate officers, they are not worth the trouble of a thought.

To be sure, there is one palpable absurdity on the face of the bill. Its avowed purpose is to prevent office-holders from exercising an influence in elections. Why, then, except from its operation all those office-holders who, from their station in society, can exercise the most extensive influence, and confine its provisions to the humbler, but not less meritorious class whose opinions can have but a limited influence over their fellow-men? The district attorney, for example, is excepted—the very man of all others who, from his position and talents, has the best opportunity of exerting an extensive influence. He may ride over his district, and make political speeches to secure the election of his favorite candidate. He is too high a mark for the gentleman's bill. But if the subordinates of the custom-house or the petty postmaster at the cross roads, with an income of fifty dollars per annum, shall dare, even in private conversation, to persuade an elector to vote for or against any candidate, he is to be punished by a fine of $500, and a perpetual disability to hold any office under the Government. Was there ever a bill more unequal or more unjust?

Now, sir, I might here, with great propriety, and very much to the relief both of my audience and myself, leave this subject; but there are still some other observations which I conceive it to be my duty to add to what I have already said. Most of them will be elicited by the very strong remarks of my friend from Virginia; for I trust that I may still be permitted to call him by that name.

He and I entered the House of Representatives almost together. I believe he came into it but two years after myself. We soon formed a mutual friendship, which has ever since, I may say, on my part, with great sincerity, continued to exist. We fought shoulder to shoulder, and his great powers were united with my feeble efforts in prostrating the administration of the younger Adams. General Jackson came into power; and, during the whole period of that administration, he was the steady, unwavering supporter of all its leading measures, except the specie circular and his advocacy of the currency bill; and, on that bill, I stood by him, in opposition to the Administration. Whilst this man of destiny was in power—this man of the lion heart, whose will the Whigs declared was law, and whose roaring terrified all the other beasts of the forest, and subdued them into silence—where was then the Senator from Virginia? He was our chosen champion in the fight. Whilst General Jackson was exerting all this tremendous influence, and marshaling all his trained bands of office-holders to do his bidding, according to the language of the Opposition, these denunciations had no terrors for the Senator from Virginia. Never in my life did I perform a duty of friendship with greater ardor than when, on one occasion, I came to his rescue from an unjust attack made against him by the Whigs, in relation to a part of his conduct whilst Minister to France. After holding out so long together, ought he not, at least, to have parted from us in peace, and bade us a kind adieu? In abandoning our camp, why did he shoot Parthian arrows behind him? In taking leave of us, I hope not forever, is it not too hard for us to hear ourselves denounced by the gentleman in the language which he has used:

"He is amazed and bewildered with the scenes passing before him. Whither, he asks, will the mad domination of party carry us? His mind is filled with despondency as to the fate of his country. Shall we emulate the servility of the Senate and people of Rome? You already have your Pretorian bands in this city."

I might quote from his speech other phrases of a similar character; but these are sufficient. I do not believe that any of these expressions were aimed at me personally; yet they strike me with the mass of my political friends, and I feel bound to give them a passing notice.

And why, let me ask the Senator, why did he not sooner make the discovery of the appalling danger of Executive influence? Is there more to be dreaded from that cause under the present Administration than under that which is past? Is Martin Van Buren more formidable than General Jackson was? Let his favorite author, de Tocqueville, answer this question. He says:

"The power of General Jackson perpetually increases, but that of the President declines; in his hands the Federal Government is strong, but it will pass enfeebled into the hands of his successor."

Do we not all now know this to be the truth? Has not the Government passed enfeebled into the hands of his successor? We see it and feel it and know it from everything which is passing around us. The civilian has succeeded the conqueror; and, I must be permitted to say, has exercised his high powers with great moderation and purity of purpose. In what manner has he ever abused his patronage? In this particular, of what can the gentleman complain?

In February, 1828, I did say that the office-holders were the enlisted soldiers of the Administration. But did I then propose to gag them? Did I propose to deprive them of the freedom of speech and of the press? No, sir, no! Notwithstanding the number of them scattered over the country, I was not afraid of their influence. On the contrary, I commended the Administration for adhering to its friends. I then used the following language:

"In my humble judgment, the present Administration could not have proceeded a single year, with the least hope of reelection but for their patronage. This patronage may have been used unwisely, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LETCHER] (and I am still proud to call him my friend, notwithstanding our political opposition) has insinuated. I have never blamed them, I shall never blame them, for adhering to their friends. Be true to your friends and they will be true to you, is the dictate both of justice and of sound policy. I shall never participate in abusing the Administration for remembering their friends. If you go too much abroad with this patronage for the purpose of making new friends, you will offend your old ones, and make but very insincere converts."

What was my opinion in 1828, when I was in the Opposition, is still my opinion in 1839, when I am in the majority. I say now, that the Administration which goes abroad with its patronage to make converts of its enemies, at the expense of its friends, acts both with ingratitude and injustice. Such an Administration deserves to be prostrated. Although neither from principle nor from feeling am I a root and branch man, yet, in this respect, I adopt the opinion of General Washington, the first, the greatest, the wisest, and the best of our Presidents. I prefer him either to General Jackson or to the great Apostle of American liberty. This opinion, however, may proceed from the relics of old Federalism. On this subject General Washington says:

"I shall not, whilst I have the honor to administer the Government, bring a man into any office of consequence, knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government is pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide. That it would embarrass its movements is certain."

Now, sir, if any freak of destiny should ever place me in one of these Executive Departments, and I feel very certain that it never will, I shall tell you the course I would pursue. I should not become an inquisitor of the political opinions of the subordinate office-holders, who are receiving salaries of some eight hundred or a thousand dollars a year. For the higher and more responsible offices, however, I would select able, faithful, and well tried political friends, who felt a deep and devoted interest in the success of my measures. And this not for the purpose of concealment; for no public officer ought to be afraid of the scrutiny of the world; but that they might cheerfully cooperate with me in promoting what I believed to be the public interest. I would have no person around me, either to hold back in the traces, or to thwart and defeat my purposes. With General Washington, I believe that any other course "would be a sort of political suicide."

In executing the duties of a public office, I should act upon the same principles that would govern my conduct in regard to a private trust. If the Senator from Virginia were to constitute me his attorney, to transact any important business, I should never employ assistants whom I believed to be openly and avowedly hostile to his interests.

But, says the Senator, you already have your Pretorian bands in this city. He doubtless alludes to the office-holders in the different Departments of the Government; and, I ask, is Mr. Van Buren's influence over them greatly to be dreaded? If, sir, the President relies upon such troops he will most certainly be defeated. These Pretorian bands are, to a great extent, on the side of the Senator from Kentucky and his political friends. I would now do them great injustice if I were to call them the enlisted soldiers of the Administration. Whilst General Jackson was here they did keep tolerably quiet, but now I understand that many of these heads of bureaus and clerks use the freedom of speech and of the press without reserve against the measures of his successor. Of course, I speak from common report. God forbid that I should become an inquisitor as to any man's politics. It is generally understood that about one half of them are open enemies of the present Administration. I have some acquaintance with a few of those who are called its friends; and among this few I know several who, although they declare they are in favor of the reelection of Mr. Van Buren, yet they are decidedly opposed to all his prominent measures. Surrounded by such Pretorian bands, what has this tyrant done? Nothing—literally nothing. I believe he is the very last man in the country who can justly be charged with using his official patronage to control the freedom of elections. His forbearance towards his political enemies in office will unquestionably injure him to some extent, and especially in those States where, under the common party law, no person dreams of being permitted to hold office from his political enemies. His liberality in this respect has been condemned by many of his friends, whilst he is accused by his enemies of using his official patronage for corrupt political purposes. This is a hard fate. The Senator must, therefore, pardon me, after having his own high authority in favor of General Jackson's administration, if, under that of his successor, I cannot now see the dangers of Executive patronage in a formidable light.

There was one charge made by the Senator from Virginia against the present Administration which I should have been the first man to sustain, had I believed it to be well founded. Had the President evinced a determination, in the face of all his principles and professions, to form a permanent connection, in violation of law, between the Government and the Bank of the United States, or any other State bank, he should, in this particular, have encountered my unqualified opposition. In such an event, I should have been willing to serve under the command of the Senator against the Administration; and hundreds and thousands of the unbought and incorruptible Democracy would have rallied to our standard. I am convinced, however, from the reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War, and from the other lights which have been shed upon the subject, that "their poverty, and not their will, consented" to the partial and limited connection which resulted from the sale of the bond to the Bank of the United States. Such seems to have been the general opinion on this floor, because no Senator came to the aid of the gentleman from Virginia in sustaining this charge. "Where was Roderick then?" Why did not the Senator from Kentucky come to the rescue, and sustain his friend from Virginia in the accusation against the Administration of having again connected itself with the Bank of the United States?

The Senator from Virginia has informed us that in his State a law exists prohibiting any man who holds office under the Federal Government from holding, at the same time, a State office. This law prevents the same individual from serving two masters. A similar law, I believe, exists in every State of this Union. If there is not, there ought to be. The Federal and State Governments ought to be kept as distinct and independent of each other as possible. The General Government ought never to be permitted to insinuate itself into the concerns of the States, by using their officers as its officers. These incompatible laws proceed from a wise and wholesome jealousy of Federal power, and a proper regard for State rights. I heartily approve them. Then, sir, if there be danger in trusting a postmaster of the General Government with the commission of a magistrate under State authority, how infinitely more dangerous would it be to suffer the Administration to connect itself with all the State banks of the country? What immense influence over the people of the States could the Federal Government thus acquire! Suffer it to deposit the public money at pleasure with these banks, and permit them to loan it out for their own benefit, and you establish a vast Federal influence, not over weighers and gaugers and postmasters, but over the presidents and directors and cashiers and debtors and creditors of these institutions. You bind them to you by the strongest of all ties—that of self-interest; and they are men who, from their position, cannot fail to exercise an extensive influence over the people of the States. I am a State-rights man, and am therefore opposed to any connection between this Government and the State banks; and last of all to such a connection with the Bank of the United States, which is the most powerful of them all. This is one of the chief reasons why I am in favor of an independent Treasury. And yet, friendly to State rights as the Senator professes to be, he complains of the President for opposing such a connection with the State banks, and thereby voluntarily depriving himself of the power and influence which must ever result from such a union.

There are other reasons why I am friendly to an independent Treasury; but this is not the proper occasion to discuss them. I shall merely advert to one which, in my opinion, renders an immediate separation from the banks indispensable to the public interest. The importation of foreign goods into New York since the commencement of the present year, very far exceeds according to our information, the corresponding importations during the year 1836, although they were greater in that year than they had ever been since the origin of our Government. This must at once create a large debt against us in England.

Meanwhile, what is our condition at home? New York has established what is called a free banking law, under whose provisions more than fifty banks had been established in the beginning of January last, and I know not how many since, with permission to increase their capital to $487,000,000. These banks do not even profess to proceed upon the ancient, safe, and well established principle of making the specie in their vaults bear some just and reasonable proportion to their circulation and deposits. Another and a novel principle is adopted. State loans and mortgages upon real estate are made to take the place of gold and silver; and an amount of bank notes may be issued equal to the amount of these securities deposited with the Comptroller. There is no restriction whatever imposed on these banks in regard to specie, except that they are required to hold eleven pence in the dollar, not of their circulation and deposits united, but of their circulation alone. Well may that able officer have declared, in his report to the Legislature, that "it is now evident that the point of danger is not an exclusive metallic currency, but an exclusive paper currency, so redundant and universal as to excite apprehensions for its stability." The amount of paper issues of these banks, and the amount of bank credits, must rapidly expand the paper circulation, and again produce extravagant speculation.

The example of New York will have a powerful influence on the other States of the Union. Already has Georgia established a free banking law; and a bill for the same purpose is now before the Legislature of Pennsylvania. If the signs of the times do not deceive me, we shall have another explosion sooner, much sooner than I had anticipated. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] nods his assent.

Mr. WEBSTER. I think so also.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This paper bubble must, from its nature, go on rapidly expanding, until it reaches the bursting point. The recent suspension of specie payments by the branch bank of Mobile, in the State of my friend from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] may be the remote and distant thunder, premonitory of the approaching storm. This is all foreign, however, to the subject before the Senate. I desire now to declare solemnly in advance, that if this explosion should come, and the money of the people in the Treasury should again be converted into irredeemable bank paper and bank credits, the Administration will be guiltless of the deed. We have tried, but tried in vain, to establish an Independent Treasury where this money would be safe, in the custody of officers responsible to the people.

There is one incident in relation to the Bank of the United States which my friend from Virginia may be curious to know. Under the Pennsylvania charter it was prohibited from issuing notes under ten dollars. I had fondly hoped that this example might be gradually followed by our Legislature in regard to the other banks, until the time should arrive when our whole circulation under ten dollars should consist of gold and silver. The free banking law of New York has enabled the bank to nullify this restriction. Under this law it has established a bank in the city of New York, the capital of which may be increased to $50,000,000, and has transferred to the Comptroller of that State Michigan State loan to the amount of $200,000. And what notes, Mr. President, do you suppose it has taken in lieu of this amount of loan? Not an assortment of different denominations, as the other banks have done, but forty thousand five dollar notes. These five dollar notes will be paid out and circulated by the bank at Philadelphia; and thus the wise ten-dollar restriction contained in its Pennsylvania charter is completely annulled.

If, therefore, I could believe for a moment that this Government intended to form a permanent connection with the Bank of the United States, and again make it the general depository and fiscal agent of the Treasury, even if no other principle were involved than that of the enormous increase of Executive patronage which must necessarily follow, I should at once stand with my friend from Virginia in opposition to the Administration. But I would not go over with him to the enemy's camp. I have somewhere read a eulogy on the wisdom of the Catholic church for tolerating much freedom of opinion in non-essentials among its members. A pious, an enthusiastic, and an ardent spirit, which, if it belonged to any Protestant church, might produce a schism, is permitted to establish a new order, and thus to benefit, instead of injuring, the ancient establishment. I might point to a St. Dominick and a Lovola for examples. Now, sir, I admit that the Whig party is very catholic in this respect. It tolerates great difference of opinion. Its unity almost consists in diversity. In that party we recognize "the Democratic anti-Masonic" branch. Yes, sir, that is the approved name. I need not mention the names of its two distinguished leaders. The peculiar tenet of this respectable portion of the universal political Whig church is a horrible dread of the murderers of Morgan, whose ghost, like that of Hamlet's father, walks abroad, and revisits the pale glimpses of the moon, seeking vengeance on his murderers. I wish they could be found, and punished as they deserve. Though not Abolitionists in the mass, they do not absolutely reject, though they may receive with an awkward grace, the overtures and aid of the Abolitionists. In my portion of the country, at least, the Abolitionists are either incorporated with this branch of the party, or hang upon its outskirts. The Senator from Virginia and myself could not, I think, go over to this section of the party, nor would we be received by it into full communion. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] will, I think, find to his cost that he has done himself great injury with this branch of the Opposition, by the manly and patriotic sentiments which he expressed a few days ago on the subject of abolition.

Then comes the Whig party proper, in which the Senator from Kentucky stands preëminent. I need not detail its principles. Now, I humbly apprehend that even if the President of the United States should determine to ally himself with the bank, and force us to abandon him on that account, neither the Senator from Virginia nor myself could find refuge in the bosom of this party. We have both sinned against it beyond forgiveness. We were both in favor of the removal of the deposits—an offense which, with them, like original sin, "brought death into the world, and all our woe." For this no penitence can atone.

Again: we both voted for the expunging resolution; which, in their opinion, was an act of base subservency and man worship, and, withal, a palpable violation of the Constitution. So dreadful was this offense, that my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will never get over it. He has solemnly pledged himself to cry aloud and spare not, until this foul blot shall be removed from the Journals of the Senate. I should be glad to know why he has not yet introduced his annual resolution to efface this unsightly stain from the record of our proceedings?

In short, we should be compelled to form a separate branch of the Whig party. We should be the deposit-removing, expunging, force bill, anti-bank, Jackson Whigs. We should carry with us enough of locofocoism and other combustible materials to blow them all up. They had better have a care of us.

I hope the Senator may yet remain with us, and be persuaded that his old friends upon this floor do not resemble either the servile band in the Roman Senate, under the first Cæsar, or that which afterwards degraded themselves so low as to make the favorite horse of one of his successors high priest and consul. He can never be fully received into the communion of the faithful Whigs. Although the fathers of the church here may grant him absolution, yet the rank and file of the party throughout the country will never ratify the deed.

I was pleased to hear the Senator from Virginia, on yesterday, make the explanation which he did to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE], in regard to what he had said in favor of the British Government. I cheerfully take the explanation. I did suppose he had pronounced a high-wrought eulogy upon that Government; but it would not be fair to hold him, or any other Senator, to the exact meaning of words uttered in the heat and ardor of debate.

I agree with him that we are indebted for several of our most valuable institutions to our British ancestors. We have derived from them the principles of liberty established and consecrated by Magna Charta, the trial by jury, the right of petition, the habeas corpus act, and the revolution of 1688. And yet, notwithstanding all this, I should be very unwilling to make the British Government a model for our legislation in republican America. Look at its effects in practice. Is it a Government which sheds its benign influence, like the dews of Heaven, upon all its subjects? or is it not a Government where the rights of the many are sacrificed to promote the interests of the few? The landed aristocracy have controlled the election of a majority of the members of the House of Commons, and they themselves compose the House of Lords. The main scope and principal object of their legislation was to promote the great landed interests—that of the large manufacturers, and the fund holders of a national debt, amounting to more than seven hundred and fifty millions sterling. In order to accomplish these purposes, it became necessary to oppress the poor. Where is the country beneath the sun in which pauperism prevails to such a fearful extent? Is it not known to the whole world that the wages both of agricultural and manufacturing labor are reduced to the very lowest point necessary to sustain human existence? Look at Ireland—the fairest land I have ever seen. Her laboring population is confined to the potato. Rarely, indeed, do they enjoy either the wheat or the beef which their country produces in such plentiful abundance. It is chiefly sent abroad for foreign consumption.

The people of England are now struggling to make their institutions more free; and I trust in God they may succeed; yet their whole system is artificial; and, without breaking it down altogether, I do not perceive how the condition of the mass of the people can be much ameliorated. In the present state of the world, no friend of the human race ought probably to desire its immediate destruction. We ought to regard it rather as a beacon to warn us, than as a model for our imitation. We ought never, like England, to raise up by legislation any great interests or monopolies to oppress the people, which we cannot put down without crushing the Government itself. Such is now the condition of that country. I am no admirer of the British Constitution, either in Church or State, as it at present exists. I desire not a splendid Government for this country.

The Senator from Virginia has quoted with approbation, and sustained by argument, a sentiment from De Tocqueville, to which I can never subscribe. It is this: that there is greater danger, under a Government like ours, that the Chief Magistrate may abuse his power, than under a limited monarchy; because, being elected by the people, and their sympathies being strongly enlisted in his favor, he may go on to usurp the liberties of the country with their approbation.

Mr. RIVES rose and explained. Mr. BUCHANAN. From the gentleman's explanation, I find that I did not misquote either his proposition or his argument. I am sorry he speaks under the dominion of so much feeling. I have none at all on the present occasion. I shall proceed, and, at the proper time, and, I trust, in the proper manner, give my answer to this proposition.

The Senator has introduced De Tocqueville as authority on this question; and, in order to give greater weight and luster to this authority, has pronounced him superior to Montesquieu. Montesquieu was a profound thinker, and almost every sentence of his is an apothegm of wisdom. He has stood, and ever will stand, the test of time. I cannot compare De Tocqueville with Montesquieu. I think he himself would blush at such a comparison.

I may truly say that I have never met any Frenchman or Englishman who could understand the complicated relations existing between our Federal and State Governments. In this respect, De Tocqueville has not succeeded much better than the rest. I am disposed to quarrel with him for one thing, and that is, that he is opposed to the doctrines of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. He is one of those old Federalists, in the true acceptance of that term, who believe that the powers of the General Government are not sufficiently strong to protect it from the encroachment of the States. Hence one great object of his book is to prove that this Government is becoming weaker and weaker, while those of the States are growing stronger and stronger; and although he does not think the time near, yet the final catastrophe must be, that it will be dissolved by its own weakness, and the people at length, tired of the perpetual struggles of liberty, will finally seek repose in the arms of despotism. This result, in his opinion, is not to be brought about by the strength, but by the weakness, of the Federal Government. I might adduce many quotations to this effect from his book, but I shall trouble the Senate with but a few. He says, in summing up a long chapter on this subject:

"I am strangely mistaken if the Federal Government of the United States be not constantly losing strength, retreating gradually from public affairs, and narrowing its circle of action more and more. It is naturally feeble, but it now abandons even its pretensions to strength. On the other hand, I thought that I remarked a more lively sense of independence, and a more decided attachment to provincial government, in the States. The Union is to subsist, but to subsist as a shadow; it is to be strong in certain cases, and weak in all others; in time of warfare it is to be able to concentrate all the forces of the nation and all the resources of the country in its hands; and in time of peace its existence is to be scarcely perceptible; as if this alternate debility and vigor were natural or possible."

"I do not foresee anything, for the present, which may be able to check this general impulse of public opinion; the causes in which it originated do not cease to operate with the same effect. The change will therefore go on, and it may be predicted that, unless some extraordinary event occurs, the Government of the Union will grow weaker and weaker every day."

Again:

"So far is the Federal Government from acquiring strength and from threatening the sovereignty of the States, as it grows older, that I maintain it to be growing weaker and weaker, and that the sovereignty of the Union alone is in danger."

And again:

"It may, however, be foreseen even now, that, when the Americans lose their republican institutions, they will speedily arrive at a despotic government without a long interval of limited monarchy."

Speaking of the power of the President, he says:

"Hitherto, no citizen has shown any disposition to expose his honor and his life in order to become the President of the United States, because the power of that office is temporary, limited, and subordinate. The prize of fortune must be great to encourage adventurers in so desperate a game. No candidate has as yet been able to arouse the dangerous enthusiasm or the passionate sympathies of the people in his favor, for the very simple reason that, when he is at the head of the Government, he has but little power, but little wealth, and but little glory to share amongst his friends; and his influence in the State is too small for the success or the ruin of a faction to depend upon the elevation of an individual to power."

Now, if this greater than Montesquieu is to be believed, and his authority is to be relied upon by the Senator from Virginia, whence his terror and alarm lest the power of the President might be strengthened by the influence of the lower class of Federal office-holders at elections? Why should they be deprived of the freedom of speech and of the press, upon the principle that the power of Mr. Van Buren is dangerous to the liberties of his country? The gentleman's lauded authority is entirely against his own position. Now, for my own part, I differ altogether from De Tocqueville. Although I do not believe that the power and patronage of the President can with any, even the least, justice, be compared with that of the King of England, yet from the very nature of things, from the rapid increase of our population, from the number of new States, from our growing revenue and expenditures, from the additional number of officers necessary to conduct the affairs of the Government, and from many other causes which I might enumerate, I am convinced that the Federal Executive is becoming stronger and stronger. Rest assured he is not that feeble thing that De Tocqueville represents him to be. Federal power ought always to be watched with vigilant jealousy, not with unjust suspicion. It ought never to be extended by the creation of new offices, except they are absolutely necessary for the transaction of the public business.

SENATE.

The Whigs will be astonished to learn that, in the opinion of this author, General Jackson has greatly contributed, not to strengthen, but to weaken Federal power.

"Far from wishing to extend it the President belongs to the party which is desirous of limiting that power to the bare and precise letter of the Constitution, and which never puts a construction upon that act favorable to the Government of the Union; far from standing forth as the champion of centralization, General Jackson is the agent of all the jealousies of the States; and he was placed in the lofty situation he occupies by the passions of the people which are most opposed to the central Government."

He states the means adopted by this illustrious man for destroying his own power. They are:

- "1. Putting down internal improvements.
- "2. Abandoning the Indians to the legislative tyranny of the States.
- "3. Destroying the Bank of the United States.
- "4. Yielding up the tariff as a sacrifice to appease South Carolina."

In this list he mentions the abandonment by Congress of the proceeds of the sales of the public land to the new States to satisfy their impotency. These States will be astonished to learn that Mr. CLAY's land bill, to which they were so violently opposed, gave them the greatest part of the revenue derived from this source; and my friend from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] will doubtless be much disappointed to hear that President Jackson had completely adopted the principles of this bill. De Tocqueville has communicated this information to us, and he is high authority. Hear him:

"Congress has gone on to sell, for the profit of the nation at large, the uncultivated lands which those new States contained. But the latter at length asserted that, as they were now fully constituted, they ought to enjoy the exclusive right of converting the produce of these sales to their own use. As their remonstrances became more and more threatening, Congress thought fit to deprive the Union of a portion of the privileges which it had hitherto enjoyed; and, at the end of 1833, it passed a law by which the greatest part of the revenue derived from the sale of lands was made over to the new western republics, although the lands themselves were not ceded to them."

And, in a note to this passage, the author says:

"It is true that the President refused his assent to this law; but he completely adopted it in principle. See message of 8th December, 1833."

Here, sir, is a fair sample of the information which passes current in Europe in regard to us and our institutions, and this proceeds from the modern Montesquieu! Had he been a genuine Montesquieu, I think he would have said, General Jackson has strengthened the Federal Government by arresting it in its career of usurpation, and bringing it back to its ancient constitutional course. Thus all danger of collision, or even of jealousy, between it and the States has been avoided; and, within its appropriate sphere, every clog has been removed from its vigorous action. It has thus become more powerful. Love of the Union is a sentiment deeply seated in the heart of every American. It grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength; and never was it stronger than at the present moment. One great cause of this is, that General Jackson has denied himself every power not clearly granted by the Constitution; whilst he has, with a firmness and energy peculiar to himself, exerted all those which have been clearly conferred upon the General Government. But enough of this.

Now, sir, I cannot agree with the Senator from Virginia, according to the explanation which he has given, that there is greater danger of usurpation by an elective President than by a limited hereditary monarch. His was an argument to prove that, in this respect, a limited monarchy has the advantage over our republican form of Government. If this be true, then our Government, in one particular at least, is worse than that of England. Now, sir, upon what argument does the gentleman predicate this conclusion? Does he not perceive that it is upon an entire want of confidence in the people of the United States? He fears their feelings may become so enlisted in favor of some popular Chief Magistrate who has been elected by their suffrages, their passions may become so excited, that he may ride upon their backs into despotic power. Now, I do not believe any such thing. I feel the utmost confidence in the people. As long as they remain intelligent and virtuous, they will be both able and willing to defend their own cause, and protect their own liberties from the assaults of a usurper, whether they be open or disguised. Their passions will never drive them to commit suicide upon themselves. It is true the people may go wrong on some questions. In my opinion, they have recently gone wrong in some of the States; but I rely upon their sober second thought to correct the evil. On a question, however, between liberty and slavery, until they are fit to be slaves, there can be no danger.

The Senator has expressed the opinion, with great confidence, that ours is a far stronger executive Government than that of England; and has sustained this opinion by an enumeration of office-holders, and an argument to which I shall not specially refer. Let any man institute a comparison between the two, and he will find that this is but the creation of a brilliant imagination. I got a friend in the Library, last evening, to collect some statistical information for me on this subject. Even now, in the time of peace, the British army exceeds one hundred and one thousand men, including officers; and their vessels of war in commission are one hundred and ninety-one. How will our Army of twelve thousand men, and our Navy, consisting of twenty-six vessels in commission, compare with this array of force, and this source of patronage? The officers of the British army and navy, appointed by the Crown, hold seats in Parliament, and engage actively in the business of electioneering. No law prohibits them from exerting their influence at elections; and the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, in this respect, bears a close resemblance to the act of Parliament. No jealousy is manifested in either towards the higher officers. It is only those of the humble class who are deprived of their rights.

On the 5th of January, 1836, the public debt of Great Britain and Ireland amounted to £760,294,554 7s. 2d. sterling, say, in round numbers, $3,600,000,000. The interest of every man who owns any portion of this vast national debt is involved in and identified with the power of the British Government. It is by the exertion of this power alone that the annual interest upon this money can be collected from the people. In order to pay this interest and sustain the Government, there was collected from the British people, in the form of customs and internal taxes, during the year ending on the 5th January, 1836, the sum of £52,589,992 4s. 6½d. sterling; say, in round numbers, $252,000,000. What a vast field for patronage is here presented! How does our revenue, of some twenty or twenty-five million dollars, compare with this aggregate? Then there is the patronage attached to the East and West Indies, to the Canadas, and to the British possessions scattered all over the earth. The Government of England is a consolidated Government. It is not like ours, composed of sovereign States; all whose domestic officers are appointed by State authority. The King is the exclusive fountain of office and of honors and of nobility throughout his vast dominions. What is the fact in regard to the General Government? With the exception of post officers, its patronage is almost exclusively confined to the appointment of custom-house officers along our maritime frontier, and land officers near our western limits. Throughout the vast intermediate space, a man may grow old without ever seeing a Federal civil officer, unless it be a postmaster. I adduce these facts for the purpose, not of proving that we ought not to exercise a wholesome jealousy towards the Federal Government, but for that of showing how unjust it is to compare the power and patronage of the President of the United States with that of the King of England. You might as well compare the twinkling of the most distant star in the firmament of heaven with the blaze of the meridian sun. May this ever continue to be the case!

I will tell the Senator from Kentucky how far I am willing to proceed with him in punishing public officers. If a postmaster will abuse his franking privilege, as I know to my sorrow has been done in some instances, by converting it into the means of flooding the surrounding country with base libels in the form of electioneering pamphlets and handbills, let such an officer be instantly dismissed and punished. If any district attorney should either favor or oppress debtors to Government for the purpose of promoting the interest of his party, he ought to share a similar fate. So if a collector will grant privileges in the execution of his office to one importer, which he denies to another, in order to subvert the views of his party, he ought to be dismissed from office and punished for his offense. I would not tolerate any such official misconduct. But whilst a man faithfully and impartially discharges all the duties of his office, let him not be punished for expressing his opinion in regard to the merits or demerits of any candidate. Above all, let us not violate the Constitution in order to punish an officer.

The Senator from Virginia has of late appealed to us often to rise above mere party, and to go for our country. Such appeals are not calculated to produce any deep impression on my mind; because, in supporting my party, I honestly believe I am, in the best manner, promoting the interest of my country. I am, but I trust not servilely, a party man. I support the present President, not because I think him the wisest or best man alive, but because he is the faithful and able representative of my principles. As long as he shall continue to maintain these principles, he shall receive my cordial support; but not one moment longer. I do not oppose my friends on this side of the House because I entertain unkind feelings towards them personally; on the contrary, I esteem and respect many of them highly. It is against the political principles of which they are the exponents that I make war.

I support the President because he is in favor of a strict and limited construction of the Constitution, according to the true spirit of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. I firmly believe that if this Government is to remain powerful and permanent, it can only be by never assuming doubtful powers, which must necessarily bring it into collision with the States. It is not difficult to foresee what would be the termination of such a career of usurpation on the rights of the States.

I oppose the whig party because, according to their reading of the Constitution, Congress possess, and they think ought to exercise, powers which would endanger the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. Such a free construction of the Constitution as can derive from the simple power "to lay and collect taxes," that of creating a national bank, appears to me to be fraught with imminent danger to the country. I am opposed to the party so liberal in their construction of the Constitution as to infer the existence of a power in the Federal Government to create and circulate a paper currency for the whole Union, from the clause which merely authorizes Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Such constructions would establish precedents which might call into existence other alien and sedition laws; and it is such a construction which has given birth to the bill now before the Senate, denying the freedom of speech and of the press to a respectable portion of our citizens.

Should the time ever arrive when these principles shall be carried into practice, and when the Federal Government shall control the whole paper system of the country, either by the agency of a national bank or an immediate issue of its own paper, our liberties will then be in the greatest danger. In addition to the constitutional patronage of the President, confer upon him the influence which would result from the establishment of a national bank, and you may make him too powerful for the people. Such a bank, spreading its branches into every State, controlling all the State institutions, and able to destroy any of them at pleasure, would be a fearful engine of Executive power. It would indissolubly connect the money power with the power of the Federal Government; and such a union might, I fear, prove irresistible. The people of the States might still continue to exercise the right of suffrage; all the forms of the Constitution might be preserved, and they might delude themselves with the idea that they were yet free, whilst the moneyed influence had insinuated itself into the very vitals of the State, and was covertly controlling every election.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Buchanan.

SENATE.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 26, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States, together with documents, on the subject of the recent and existing difficulties between the people and authorities of Maine and New Brunswick. The message and documents were read throughout, and concurred most precisely with the accounts of these matters heretofore published. It further appeared that the British Minister, Mr. Fox, had, in a communication to the United States Executive, declared, in concurrence with the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, that it was well known that the whole of the disputed territory had been placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of British authority, and that it was bound so to remain by an express agreement between the two Powers; and on this ground Mr. Fox demanded that Maine should be ordered to withdraw her troops from the territory. The President altogether and expressly denied the existence of any such agreement, either express or implied, and called on Mr. Fox to point out the passages or stipulations on which this assumption was founded, whereupon Mr. Fox declared the two Governments at direct variance on this point, entered his "protest in the most formal manner" against the ground thus taken by the President, that no such agreement existed, and declared his intention, forthwith, to communicate with his Government on this point, and wait for further instructions. The message maintained that the correspondence between the two conflicting parties expressly disproved the existence of any such agreement, and showed that each was to exercise the rights and jurisdiction which they already possessed, without any attempt at their advance, so as to avoid collision. It also maintained that Maine had a right to arrest the depredators on the territory, and intimated an intention of the President to endeavor again to settle the difficulty by referring it to the arbitration of a third Power. But if the authorities of New Brunswick should persist in maintaining by force the assumption of exclusive jurisdiction over the territory, the President would then consider that contingency as having arisen in which it would be proper for a State to call for aid from the General Government. It further appeared that the President had recommended to the Executive of Maine to disband her troops as the first step to be taken toward a return to a peaceful negotiation of the controversy.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, in rising to move the reference of this message and these documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he deemed it his duty to submit a few observations to the Senate. In this whole matter his ardent desire was, that the Government of the United States might pursue such a course, if this could be done with honor, as to preserve peace between the two countries; and, if that object could not be accomplished, that our course might be so firm, consistent, and dignified, as to secure the universal approbation of our constituents. He desired that our cause might not only be just in itself, but that it might be conducted in such a manner as to leave no doubt of its justice among the people of all political parties of the country; because he believed they were all actuated by the same desire to preserve untarnished the honor of the nation. If war must come, we should endeavor to inspire a unanimity of sentiment among the American people; and then, in a righteous cause, we should be irresistible.

In regard to our title to the disputed territory, he had but little to say. It was sufficient for him to declare most solemnly that, of all the important questions he had ever been called upon to examine, this was the most free from doubt. In this opinion he was happy to have been sustained, at the last session of Congress, by the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the unanimous vote both of the Senate and House of Representatives. After the adoption of the resolutions, in the beginning of July last, to which he referred, he had fondly hoped that the British Government would long ere this have entered seriously into a negotiation for the settlement of this question; but he was sorry to say that the same procrastination and delay which had hitherto characterized their conduct still continued to exist. He was happy, however, now to learn, from the note to Mr. Forsyth from Mr. Fox, which had just been read, that he anticipates an early settlement of the general question. He hoped that in this particular Mr. Fox might not be mistaken, and that his belief rested upon sufficient reasons within his own knowledge.

In the brief remarks which I have to make, I wish to present a few points, to which I ask the serious attention of the Senate. The whole of the present difficulty on the frontiers of Maine seems to have arisen from an entire misapprehension, on the part of the British Government, in regard to the question of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. Sir John Harvey seems to have proceeded entirely upon this ground. I was no little surprised when I read his letter to the Governor of Maine, which asserts that, by an agreement between the two Governments, the territory in dispute was to remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of England until the controversy should be determined; because I had supposed that if any fact had been established beyond dispute by the correspondence between the parties, from the day when the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] as Secretary of State, addressed his first note to the Minister of the British Government on this subject until the present moment, it was, that their claim to exclusive jurisdiction had always been resisted by the United States. From the very nature of things, no such agreement, either express or implied, could ever have been sanctioned by this Government without national degradation. What is the true statement of the case? Two neighboring and friendly nations have a dispute respecting the title to an intermediate district of territory between their acknowledged limits; and by far the greater part of this territory is a wilderness. Now, what is the course, and the only course, which the very nature of such a question would point out? It is this: that, whilst the dispute continued, each party should retain possession of that portion of the territory which had been previously in its actual possession, and the remainder should not be placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of either.

Now, sir, unless I am greatly mistaken in my reading of the documents, such an understanding has uniformly existed between this Government and England, and has hitherto guided the conduct of both parties. Nay, more, sir; there is an express agreement upon this subject, if I understand the English language. After the Senate had rejected the award of the King of Holland, it became necessary to open a negotiation with England for the purpose of settling this disputed question. At the conclusion of Mr. Livingston's note to Mr. Bankhead, of the 21st July, 1832, written with this view, he says:

"Until this matter shall be brought to a final conclusion, the necessity of refraining on both sides from any exercise of jurisdiction beyond the boundaries now actually possessed must be apparent, and will, no doubt, be acquiesced in on the part of his Britannic Majesty's provinces, as it will be by the United States."

Did the British Government reject this friendly proposal? Did they then, as Mr. Fox does now, assert any claim to exclusive jurisdiction? No, sir, no. Sir Charles Vaughan, in his answer to Mr. Livingston, dated on the 14th of April, 1833, assures him—

"That his Majesty's Government entirely concur with that of the United States in the principle of continuing to abstain, during the progress of negotiation, from extending the exercise of jurisdiction within the disputed territory beyond the limits within which it has hitherto been usually exercised by the authorities of either party."

Now can language be more explicit than this? A distinct proposition arising out of the very nature of the question, was thus made by Mr. Livingston, and it was distinctly accepted by Sir Charles Vaughan. Is not this, then, an express agreement between the parties? I had, therefore, good cause for astonishment when I saw the claim set up by the British Government to the exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. I cannot help believing that when Sir John Harvey and the British authorities come to review this subject, they will arrive at a different conclusion.

In that event, our present alarming difficulties will be speedily adjusted.

Now, sir, this being the state of the question, what rights remained to each party? It is true that, pending the controversy, no exclusive jurisdiction can be exercised by either. But suppose a band of lawless trespassers intrude themselves into this disputed territory, and proceed to destroy its value by the plunder of its timber, the chief article which renders it valuable, are both parties obliged to stand by and look tamely on, whilst these depredations are committed, without making any effort to prevent them? Had not either party the right to drive away the trespassers, without giving any reasonable cause of offense to the other? To make the case familiar, let me suppose that my friend from Missouri [Mr. LOWN] and myself own adjoining plantations, and that a controversy has arisen between us respecting the title to some timber land along our boundaries. In order to live at peace, we agree that, until the question of title shall be settled, we will each refrain from taking possession of the property in dispute. Now, sir, would this agreement prevent either of us from driving away lawless trespassers from the timber land to which we both claimed title? The two questions are parallel. It appears to me that both these Governments have a concurrent right, not against each other, but against lawless intruders. I admit that in such a case each ought to act with the most perfect good faith towards the other, and retire within their acknowledged limits the moment the object is accomplished. To drive away trespassers should never be made a pretext for holding permanent possession of the territory in dispute.

Now, sir, what has Maine done? She has merely sent her land agent, with a sufficient force, into the disputed territory, under the authority of her Legislature, to expel the trespassers, who were engaged in cutting down and removing the timber. The resolution of the Legislature hath this extent—no more. In my opinion, it was perfectly correct. It does anything but authorize an array of military force for the purpose of assuming exclusive jurisdiction over the territory. It is merely the employment of the land agent and the sheriff, with a sufficient force, to expel the intruders. It is true this force was armed, because the trespassers were armed, and had declared their purpose of resistance. The amount of the appropriation made to carry this resolution into effect was only $10,000. Surely Sir John Harvey was mistaken in supposing that this force, led by the land agent and the sheriff, went to the disputed territory for the purpose of taking and holding permanent possession of it in defiance of the British Government, and in violation of the subsisting agreement between the two countries.

But, sir, as a man of candor, I will say that, in one respect, I could desire that the Governor of Maine had acted in a different manner from what he has done. His message to the Legislature, and their resolution upon it, meet my entire approbation. The only cause of regret which I have is, that he did not send a copy of the message and resolution to the Governor of New Brunswick. This might have been communicated to him confidentially; and thus the trespassers could not have received notice of the intentions of Maine in time to make their escape. Had he acted in this manner, it would have placed him entirely in the right; and no pretext could have been afforded to Sir John Harvey for mistaking the character and object of the expedition. It is true that, in point of fact, it would perhaps have made no difference, as he has expressly declared that he was instructed by his Government to maintain exclusive jurisdiction over the territory, and that it was his fixed determination to obey this instruction. Still, if this communication had been made to him, it is possible no difficulty might have arisen.

There is a third and most important point to which I would call the attention of the Senate. The Governor of New Brunswick has expressed his determination to maintain exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory by military force; and the President of the United States, in his message, has expressed an equal determination to resist any such attempt. He has declared that if Sir John Harvey should invade this disputed territory, he will consider it a case which, under the Constitution and laws, will make it his imperative duty to call out the militia for the purpose of repelling this invasion. Should both parties adhere to their determination, a collision becomes inevitable. The question, then, for the Senate to determine, is, shall the military seizure and occupation of this territory by the British Government, under the pretext that they have a right of exclusive jurisdiction over it, be resisted by force? Can we tamely submit to such a violation of our rights? Is there any other honorable alternative left? Is there a Senator within the sound of my voice who will doubt for a single moment on this question? I sincerely believe there is not.

I do not yet believe that Sir John Harvey will persist in a determination which would be an equal violation of our sovereign rights, and of the express agreement of his own Government. But ought any expectation that he will recede, to induce Congress to adjourn without furnishing the President with the means of repelling such an invasion? I think not. Congress cannot be convened before September, because until then several of the States would be without Representatives. In the mean time, actual war with a powerful nation may be forced upon the country, without the President having the means of resistance. A liberal contingent appropriation ought, therefore, to be made before we adjourn.

I have thus presented the three points to the Senate which I deem worthy of their deep and solemn consideration. Have the British Government any right to the exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory? If they have not, has Maine violated any right of that Government by expelling these lawless intruders? Shall we resist by force any attempt to take military possession of the disputed territory whilst the negotiation is pending?

Mr. B. then moved the reference of the message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WEBSTER said this was so novel, so unexpected, and so important a matter, that it unquestionably demanded the gravest consideration of the Senate. Mr. W. was among those who never entertained a doubt that the right to this disputed territory was in the United States. It had appeared to him from the first that this was perfectly clear; so clear, that the controversy never seemed to him hardly to reach the dignity of a debatable question. But as the matter was now in dispute, and as a negotiation was in progress, with a view to settle it, it, of course, became this Government not to resort to any final measures for establishing its own rights by its own power until the means of negotiation should be exhausted, or the negotiation closed. Mr. W. concurred in most or all that had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He knew of nothing in the whole history of this controversy from which it could be made out that there was an explicit agreement, or any agreement at all, with the British Government, according to which the jurisdiction over the disputed territory, pending the question, was to remain exclusively with Great Britain; and it was to be regretted that the representative of her Majesty, who insists upon the existence of such an agreement, had pointed to no passage in the negotiation between the two countries, nor to any other paper or document, where such agreement is to be found, or how it is to be made out, or could be established by implication. Instead of this, he had contented himself with a formal protest, and with a reference of the whole matter to his Government at home, and has thus left it. The American Secretary, on the other hand, had given his decided negative to the fact of any such agreement; he denies that there was any such agreement, either explicit or implicit; he thinks there is a great mistake on the other side, and the scope of his observations in his letter, as is evident, was to call on the other side to show the stipulation by which exclusive jurisdiction was thus to remain with Great Britain. But the British Minister had not, in his reply, shown any evidence whatever of any agreement; but, on the contrary, had made the denial of the American Secretary the subject of a formal protest, and had ended with a declaration that he would wait for further instructions from his Government at home. It is certainly not unreasonable to say, that as the British Minister expresses his surprise at the fact that the American Secretary does not admit or recognize an explicit agreement, he should be able to show where such agreement may be found.

Mr. W. also entirely agreed that it would have been becoming that the two Governments should have had a conference and consultation upon the subject before any one step should have been taken in any way which should look hostile, by causing the appearance of armed men on the frontier, whether as a civil posse or military force. A communication might have been made, notice in some way might have been given, so that apprehension might have been allayed, and one party might have seen the object of the other, and have understood that the proceeding was for the interest of both.

Under present circumstances, in the predicament in which the Government was placed by these occurrences, if it should be the pleasure of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to present resolutions expressive of the opinions of the Senate on the subject, Mr. W. would certainly give them his very serious consideration, with an earnest desire that the rights of Maine be maintained, and with a deep anxiety that hostilities should be avoided. Or if, instead of taking that course, the honorable gentleman chose to wait for the present, there might be, and Mr. W. hoped there would be, early advices from the scene of operations of a more favorable aspect; and, in the mean time, a contingent appropriation might be made, by placing in the hands of the President the means of defending the country in case of necessity. For this, most certainly, Mr. W. would vote, and he hoped that this whole subject would now go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee could obtain, whenever it shall see fit, an expression of the views of the Senate upon the whole subject.

Mr. W. proceeded to say that it was now nearly a twelvemonth since he had expressed the opinion in concurrence with others, and indeed with every gentleman who had expressed an opinion on this subject, and also in concurrence with resolutions unanimously passed by the Senate, that it was time, high time, even then, and more emphatically is it high time now, that this question should be settled. He did not now rise to impute blame; but the remark of the member from Pennsylvania was perfectly just, that seeing it was the unanimous opinion of Congress, twelve months ago, and of perhaps every intelligent man in the United States, not only that the right to this territory was with the United States, but that it was a most clear and plain case, and seeing the posture which that negotiation had assumed towards the close of the last session, it is proper for me to express the opinion that there was a ground of reasonable expectation on the part of the United States and of Maine, that there should have been some substantial, direct, and practicable proposition from Great Britain before this time for the settlement of the question. The controversy must be terminated, and ought to be terminated, without further delay.

Mr. DAVIS said he concurred with his colleague that it was quite time this matter was settled. It was time because the great right of the parties was perfectly clear. And there was yet another reason why it was high time that this question should be settled—one which would account for all the existing agitation and disturbance; and that was, because there could be no such formal agreement actually entered into as to exclusive jurisdiction as had been alleged by Sir John Harvey, and under no such agreement, even if it existed, could things remain without collision. It was wholly impossible; and what had been stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania would prove that it was wholly impossible that there should be such an agreement without conflict and difficulty. One statement of the case was this: that the two parties were in dispute about the boundary, and they had agreed substantially that neither should extend their jurisdiction, or take any step by which it should be enlarged or extended. That was about the amount of this statement; and put it in that form, or in the other which had been described by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that each party was to have exclusive jurisdiction over that portion of the territory over which it had before been exercised, and what was that portion? Where had the United States and where had Great Britain before held jurisdiction? and where were their and our boundaries? Out of this very question had arisen a conflict of opinion, which had gone on till Sir John Harvey now insisted that Great Britain held jurisdiction over the whole of the disputed territory. And what was the whole of the disputed territory? Great Britain even for herself had not settled this question. She had gone from one point to another, but had never marked or claimed to any known boundary. She had once marked a line on the map, but this was found too absurd for the King of the Netherlands, and he rejected it. He also decided that the treaty was so vague in its description that the true line could not be ascertained. Since then, Great Britain has also abandoned her line on the map, and adopted the doctrine of the King, that, as the true line cannot be identified, one must be agreed on, and assumes it must give her more or less of our territory, but no one knows how much. She has fortified herself behind this opinion, unjust and ill-founded as it is. She goes for the whole disputed territory.

But supposing Sir John Harvey was correct in regard to an agreement as to exclusive jurisdiction: where could he find the limits of the disputed territory? He might include Portland, or go to the line of New Hampshire. Mr. D. made these remarks to show that the two countries could not live in this state of things without the necessity of a conflict, for the jurisdictions will and do run together. We had therefore learned one thing, for we had arrived at the result that we could not go on under such circumstances.

One word more, and Mr. D. would have done. If it was expected by Great Britain that, in consequence of her claim of right, any part of this territory would be ever ceded to her, she would never attain that object. The right of Maine and of the United States was so clear that they never could, consistently with their own honor, yield their right to any of the territory. It could never be done; and therefore Mr. D. hoped that Great Britain would look further into the subject; and, seeing the proofs, which were satisfactory to our minds—so much so that we cannot doubt—and had placed the subject beyond all question, she would then withdraw; and that thus an adjustment would be arrived at of difficulties which had now become of a most serious character.

We shall never (said Mr. D.) reach a point less embarrassing; for obstacles will and must, from conflicting jurisdictions, multiply; irritation and excitement will increase, and we shall soon reach obstacles insurmountable. It is therefore time it was settled; and if this collision shall produce that desirable event, he could hardly regret its occurrence.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said, having before had some official connection with this subject, and feeling a deep interest in the affairs relating to the northeastern boundary, he would make a few observations; and he began by expressing the very great gratification which he had derived from the pacific and moderate tone of the message of the President on this subject. And if, in the spirit of this message, measures should be adopted by the Executive hereafter, Mr. C. hoped that war between the two countries would be averted.

On the question of the title of the State of Maine to the disputed territory, Mr. C. had heretofore expressed himself in the most explicit terms, and that right he could never doubt for one moment. Maine could not even have a clearer and more absolute right to the disputed territory than she had already; and, for one, Mr. C. was ready to resort to the military force of the country, whenever pacific means should be entirely exhausted—when diplomacy should prove wholly inadequate to secure to Maine and the United States what rightfully belonged to them. Mr. C. would be just as ready to resort to the ultimate means of obtaining redress as he would be if a portion of Kentucky had been taken possession of by a foreign Power.

But, while Mr. C. said this, he must add that the Government of the whole country must decide when and in what manner it would maintain the rights of the members of the Confederacy; and, for one, Mr. C. could not consent, on such a solemn occasion as that of a war with a foreign Power, or on any other occasion, that the will of one of the twenty-six members of the Confederacy should control the entire Union, or that one should draw the entire Union, without their consent, into a war with a foreign Power. As it was the exclusive right and duty of this Government to protect, by war, the rights of the whole, the Government of the whole must judge as to the proper time and manner of enforcing that right.

In regard to the course of Maine, there were some circumstances which Mr. C. saw occasion to regret. He concurred with the Senator from Pennsylvania that some prior notification ought to have been given as to the purpose of Maine in sending an armed force to the Arnostook. It ought to have been given to the Executive of the United States, or to that of New Brunswick, one or both; and if it had been given, the present difficulties might possibly have been avoided. Mr. C. was opposed, notwithstanding, to the claim of exclusive jurisdiction over the territory on the part of Sir John Harvey, and he wished also that Sir John Harvey had fallen under no misconception of the real object which Maine had in view. Notwithstanding that the resolution of Maine to expel intruders and trespassers was adopted in secret session, that it had not been communicated, as it safely might have been, to the Government of New Brunswick or the United States, was much to be regretted.

But with respect to the claim of exclusive jurisdiction by Great Britain over this territory, which had been asserted by the British authorities both at New Brunswick and Washington, so far from there being any such agreement, the truth was, that the British were wholly excluded from such jurisdiction, for neither party had a right to jurisdiction over the unoccupied portion of the territory, as might be seen by the documents now and heretofore communicated to the Senate; and over all portions of the territory that were occupied, jurisdiction was to remain and be maintained as it was, both as regarded the holding of jurisdiction and the possession of property, and neither party was to make any advances to strengthen or increase their jurisdiction or possession; and if all this was so, then so far from Great Britain having any right of jurisdiction, she was excluded, as well as the United States, from all possession and jurisdiction over the unoccupied portion of the territory.

And did not the Senate recollect the correspondence on the subject of a large force being recently marched by the British through this territory? And what did Great Britain say when this was done? She alleged as an excuse that it was only for the purpose, not of occupying the territory, but of reaching a higher and exterior destination, and felt it necessary to notify the Government of the United States of the movement. On that occasion, Mr. C. had insisted that this notice and apology by Great Britain was not sufficient, and that she ought first to have asked and obtained the direct and express consent of the United States before marching her troops over the disputed territory. Now, if she had the exclusive right of jurisdiction, as had been maintained by Mr. Harvey and Mr. Fox, where was the necessity, in that case, of her giving any notification at all of her marching her troops over the disputed territory? This fact of a notification proved absolutely that Great Britain had not then set up any such claim; and it was very remarkable how this claim had arisen, and how soon and how much it had been strengthened. Mr. Fox had now represented it to stand on an explicit agreement, and, when called upon to point it out, he could only refer to his own Government. This claim was very extraordinary, and would be found wholly untenable.

In regard to the proceedings of Maine, a great deal was due to the feelings of a State whose rights had been so long held in question. This negotiation had been protracted much longer than was desirable, and he thought there had been recent delays which required from Great Britain some satisfactory explanation. Her late troubles in her American provinces might be some excuse, and it was evidently the true policy of the United States to press her at such a moment. Mr. C. did not know how far our Executive had acted on that policy, and had urged her to a settlement of this question; but it had so happened that nearly a year had passed while these difficulties in Canada continued, and no proposition whatever, as far as Congress was concerned, had come from Great Britain on this subject. He trusted that, drawing wisdom from what had now occurred in consequence of delay, and from the great and imminent hazard of a war, the two Governments would hasten the question to a final settlement.

In regard to the documents which had now been read, Mr. C. thought the Government here ought to enter into some arrangement by means of which existing difficulties might be quieted, and depredations on this territory might be suppressed; and he did not know by what authority the Governor of Maine could undertake to enter into any species of compact or agreement with a foreign Power or Province. He, therefore, thought it better that the President or his authorized agent should make an arrangement by which trespassers should be removed, and this property protected till the question should be settled.

Mr. C. concurred with the Senator from Pennsylvania that his subject should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and if an appropriation ought to be made, it could be done, although it had not been asked for by the President. Mr. C. was ready, at whatever price, to secure the peace of the country, and maintain the rights of Maine to her jurisdiction and territory.

Mr. WALKER observed that the matter was one of such momentous consequence to the country, that it became the Senate to proceed with caution and circumspection, surveying the whole ground before they took any final proceedings in relation to it. It struck him that there was one important matter in this controversy that had not been noticed by any gentleman who had taken part in this debate. While the negotiations were pending with a hope of bringing the controversy to a happy conclusion, Great Britain had given secret instructions to the Governor of the Province of New Brunswick to enforce the right of that country to exclusive jurisdiction over the whole of this disputed territory. Now, instead of this being an advance to an adjustment of the difficulties between the two countries, it was rendering that event more uncertain. Instructions had been given, for the first time, by the Government of Great Britain, to the Governor of New Brunswick, which never had been communicated to the Government of the United States, to enforce exclusive jurisdiction to this country. Now, as this matter was to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he would say one word in reference to this part of the subject. In one point (said Mr. W.) we all concur, that the territory in dispute is within the limits of the State of Maine. In another point we also concur, and that is that Great Britain has no right to the exclusive jurisdiction, and that she is attempting to enforce, by secret orders, a right which she has not hitherto advised us that she claimed.

Now, what is the state of affairs? We are told by the Governor of New Brunswick that he is instructed, and that he is prepared to enforce that exclusive jurisdiction with all the power of the British Government at his disposal. We are told, also, that the State of Maine is determined to resist any such attempt should it be made; and for that purpose the Governor has called out a portion of the military force of the State. Now, without there should be some yielding on the part of the Governor of New Brunswick, or the authorities of Maine, a collision must take place between these two adverse parties. Then, a portion of the territory of the sovereign State of Maine is invaded with all the power of the British Government; and what are we to do? As an act of justice to the State of Maine and to the whole country, can we adjourn without taking measures to prevent the citizens of Maine from being slaughtered by the British troops without the adequate means of resistance? I hope this collision may never take place—I pray to God that it may not; but I am prepared to vote an appropriation to meet the contingency apprehended, and assist the people of Maine in repelling the threatened invasion.

Mr. NORVELL said he rose to a single point. If he stood here alone, he should take his stand to express his unqualified approbation of the whole course of the Governor and Legislature of Maine on this subject. They could have taken no other course with honor to the State. It was time that this boundary difficulty had been definitively adjusted. This Government had been too long sleeping on it; and if the Governor and Legislature of Maine had not made a movement, demanded by the necessity of protecting their property as well as their jurisdiction, we should still have been asleep on the subject. He rejoiced that they had shown a becoming sensibility, firmness, and courage, with regard to their rights; and he hoped the Committee on Foreign Relations would indicate some means, or recommend some decisive measure, to bring this great question to an immediate issue.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, said that Senators were unable to perceive how it was that Sir John Harvey or the British Minister, Mr. Fox, could assert a claim to exclusive jurisdiction in the disputed territory, resulting from any agreement or understanding between this Government and Great Britain; and while Mr. W. denied that any such agreement was ever made, yet he could easily conceive that such agreement might be as well proved as the claim of the British Government was proved to any portion of the territory in dispute, and in the same way; it was not that there is any foundation for either claim, but by diplomatic correspondence, by which alone Great Britain had succeeded in bringing into dispute the treaty line, about which there was no uncertainty, and which this Government never should have suffered to be a subject of dispute or negotiation. The independence of the United States might as well have been brought into question, after the treaty of peace, as the established limits of one of the States, according to its ancient and known boundaries; but it had been suffered to be made a question, and, for the last twenty-five years, a subject of negotiation and diplomatic correspondence, in which alone is to be found any pretense for the British claim to any portion of the disputed territory; and, in the course of that negotiation and correspondence, there have been claims and pretenses enough advanced on the part of Great Britain, and generally denied by this Government, to furnish as good a claim on their part to exclusive jurisdiction as there is to the territory itself. And it is not to be denied that this Government, for the sake of preserving peace, and in the hope of settling the boundary, has yielded to many assumptions by British diplomatists which we may find cause to regret. The agreements and understandings as to the possession and jurisdiction are not very explicit, and have been repeated in so many forms that it is difficult for any one to comprehend precisely what was intended; and, although he would by no means admit that they sustained the claim now set up by the British authorities to exclusive jurisdiction, yet he could easily imagine that the British Government would insist that they do so; and it will be a long time before they will agree that they do not sustain that claim. We have already declared the British pretensions to the territory in dispute to be unfounded; we now deny that there has been any agreement by which the British authorities can claim exclusive jurisdiction; but let another period of twenty years' negotiation pass on, and who can say what will be the result upon either point?

The Senator from Kentucky thinks that Maine should have given notice to the General Government of her intention to proceed against the trespassers, before carrying into effect her resolves in the manner she did; and the Senator from Pennsylvania regrets that her Governor did not send to Sir John Harvey a copy of her resolutions, and notice of her intentions to execute them? Why so? Is not Maine a sovereign State, and has she not the right to make and execute her laws for the preservation of her property within her own limits, without first giving notice to this Government, or to the Government of a neighboring province? Has not Maine the right to determine for herself when and in what manner she will exercise her authority within her own territory? Is she to submit to this Government, or to a foreign Government, her views of the expediency or necessity of employing a force to sustain her civil officers in the execution of their duty, before she may be permitted to do it? Suppose she had done as the Senators seem to think she ought to have done, and, in the one case, this Government had advised or directed her to stay her hand: do you think, Mr. President, that she would have been bound to obey such advice or direction, and suffer foreign plunderers to have carried off her property? Or, in the other case, that Sir John Harvey should have advised or commanded her to treat her laws as a dead letter, because he had a warden to look after trespassers, to seize the timber, and to put the proceeds into the "disputed territory fund;" think you that Maine would have yielded to such advice or command? Would you, or any honorable Senator here, desire her thus to disgrace herself? Did Sir John Harvey ever think it due to Maine to give notice to her that he would appoint a warden of this territory? or that that warden would seize timber or arrest trespassers on the disputed territory? Never; then why ask Maine to do so?

The Governor of Maine, as was his duty, has undertaken to execute the laws of the State within the limits of the State, and was under no obligation to communicate his intention of doing so to any man or to any Government, and is amenable only to his constituents. In the execution of this duty the Governor is met by the demand of a foreign Government to stay his hand, on the assumption that the exclusive jurisdiction in the disputed territory belongs to that Government, and is notified that, unless he withdraw his land agent and force from that territory, an armed force will be employed to expel them. Why this claim to exclusive jurisdiction? Where is the agreement of which Sir John Harvey and the British Minister speak? The existence of such agreement is denied to Sir John, and he is asked to point it out. He has not yet answered. It is denied to her Majesty's Minister, (Mr. Fox,) and he is called upon for the evidence to sustain his assertion. After the lapse of two days, he sends us his protest against our denial, and informs us that he will send home and obtain the directions of her Majesty's Government. If her Majesty's Ministers cannot find it, what then? Will Sir John be called home, and his acts disavowed? Will her Minister be recalled, and the claim to exclusive jurisdiction be abandoned? No, sir, no. We have now the authority of this Government for saying that no such exclusive jurisdiction in the disputed territory exists in Great Britain as Sir John and Mr. Fox pretend, and the acts of the Governor of Maine are sustained. We have the assurance of the Governor and of the Legislature of Maine that her laws shall be executed, and that her force will not be withdrawn so long as she has means of resisting an attack upon them. Should Sir John Harvey proceed to execute his threat, the blood of the hardy sons of Maine will be freely shed before Sir John's purpose can be accomplished. It has been said that Maine should not have hazarded the peace of the nation upon the boundary question while that was a subject of negotiation; and one Senator has said that he had no idea of the nation being drawn into a war by the rash proceedings of any State.

Mr. President, how is this question of boundary a subject of negotiation? Has Great Britain, since the rejection of the advice of the King of the Netherlands, ever consented to open a negotiation as to this boundary line, upon the basis of the treaty of 1783? Not at all. Ever since 1832 this Government has been pressing the Government of Great Britain to enter into such a negotiation, and that Government has constantly refused it, insisting that the treaty line was so defectively described that it was impossible to locate it, and has constantly endeavored to obtain a conventional line instead of the treaty line. And what has been the result? In January, 1838, the British Government proposed to this Government to form a convention for the appointment of a commission to make certain explorations, without authority to decide the question, and to report their doings to each Government. That proposition was accepted nearly a year ago, much to my regret, and what has come of it? We learn by the annual message of the President that nothing had been done. In answer to a very recent call of the Senate, we are told that no correspondence has been had upon the subject since the annual message. Hence, their own proposition, made more than a year ago, and accepted more than ten months ago, has fallen to the ground, is not attempted to be carried out, and may well be regarded a dead letter. The truth is, there is no negotiation that can or will settle the line, and there will be none till the necessities of the case shall bring it about; and however much the horrors of war are to be deplored, this boundary question must be settled, and recent events may accomplish that object, peaceably, I hope; but if the territory justly ours cannot be defended and preserved to us but by arms, then, Maine says, and the nation will say, it must and shall be defended.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved the printing of the message and documents, with five thousand extra copies of both; which was accordingly ordered.

The message and documents were then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PARTY POLITICS.

REMARKS OF Mr. RIVES and Mr. ROANE,
OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 15, 1839.

Mr. ROANE having concluded his speech, Mr. RIVES rose and requested Mr. NORVELL to yield him the floor. He would make an earnest appeal to the courtesy of that gentleman, as he considered it due to himself to reply to what he conceived to be a personal attack by his colleague.

Mr. NORVELL replied, certainly he would yield the floor, if it was the intention of the Senator to go on with his remarks at once. He had three times already yielded the floor to gentlemen who made the request of him; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives] could not expect him to yield it for to-morrow.

Mr. RIVES said it was his intention to reply at once. He confessed that he had never, in the whole course of his life, been so much astonished as he had been at the unprovoked and unjustifiable attack of his colleague. Had a thunderbolt fallen at his feet, he could not have been more surprised. His surprise at the extraordinary course which his colleague had thought proper to take, was only equalled by his regret; a regret, excited not by any personal injury inflicted on him, but for the injury inflicted on the reputation which belonged to their common mother, Virginia, for all that was generous and chivalric. Although his colleague and himself had differed on important political questions for the last two years, yet they had always been on the most cordial and friendly terms; and never did he, until this moment, apprehend any other than the most friendly feelings. What was he to think of the manner of the attack made on him and the time chosen for it? His colleague had spoken of the friendly and kind feelings he had entertained for him, and ascribed his silence hitherto to motives of delicacy; and yet he had come forward with a preconcerted attack on him for his course for the last two years; an indictment enumerating all his offenses against the party for the last two years. Why, he would ask, did he reserve and treasure up all his indignation and excitement to this moment? Was this delicacy? Did not his colleague know that now, at this very moment, in the Capitol of Richmond, his political enemies were consummating the sacrifice begun here? Yes, sir, (said Mr. R.), now, at this moment that my colleague has chosen to enumerate all the offenses which I have committed for the last two years, the altar is prepared where I am to be immolated as the victim. His colleague no doubt had intelligence of this fact.

Mr. ROANE here interposed, and said that his information received heretofore, and that which he had received to-day, was of a different character. It left him no reason to doubt of the reelection of his colleague.

Mr. RIVES continued. His colleague had selected the 15th day of February, 1839, the day when his political friends at Richmond were, perhaps, doing public execution to me! Just as I am in what he and his party may call the last agonies of political dissolution, but which I look on as the proudest moments of my life—just as I am about to depart to another stage of existence, he rakes up from every forgotten source a long catalogue of political sins for the last two years, and presents them to rack my conscience and distract my mind! Is this delicacy? Is this what might be expected from a colleague—a man, too, from the Old Dominion? He had heard from several sources that his colleague had sent, under his own frank, to various parts of Virginia, many copies of the virulent and outrageous attack made on him by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] which was so entirely void of argument or reason that he had disdained to reply to it. Was this a proof of his delicacy? He did not complain of this as being beyond the privilege of his colleague; but when Mr. ROANE claimed credit for delicacy in the Senate, it is somewhat remarkable that he was not actuated by the same motive and feeling out of the Senate.

His colleague had spoken of his Democracy, which was now, it seemed, the distinction which the dominant party arrogated to itself. He had never said that he was a Democratic Republican. That title was unknown to our glorious fathers; the simple word Republican was their title, and it was his. This Government of ours is a Republic, not a Democracy. Democrat was the title bestowed on Republicans by the revilers of republicanism, and was never assumed by the Republicans, at least south of Mason and Dixon's line. The distinguished ancestor of the gentleman, in whom the State of Virginia took such just pride, had never called himself a Democrat.

Mr. ROANE. To which of my ancestors does the gentleman allude?

Mr. RIVES. To the late Judge Roane.

Mr. ROANE. You are mistaken, sir. He was a Democrat. He gloried in being a Democrat.

Mr. RIVES continued his remarks, commenting on the efforts that were making in Richmond to defeat his election; again alluded to the speeches of the Senator from Connecticut, which he said his colleague had franked to the members of the Virginia Legislature; and said that he had heard that his colleague had written letters to the members of the Legislature having the same object in view.

Mr. ROANE remarked that his colleague had expressed a great deal of surprise and astonishment at what he was pleased to consider a wanton and unprovoked personal assault on him; but he, himself, had more cause for astonishment, that his colleague should think proper thus to characterize the remarks he had just made, and which, in his opinion, and he would fain believe in the opinion of every member of the Senate, were distinguished by great temper, moderation, and forbearance. After an almost total silence of nearly two years, while his colleague and himself had been in a state of opposition on the most important questions, he had chosen, at this time, the most appropriate of all others, to define his position more clearly; and in doing so it was necessary for his own vindication, it was due to their mutual constituents, and to the occasion itself, that he should touch upon the course of his colleague, and point out distinctly and clearly where they differed, and the causes of their difference. He declared most solemnly that he had been governed by no personal feelings whatever, and that nothing had been said by him that had not been called for by a solemn though painful sense of duty.

From motives of the most perfect delicacy he had hitherto refrained from making the remarks that he did, and the restraint he had imposed on himself had been so strict as to excite in the mind of his friends some surprise, and perhaps caused them to misapprehend his motives. It was on this day, for the first time, that he considered the restraints which delicacy towards his colleague had imposed on him were released. His information left him no reason to doubt the fact that his colleague had been reelected by a Whig

HO. OF REPS.

Legislature of the State of Virginia; and as his colleague had thought proper to define his position in a manner that would, no doubt, be gratifying to that party, he had chosen this day to define his position in as clear a manner, little caring for the effects it would have on his colleague's new friends. Nothing would ever have induced him to open his lips on the subject of the course taken by his colleague, while the election yet remained in doubt; but the day of election having been fixed, and believing, as he firmly did, that it was decided, every restraint was removed.

My colleague complains of the time and manner of the remarks I have thought proper to make. He thinks I ought to have availed myself of the many occasions that have presented themselves, and that I should have defined my position without attacking him. Now, sir, I beg leave to say that I have never complained of the time or times which my colleague had selected for his many developments, and I must claim to be the sole judge of the time when I choose to define finally and fully to our mutual constituents my own position; and, sir, I thought, and therefore choose to define it in contrast to that of my colleague's; it suited me to define it that way in preference to any other.

His colleague had been induced to believe that he had written letters to the members of the Virginia Legislature calculated to oppose his reelection. This, he took the occasion promptly to declare, was untrue. He had written but two letters, and these were strictly confined to answering inquiries that had been made of him, and were not intended in any manner to influence his election. In both of them, the delicacy of my relation to my colleague was adverted to as a reason why nothing I might say, even in reply, should be brought to bear upon his pending election. He had scrupulously refrained from any correspondence with his numerous friends on the subject. But his colleague had objected to him that he had franked to members of the Legislature, in the course of the session, the speeches of a member of this body, which contained an attack on him. It is true that he had franked such speeches, as well as many others, and documents of various kinds, to the members of the Virginia Legislature; but in doing so, he exercised a right exercised by his colleague and every Senator on that floor. He had considered it his duty to send information that he, in his judgment, deemed valuable to his constituents; and when he did this, he did it without distinction of party. When he sent documents to one member of the Legislature, he sent them to all—to Whigs as well as Democrats. His colleague, in the course of his remarks, had taken him to task for speaking of the Democracy of the country, and for calling himself a Democratic Republican; denying that he himself was ever a Democratic Republican, or that the Virginia Republicans of 1798 had ever been known as Democrats. Mr. R. said that his colleague, in the nice distinctions which he had drawn, would hardly suppose that he was ignorant of the meaning of the terms Democrat, Federalist, Oligarch, and Aristocrat. Sir, (said Mr. R.,) I have never known a man in my life who was willing to acknowledge himself an Aristocrat or an Oligarchist.

I well know, sir, the impracticable attempt had never been made to form a perfect Democracy in this great empire. Sir, it could not exist even in this ten miles square; no, sir, we claim not the Democracy of Sparta or Athens; but, sir, I do contend that it was the intention of those who framed and adopted the Constitution, to create a democratic Republic; ay, sir, a popular Government, a Government of the people, as contradistinguished from one not controlled by the people. Sir, I have never yet met with an American citizen, native or naturalized, who did not claim to be a republican. Oh, yes, sir! that is a general phrase. It will embrace all of all parties. But who, sir, does not know that when the two opposite parties first drew to a head under Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hamilton, one was styled the Democratic Republican party, in opposition to the Federal Republicans, who favored a latitudinous construction of the Federal Constitution, and whose doctrines have ever evinced a distrust in the capacity of the people for self-government.

Mr. RIVES said the remarks of his colleague confirmed his impression that his colleague had not followed the promptings of his own heart in this business. The reproaches of his party had urged him on. He believed that when Mr. ROANE's mind had recovered its usual sober tone, he would feel how gratuitous had been the assault upon him.

He again alluded to the probability of his soon leaving the Senate. Had the situation of his colleague and himself been reversed, he could not have made the attack on such a day, nor could he have sent off an abusive speech against his colleague, as had been done, without sending off its antidote in reply.

Mr. ROANE. One word, Mr. President. I take occasion to assure my colleague that he is utterly and totally mistaken in supposing that I have been prompted or influenced in the course I have pursued this evening by any person whatever. My colleague is perfectly ignorant of me if he supposes that every member of this Chamber, or all the people on the earth, could have instigated me to an act which he did not approve. Sir, I alone, and of my own motion, have done, at my own proper time, and in my own manner, what I have done. Not a human being in this Chamber knew, or, I believe, suspected, that I intended to address the Senate. Sir, whenever I may repent of the course I have taken, as is intimated by my colleague, I shall have the frankness and magnanimity to apprise him. I again repeat that my quarrel with my colleague is not personal on my part, but entirely political. If that assurance, made by me more than once, is not received, why, sir, I must be constrained to say, that I cannot care for it.

Mr. NILES remarked that he was sorry that his poor speech should have been drawn into the controversy between the two honorable Senators from Virginia. Among the "private griefs" of the Senator over the way, [Mr. Rives,] and the complaints he has preferred against his colleague—that of his having sent, under his frank, Mr. N.'s speech to his constituents—seems to be regarded as one of the greatest magnitude. The Senator characterized that speech as virulent and abusive—so much so, that he had not, and should not, reply to it. That (Mr. N. said) was a matter which concerned the Senator, and not himself. He can reply to the speech or not, as he pleases; that is a question for him to decide for himself. But he was surprised to hear that his speech had given the Senator so much uneasiness, when it is deemed to possess so little merit as not to be deserving of a reply. And he regretted that his friend [Mr. ROANE] should be censured for distributing his speech to his own constituents. He held himself responsible for his own sins, and did not wish them transferred to his friend from Virginia. The Senator on the other side of the Hall [Mr. Rives] seemed to regard his speech as a sort of contraband article, which could not be lawfully distributed.

Whether the speech was virulent and abusive or not, was a question which he should not undertake to decide; he left that question to the judgment of the Senate, and the intelligence of the country. But he wished to remind the Senator that the speech was delivered in reply to two speeches of his, and, if it was virulent, the virulence originated with the gentleman himself. If his (Mr. N.'s) speech was more violent, abusive, or, in any respect, unjust towards the Senator, than his speeches to which it was a reply, he was never more mistaken in his life. The gentleman's speeches were filled with virulence, crimination, and denunciation of the Administration, and made in advance of the facts upon which they were pretended to be founded. They charged the Secretary of the Treasury with deliberate fraud, and represented him as a "cat's paw" to the Secretary of War. The supporters of the Administration on this floor, were, by application at least, charged with being the tools of party, and the vassals of the President. Their motives were impeached, and it was boldly insinuated that they had no higher motives of action than party interests, and the "rallying cry of party." Such was the language the Senator applied to the members of the Administration and its supporters on this floor; and yet the Senator complains that his (Mr. N.'s) speech was virulent and abusive. He was aware that those who are most unreasonable and abusive towards others, were often the most sensitive to abuse themselves. But, with what justice the Senator complains in this case he would cheerfully submit to the Senate and the country.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

REMARKS OF HON. S. W. MORRIS,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1839.

On the expenses of the investigating committee, the House being in the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. MORRIS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe that the question now before the committee is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FLETCHER,] the effect of which will be to direct the marshals to be more precise in returning the age of the people composing this great Confederacy; and the main argument relied on in support thereof is the great importance of the "statistical information" to certain insurance companies, by which they may be enabled to calculate the value of lives, not for the possessors, but as it may affect the value of their stock on 'Change. Now, sir, my votes here, in the absence of my speeches, no not designate me as one of those who are over-anxious to legislate for the special benefit of corporations. I cannot, therefore, sanction the amendment with my vote, because I believe it will unnecessarily enlarge the duties of the marshals, and render their returns inconveniently voluminous. I am, however, in favor of so extending the requisitions for statistical information, that this committee, this House, and the people, the corporators of this nation, should be fully informed of the "statistics" connected with "investigation committees;" of investigations conducted by committees selected by a secret ballot, chosen in a mode by which the action of the Representative is fully and completely hidden from the constituent; of investigators, who are themselves the first and most prominent in denouncing all expenditures not authorized by some positive enactment, or which savor of extravagance. Sir, I commend all this holy indignation, and doubt not its sincerity. Were my powers of expression but half equal to the thoughts that crowd my mind, I could even "call thunder from the region of frost," and instantly annihilate all investigators whose examples do not accord with their precepts.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that we are now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that, therefore, the range of debate is coextensive with our vast Confederacy. Nay more, sir, that we may be allowed to skip across the north or south Atlantic, to speak of matters and things in general; and even to "define a position" that is of itself undefinable.

Such, Mr. Chairman, I understand to be the latitude of debate allowed in this Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I therefore propose to attempt to define my position, as an humble member of the Committee of Accounts, of a standing committee appointed by the rules of this body, and which has unfortunately come into collision with the grand investigating committee on the supremely splendid Swartwout defalcation.

On the merits or demerits of Mr. Swartwout I have naught to say. I go for smaller game, for a simple inquiry into a matter of the per diem allowance demanded by the investigating committee; and in conducting that inquiry, I mean to define my position, the position of the Committee of Accounts; and, if the patience and courtesy of this committee is accorded me, I will also define the position of the investigating committee, so that its whereabouts shall be no longer a matter of doubt to any inquiring friends.

Mr. GRANT called Mr. M. to order, and remarked on the waste of time in allowing him to make a speech for his constituents.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I cannot extend my thanks to the honorable gentleman from New York, for his gratuitous remark that I was wasting the precious time of this committee by making a speech for my constituents. Sir, I have a stronger hold on the confidence and affections of my constituents than to deem it necessary to make a speech here, and on this floor, to gain additional, or retain former, favor. They know, from past experience, that, if need requires it, I can and have effectively advocated their interests, and never yet proved derelict to political principles the profession and practice of which has carried me triumphantly through more than one severe political contest. Away, then, with the suggestion that I am speaking for effect at home. I am strong enough there to need no other advocate than a continuance of my steady opposition to men and principles, as heretofore evinced in my political career, and to support those which both they and I prefer from choice and conviction.

But, Mr. Chairman, I ask to be allowed to continue my remarks. I demand it from the courtesy of this committee; for a member who is but a tyro in debate here; for one who has never yet trespassed on your time. I demand it, sir, to enable me to "define my position." And I ask you, sir, why should I, an humble member of the Committee of Accounts, be denied the privilege of a short time to define my position, when the Goliaths of debate have, repeatedly, occupied nearly the whole of a day's session in defining their position, when it is matter of notoriety to all, that their position was undefinable, and that these six-hour speeches, in either wing of this Capitol, did not contain a sentence on the question before the Chair. Sir, I must be allowed to say, that these professional gentlemen, these gentlemen whose peculiar vocation is to spin out definitions without number, from undefinable positions, do not mete out to me as I have measured to them, when they thus endeavor to interrupt, with a hope, or intention, perhaps, to prevent, by their frequent and loud calls of "Order!" the definition of positions that I mean to make, if allowed to proceed in my remarks. But, sir, should the galled jade so wince as to compel me to resume my seat before the aforesaid definition is fully made, I promise them that, though I am thus rendered incapable of giving ready pay for a sixpence, I can and will draw for a shilling; and, on this subject, Mr. Chairman, in an hour's time, this evening, with the help of my good grey-goose quill, I can and will assuredly draw for at least half a crown.

The CHAIRMAN here peremptorily called Mr. M. to order; but the question being put, he was allowed to proceed.

Mr. MORRIS: Mr. Chairman, I am not well versed in the tactics of this body, and feel greatly at a loss what motion to offer you, which will allow me to take a peep "in order" at investigating statistics. A friend suggests to strike out the enacting clause, which I now move, and following the example of an expert tactician, in so doing, I promise not to detain you more than five minutes, which, by strict Tennessee measurement, means three quarters of an hour.

Sir, I am perfectly sensible that I am, and have been, out of order in the train of my remarks, strictly speaking, but not practically so. I am also aware that I ought not now, at this late period of the session, to unnecessarily intrude myself on the courtesy of the committee, so generously extended to me, and will therefore proceed to define "the position" as briefly as possible.

The following resolution was this morning offered by an honorable member from Maryland:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be instructed to settle and certify the accounts of the members of the committee of investigation into the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout and others, on the same principles as regulated the settlement of the accounts of the investigating committee on the late Bank of the United States."

Well, sir, this resolution simply, in its terms, and in apparent accordance with an adopted and settled principle of this House, passed, without any remark, and almost, as a matter of course, by acclamation, whilst I, my humble self, was endeavoring to reach the Speaker's ear by vociferating "Mr. Speaker" at the very top of my voice. I failed in this, as I also did, to attract his attention, by waving aloft my position account.

Some friend near me moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; the reconsideration was refused by a large majority, a vast proportion of whom, I verily believe, acted on the supposition that they were but supporting a long established usage, the practical effect of which, I am confident, was not understood by three fourths of those who voted on the question.

Mr. Chairman, I will now, as briefly as possible, give the history of the deed at arms, in which the little Committee of Accounts ventured to "couch a lance" with the investigating committee.

The following account was presented by the investigating committee:

House of Representatives,
To Select Committee on Defalcations, Dr.
Cash paid Astor House for sixteen and a half days' board of six members, namely: Messrs. Harlan, Wise, Smith, Curtis, Hopkins, Dawson, and Mr. Fendall, their clerk, (wines and liquors not included).....$400 10
Extra charge for rooms, lights, fuel, &c.....110 00
Paid messenger.....6 44
Messrs. Owens, Foster, and Wagener's bill at American Hotel.....210 00
Mileage, five hundred miles each for nine members.....1,800 00
Same for clerk.....200 00
$2,726 54

The above bill was withdrawn by the chairman in consequence, I suppose, of the determined opposition of the Committee of Accounts against allowing the charge for mileage, and the following bill was substituted:

House of Representatives of the United States,
To Select Committee on Defalcations, Dr.

I certify to the correctness of the above.

J. HARLAN, Chairman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to say that the first account, as given now by me, is strictly correct, because it was withdrawn by the chairman on presenting the second account; but I do assert that the sum of $2,726 54 (the items being from memory) does not vary ten dollars from the original bill, which the committee were all willing to pass, except as to the mileage; and in lieu of this, we were ready to allow them fifty dollars each, a sum that we all knew, from personal and actual experience, would abundantly cover all reasonable legitimate expenses of traveling from this place to New York and back. This bill, if settled and certified by the committee on their principles, would have given to each member of the investigating committee the sum of $6 13 per diem, supposing them to have been absent twenty days, which, I believe, the time they were absent from this place.

On presentation of the second account, amounting, as before stated, to $2,266 44, the Committee of Accounts were reluctantly induced to yield, and allow the gross amount of $1,600, and directed their chairman to say this was the utmost, unless a particular account was presented, in which case we should exercise a liberal and sound discretion in passing on its items.

Sir, I beg you to bear in mind that the bare suggestion of an exhibition of an itemized account was scouted at, almost as an indignity offered to high minded and honorable gentlemen. Sir, individuals do exist of an extremely sensitive character, men who will start at their own shadows. But I have yet to learn on what principle it is that expenses incurred in the public service can, or ought to be, of a nature not to be exhibited to, and passed upon, by a committee whose peculiar province it is "to superintend and control the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and to audit and settle all accounts which may be charged thereon;" and in connection with this part of my "position," why was it that a certified copy from your Register of the Treasury, of the bill of a former committee of investigation, was deemed necessary to accompany the first statement? Did those gentlemen who offered it discover it in the course of their investigation of abuses? or did they deem the Committee of Accounts so entirely void of knowledge of their appropriate duty, and deficient in sound and liberal discretion, as to be unable to act without the light and force of this precedent, which was thus laid on their table in advance of any objections? I will not stop to inquire how far papers of this description ought to be the rules for the government of the Committee of Accounts; but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that we will not be bound by what our unbiased judgments pronounce to be bad precedents, and that this is not the first case wherein we have felt ourselves compelled to depart from the "line of safe precedent."

Sir, this liberal allowance of $1,600 for the expenses of nine members and their clerk, for twenty days, being a per diem to each of eight dollars, is rejected, and the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland is unexpectedly sprung upon a regular standing committee of the House, and has been forced through in a most unusual manner; and the loud demand of that committee to state the case to this House, was refused by a large majority. Mr. Chairman, I have never yet known a standing committee treated with so little attention; a committee, too, whose special province it is to audit, settle, and control the expenditures of this body, could not be allowed sufficient time to express their views on the very business committed to their supervision. With propriety may we complain; but, sir, I will waive that, and ask gentlemen if they are or were aware of the practical effect of the resolution? Do they know that by this resolution they have agreed to pay the investigating committee a sum of $2,266 44 for their personal expenses during a period of twenty days; which, according to my arithmetic, is equal to a per diem of $11 33? Why, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to perceive how it was possible for these gentlemen to swallow so many of the good things of the Astor House, and yet attend laboriously, sedulously, as we all know they did, in producing, in concocting, the twenty thousand ponderous octavos under which Stockton, Stokes, and Company are doomed to stagger. But, Mr. Chairman, to be serious on a grave question, I cannot, for my life, define the position of the members of this investigating committee as being other than that of persons who live in glass houses, and who have thoughtlessly thrown stones at the passers by, forgetting that reaction is sometimes even stronger than action.

We have all listened, or, at least, are supposed to listen, to a vast amount of declamatory eloquence on the corruption, the reckless extravagance, of other branches of this Government, whilst our own thoughtless profusion is passed unnoticed. I say profusion, Mr. Chairman, lest I may excite the sensitive feelings of certain gentlemen, and be supposed to have trespassed against the dignity and privileges of this august body, than which nothing is further from my thoughts and intentions; for I would not, designedly, use an expression that could be tortured into an invasion of the vocabulary that is alone admitted on the sunny side of Dixon and Mason's line.

We learn, Mr. Chairman, from high authority, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire." To withhold the just earnings of any one has never been the desire of the Committee of Accounts. But for what purpose shall that committee again assemble and examine the validity of claims presented to them, if, at a moment unexpected by any member of that committee, this House assumes to overrule our action, and, without even examining the force and application of a pretended precedent, increases the compensation of a few members of our body to $19 33 per diem, and sternly refuses the poor the common courtesy of listening to a mere explanation. Such reform as this is worse than the calamity they would have investigated; in truth, the remedy is worse than the disease.

The principle is to be considered as being now established by a solemn vote of this House, that, hereafter, the per diem compensation to investigating committees who may choose to travel out of this District is to be at least $19 33. But there is a little question yet undecided. Will the people sanction it? The hard hand toils laboriously for a scanty pittance, and, by the sweat of the brow, earns his daily bread. To him you mete out a twentieth part of this sum, as the abundant reward of labor; for ourselves, however, there is no sum too large not to be assumed with avaricious grip as falling short of self-estimated services. Sir, this doctrine, this practice, will not satisfy the yeomanry of the country; neither will they countenance such unwonted extravagance, but hold those who authorized it responsible for so palpable a violation of every principle of economy and even-handed justice.

Mr. Chairman, I have been charged with designing to speak to my constituents. Sir, I have repelled the insinuated motive as being, in my case, entirely inoperative. Yet I would fain desire that every man in my district could read these remarks, nay, more, sir, I would desire that your constituents, the constituents of each and every member of this body, may have an opportunity, not of reading my speech, but of knowing the self-estimated value of our own services.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it seems that I have occupied the time, if not attention of the committee longer than I ever supposed it at all probable; and I wish you and your constituents to know that whilst we are preaching economy, reform, and retrenchment by the hour, we hesitate not to pay ourselves, at least such of us as are investigators of abuses, the moderate per diem of $11 33, in addition to the usual and statue per diem of eight dollars, and a mileage of the same amount for every twenty miles.

Let us have more example and less of precept. Away with this system of pound precept and penny example! And ere we again undertake to remove the mote, let us be cautious we are not ourselves stumbling over a beam.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you and the committee for the indulgence that has been granted to me; and trust that I have fully defined my own position, as also that of the Committee of Accounts, and last, though not least, the position of the grand investigation committee into the defalcations of Swartwout and others. Sir, I withdraw the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

BOARD OF NAVY COMMISSIONERS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. PARMENTER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 15, 1839,

On the motion to strike out from the general appropriation bill all appropriations for the Board of Navy Commissioners.

Mr. PARMENTER observed that, after so much discussion of the question now before the committee, and after the clear views presented by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. INGHAM,] he should have felt reluctant to trespass upon the time of the committee, and would not, were it not for the fact that, in the section of country where he resided, and particularly in the State of Massachusetts, the people felt a deep interest in the Navy. He thought it incumbent on him, representing a district where the operations of the Navy Department were carried on as extensively as at any place in the United States, to state his views on the proposition now before the committee.

From Massachusetts the Navy has had more seamen than from any other State in the Union. Her extensive navigation engaged in foreign and domestic trade, and the important and valuable branch of her industry—the fisheries—have enabled her to contribute to the strength and efficacy of the Navy in a much more than ordinary proportion, and, therefore, in the same ratio in which she has supplied seamen; and as her interests are concerned in the success of our Navy, it is natural that her sympathies and feelings should be enlisted. Nearly, or quite half of all the navigation of the country belongs to New England at this time, and this arm of the national defense has, as it ought to be, always been watched and favored in a peculiar degree.

I cannot anticipate that the Board of Navy Commissioners is to be abolished in this indirect mode, because the question is too important to a great branch of the public establishment to be decided without a very full examination of all the various considerations connected with it, and that have a bearing upon it. But as the introduction of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York has led to a very free and full debate, there is some fear that the opposition to the Navy Board may go beyond what is intended, and excite some doubts with regard to the utility and management of the whole naval system, and thus bring into discredit, to some extent, the Navy itself—a result which all, I can have no doubt, wish to avoid, who know its importance for the national good and protection of the commerce of the country, and feel pride in the honor it has added to the fame of the country by its achievements and victories.

It is assumed that the Navy of the United States has retrograded in its essential qualities under the present Navy Board; that our ships are badly constructed; that the discipline has become unwise; that the expenditures have been injudicious; and that there is a want of responsibility in the Navy Department, in consequence of the present organization.

In the district I represent, there is one of the most extensive and best regulated navy-yards in the Union—that at Charlestown; and, although I have had frequent intercourse with officers and others having a knowledge of the subject, I have never heard complaint of want of skill on the part of the Navy Board in matters properly appertaining to their profession. The regulations of the yard are good, which was not the case before the board was established, and the system of operations in the building and repairing of vessels has not been a subject of complaint. It appears to me that, in matters of opinion, there is no good ground for objecting to the board. Naval architects differ on the subject. One constructor will prefer one model, another a different one; and, as to the form of vessels, some prefer strength, and think that quality the most important; some fast sailing, and some capacity for comfort and convenience of crews, and so on. But, surely, those who have sailed in our ships of war, in all climates and at all seasons, who have fought our battles, who have lived on the ocean from their boyhood to advanced life, ought to be competent to decide what form of construction will unite in the best way all the various requisites of an efficient ship of war. The character of seamen, their wants, habits, and necessities, none can know without experience; and, in the adoption of such plans as will best promote the different objects in view, experienced naval officers must undoubtedly be the best qualified.

Gentlemen point out particular instances of poor vessels, but, after all, it is often but a difference of judgment. We all have our partialities and preferences on this subject. A northern built ship is apt to be considered the best model at the North; a southern at the South. One architect prefers one mold, another a different one, and so through the whole catalogue; but it has not been shown that any ships are useless, that any have not been, or are not now, valuable acquisitions to the Navy, excepting, perhaps, the steam vessel Fulton. I do not know much about her. I was on board her once, when she was at the navy-yard here. If she be a failure, there is an apology from the fact that she was the first experiment.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do believe there is a radical defect in the organization, and that it arises from the impropriety of the various duties assigned by law to this board. The law gives too much duty and too much power to the Navy Commissioners. Their power is almost unlimited, and extends to the whole concerns of the Navy.

Mr. REED remarked that everything was subject to the superintendence of the Secretary of the Navy and President, and that the fourth section of the law reserved the power of the Secretary.

Mr. PARMENTER. I am aware of those provisions, but practically they have, like all other reservations of the kind, been ineffectual and inoperative. The law is very full in pointing out the powers and duties of the board, and has, to be sure, this general reservation; but the law seems to contemplate that the Navy Commissioners should perform the duty. The old law establishing the Navy Department is very brief. The fourth section of the law, besides, may be fairly construed to relate only to the employment of vessels.

The Navy Commissioners were originally intended to be a board of council, to advise with the Secretary of the Navy on the naval concerns of the country; with certain powers having reference to the rules of discipline in the Navy, fixing the models of ships to be built, planning their internal apartments, having a general superintendence of docks and navy-yards, attending to the equipment and armament of vessels, and similar duties, directing the distribution of stores and materials in such manner as the service required. And I do not see but that the public interest would be better advanced by modifying the law, and placing the Board of Navy Commissioners upon the original ground intended—the performance of such duties as were peculiarly within the competency of naval officers. A reference to the various reports which have been made on this subject will show the views entertained. I would refer to the papers printed in the volume of State Papers on Naval affairs.

But the law of 1815 establishing this board has given a power of a very different description. Let us look at it for a moment. I throw out, to a great extent, the reservation of general superintendence for the Secretary of the Navy over the doings of the board, because it has not and could not well be exercised. The commissioners have, by their rules, placed all the means of information within their own power on naval matters.

This law, although brief, is very comprehensive. The first section provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three officers of the Navy, whose rank shall not be below a post captain, who shall constitute a Board of Commissioners for the Navy of the United States, and shall have power to adopt such rules and regulations for the government of their meetings as they may judge expedient; and the board so constituted shall be attached to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and, under his superintendence, shall discharge all the ministerial duties of the said office relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States; and the said board shall appoint their own secretary, who shall receive in compensation for his services a sum not exceeding $2,000 per annum, who shall keep a fair record of their proceedings, subject at all times to the inspection of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy."

I have read the whole of this section, because there is scarcely a line which is not important in connection with this subject. It provides for a permanent board, the tenure of office not limited, although that question was agitated some years afterwards, but for reasons then stated, was not altered. The board is to consist of post captains in the Navy. They are to discharge the ministerial duties of the office of the Secretary of the Navy "relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials." Under this provision, I understand, the commissioners make all contracts and bargains for the supplies of the Navy. Nothing, it appears to me, can be more unsuitable to their station. Post captains in the Navy, whose dispositions, characters, and habits are so diametrically opposed to a duty of that kind; whose trade it is to fight when their country calls; who are of a class of men prodigal and careless to a proverb, appointed to cheapen with the merchant and mechanic the supplies and labor required for the service of the Navy. It is uncongenial with their vocation. It would appear derogatory to all whose bosoms have thrilled with pride and exultation at the glorious deeds of these heroes of the deep, to witness them bargaining for a bolt of canvas, a barrel of beef, or any other supplies. It is, in my judgment, all wrong for that duty to be performed by them, and it surely never could have been contemplated; but such is the practice under this law. If this were remedied it would take off many of the objectionable points in this case

And, sir, it strikes me, it would, in some considerable degree, obviate the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] who gave as one of the reasons for abolishing the board, that he preferred bureaus; that young and active men should be there to perform the duties. I believe with him that, in many of the duties performed by the board, the qualifications ought to be such as are possessed by younger men.

It is said that, in my part of the country, it requires a pretty active mind, and body, too, to make good bargains. I suppose it does everywhere else. Now, if we can retain the services of this board on subjects which, from their experience, they understand better than others can, and it makes no material addition to the expenses of the nation, it is to be considered whether they had better not be retained. I would have a bureau for the contracts, with which the Commissioners of the Navy should have no connection. These supplies can be made very definite, and the duty could be attended to with as much precision as that of the Commissary of the Army or the contracting department of the Post Office. The component parts of a ration are all specified, and everything wanted for a ship of war, from the truck to the keelson, may be named with as much ease as a post route may be defined. Proposals might be issued for cordage, provisions, medical stores, ship chandlery, and so through the whole, the articles examined by, and delivered to, the naval store-keepers, and such other officers as may be appointed; and the commissioners, when called upon to direct the equipment of a vessel, should present to the Department what was necessary, and have nothing to do with the trading part of the establishment. It properly appertains to men of different pursuits. Besides, if this alteration of the law should be made, it would remove one of the difficulties of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY,] who has said considerable about bad supplies.

The next points are the construction and armament of vessels. Notwithstanding all I have heard, I am not convinced that experienced officers of the Navy are not the most proper men to judge of the proper model, or rather the proper requisites, and, of course, the proper way, a ship of war should be built. They know what is most needed for the security of the armament, and how much strength may be necessary to enable the guns to be worked with safety and effect; the value of the sailing properties of a vessel; the importance to the health of a crew of suitable accommodations; how much and how little of each of these and other considerations, which are often conflicting, can be dispensed with. All these are points to be considered in building a man-of-war. The equipment may also be in the line of their duty, as I think, profitably; men of experience can best understand what is wanted for the variety of service to which the Navy is called. In hot climates and on cold stations, distant or near, the kind of provisions and outfits are materially different, and can be well understood by none but men of experience, and ought to be overseen by officers upon whom a greater responsibility rests than the officer of the ship, whose regard for personal convenience and comfort might sometimes interfere with proper economy.

The last power specified in the law is that which gives to the Navy Board control over the employment of vessels of war; a power which ought never, in my judgment, to be exercised except by Congress or the President and Secretary of the Navy. How extensive this authority has been used by the board, I do not know, but it is a proper subject of inquiry. The employment of public vessels is a question of State policy, and the Board of Navy Commissioners may give us good ships and designate the proper equipment, but it is for those who control the policy of the nation to say how they shall be employed. It is not proper or necessary for this board to direct the arrival or departure of ships of war on a cruise or expedition: doubtless in this important matter the President or Secretary of the Navy is consulted; but still the law granting such authority, with the general reservation of power to the Secretary, ought to be modified. I do not see why, if the Commissioners of the Navy choose, they cannot dispatch the ships of the Navy as they please. I believe they regulate the ports to which they are to return most generally.

This section winds up with a general commission to the board to conduct all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States. Under this general authority, together with the power conferred by the second section of this law, regulations have been adopted by which the whole of the naval concerns, civil and military, have been brought under their direction.

In the second section of this act it is provided:

"That the said Board of Commissioners, by and with the consent of the Secretary of the Navy, be, and are hereby, authorized to prepare such rules and regulations as shall be necessary for securing a uniformity in the several classes of vessels and their equipments, and for repairing and refitting them, and for securing responsibility in the subordinate officers and agents; which regulations, when approved by the President of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed until altered and revoked by the same authority, and the said rules and regulations thus prepared and approved shall be laid before Congress at their next session. It shall also be the duty of said board, upon the requisition of the Secretary of the Navy, to furnish all the estimates of expenditure which the several branches of the service may require, and such other information and statements as he may deem necessary."

With this great power conferred by Congress, why complain of the Navy Board, and not look into the source of the evil—the law? Why find fault with the Secretary of the Navy, when the law recognizes so fully the propriety of vesting in the Navy Commissioners this power? Is it not manifest that, by the terms of the law, the commissioners had the whole management of the Navy given them, and after they had adopted their regulations, which I will refer to presently, and once obtained the assent of the Secretary and President, they were irrevocable, excepting by themselves? These regulations, when once approved, are to continue in force until revoked by the same authority—that is, the Navy Board. If the duties of this board had been confined to the objects for which it was thought necessary—to aid, by their experience and skill, in promoting the good of the service in branches where it required knowledge which none but those who had commanded ships of war could possess—I verily believe no fault would be found, and that the board would be considered eminently useful. The same reasons exist now for its continuance which existed for its formation. The principal one of which was, that a board composed of a suitable number for consultation and advice should be subject to the call of the head of the Navy Department, to which might be given definite power in relation to the building and equipment of the vessels of the Navy. Each captain has his own peculiar views, and hence it would be difficult to concentrate the requisite information, and obtain correct conclusions, without an interchange of opinion; therefore a board is more necessary and proper than a bureau, and is not attended with much additional expense, as officers of the Navy must be taken. The terms of the law, that they are to be officers of a high grade in the Navy, not lower than post captains, show the precise object of their appointment in its theory; and the qualifications required are different from any other officers in the Department. I fear it would not be safe to subdivide the duties in relation to the service which was originally intended, and, therefore, I prefer modifying the law to abolishing the board.

I have referred to the regulations laid before Congress in April, 1816, not for its supervision by Congress—that power was given away by the law—but merely for information. The code is very voluminous, containing more than ninety pages octavo. It gives the Navy Commissioners a very large direction of this great branch of the national expenditures, between five and six millions annually. With the exception of sometimes leaving the option of reports from subordinate officers to the Navy Board and Secretary of the Navy, and, in a few instances, to the Secretary alone, every officer is responsible to the Navy Board.

It begins with regulations about repairs of ships, the extent and time of these repairs to be directed by the board; and then follow several pages of regulations for the officers of ships and commandants of navy-yards, master of the yard, shipwright, purser, and naval storekeeper. This last officer is not in the service of the Navy, but has charge of the stores and materials. The proper authority for him to be answerable to is the Secretary of the Navy; his business is a matter of account, and should be on the books of the Department. Then there are various duties for the commanders of vessels requiring "a correspondence with the Secretary of the Navy as well as with the Board of Navy Commissioners."

We find next many provisions in relation to discipline, salutes, and ceremonies, all of which are probably very proper; and regulations, also, about appointments, stores, and provisions; the mode of punishment of seamen in the Navy; allowances to officers for furniture; rules about rations; directions for the navy agent, a disbursing officer, and a great many other rules which it is not necessary to repeat. But I will make a remark in relation to two or three points. I would suggest that these regulations are, many of them, of such a nature that they ought to be the subjects of laws enacted by Congress. Correspondence on the affairs of the Navy should be with the Secretary of the Navy. The accountability for expenditures of money and provisions and stores ought not to be regulated by the Navy Commissioners.

The ground I take on the proposition is that the naval service requires the assistance of the advice and counsel of experienced naval officers of nautical science; that the Board of Navy Commissioners, with their duties properly defined, would be useful to the service, and that their powers and duties should be restricted to matters within their peculiar qualification, as this is the only reason why their services are necessary. That it is premature to act upon this important subject in this incidental manner; at the same time the discussion is important as leading to an investigation and examination of the whole subject; and the next Congress will have an opportunity to judge whether the board can be retained beneficially to the service under a revised system, or whether the good of the Navy will require a discontinuance.

In looking over the public documents a few days since, when the bill was up for commencing a dry dock in Brooklyn, New York—a question of great importance, as leading to a vast expenditure if continued to other yards—I was forcibly struck with the deficiency of documents in relation to the Navy, notwithstanding it is the object of more than one fourth of the ordinary expenditures of the nation. For all practical legislation, it seems to me that all now existing which would be useful for future action might be contained in an every day document. Report upon report, volume upon volume, we have in relation to lands and other important interests, but on the affairs of the Navy the information is exceedingly meager. With other strong objections to a dry-dock in Brooklyn, I had stated some days ago that the commissioners several years since reported that Brooklyn was not a proper place for a dry-dock, because on the bar there were but twenty-two feet of water at low tide, and it was not safe for a heavy frigate. I was met by a reply that a new channel was recently discovered. I know that; but where is the account of the soundings of the new channel? It is only two or three feet deeper than the old one, and a ship-of-the-line draws four feet of water more than a frigate.

Mr. REED. A ship-of-the-line passed through, and had two or three feet to spare. Lieutenant Gedney says it is thirty-one feet deep.

Mr. PARMENTER. The Navy Commissioners reported there were only twenty-two feet on the bar at low water. This is the information on the subject officially.

Mr. INGHAM. Instead of twenty-two feet, I have evidence incontestable that it is thirty-one feet.

Mr. PARMENTER. All the documents on file show that the depth is only twenty-two feet at low water. I have examined the chart of the Gedney channel; it is only between two and three feet deeper than the old channel. I know the tide flows there six feet. If you add that, it will of course make thirty feet at the top of high water, but that is a nice calculation in making choice of a harbor for a dry-dock.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Expulsion of Mr. Duncan—Mr. Elmore.

Ho. OF REPS.

While I am on this subject, I will say a word about the ship-of-the-line Ohio passing through. I do not doubt that there is a great difference between watching the opportunity of spring tides and a time after an easterly swell, and taking such chance as may offer.

Mr. INGHAM. I can show that the largest ship ever on the ocean can beat in.

Mr. PARMENTER. Then we want proper reports to inform us. I know that the frigate President, during the war, struck on the bar in the old channel, and was captured in consequence.

Mr. HOFFMAN. She ran out of the channel. Mr. PARMENTER. But there are no official reports. Perhaps we ought not to blame the Navy Commissioners for not furnishing reports, if not called upon. They are not required to do so by law, as other executive officers are.

I hope the amendment will not prevail, and that the board will remain as it is at present, until Congress shall alter the law.

One word to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] who has made a local allusion. He is right in saying that the Democratic party have befriended the Navy, and he alludes to a proceeding of a branch of the government of my own State. He says they declared it "unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at our naval victories during the late war." I have no disposition to palliate, in any shape, this degrading and discreditable proceeding. The disgrace is wiped out as far as it can be, but I remember those days. This was the act of heated partisans. The people, of all parties, condemned it. The whole community, at that very time, in Massachusetts, were heaping honors upon the naval heroes who had shed so much glory on the nation. Massachusetts is the fast friend of the Navy, so is the Democratic party, but they wish to correct errors and abuses.

EXPULSION OF MR. DUNCAN.

SPEECH OF HON. F. H. ELMORE,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 23, 1839,

On the resolutions offered by Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, and Mr. THOMPSON, relative to a communication published in the Globe by ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of the House.

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House proceed forthwith to inquire, 1. Whether ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, be the author of a certain publication or publications under his name, in relation to the proceedings of this House, and certain members thereof, published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant. 2. Whether, by said publication or publications the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN, has not been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House, of an offense against its peace, dignity, and good order, and of such grossly indecent, ungentlemanly, disgraceful, and dishonorable misconduct, as renders him unworthy of his seat in this House, and justly liable to expulsion from the same.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to amend by substituting for it the following:

Resolved, That ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House, having avowed himself the author of an article published in the Globe of the 19th instant, grossly libelous of honorable members of this body, that the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN be reprimanded by the Speaker, in the presence of the House.

Subsequently Mr. THOMPSON modified his proposed amendment so as to read as follows:

Whereas, ALEXANDER DUNCAN, a member of this House from the State of Ohio has, in his place, acknowledged himself to have written and caused to be published in the Globe newspaper of the 19th instant, the following writing, to wit: [Here the publication was inserted.] Therefore,

Resolved, That the said ALEXANDER DUNCAN has, in the premises, subjected himself to the just censure of this House, and that he be reprimanded therefor by the Speaker in the presence of the House.

The amendment was accepted by Mr. PRENTISS as a modification of his motion.

Mr. ELMORE addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have voted somewhat differently at the different stages of this proceeding, and as it is one of great importance, I have requested the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion to lay the whole subject on the table, that I may give my reasons for the votes I have given, and that which I shall give, in support of his motion, which he has made me promise to renew at the conclusion of my remarks.

The resolutions first offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] were to me, sir, startling and of an extraordinary character. After his speech, and the reply of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] who was implicated by the resolutions, I voted for the first motion to lay the whole subject on the table, because I believed the House had no jurisdiction of the matter; each party had been heard, and the business of the country was pressing. The House refused to lay it upon the table, and the debate went on, assuming an extraordinary range and character. When the second motion to lay on the table was made, the day was already nearly exhausted, and the accused had made an unsuccessful attempt to get the floor for reply; and, as a willingness, if not a desire, was thus exhibited on both sides to prosecute the discussion, I joined reluctantly in the vote against the motion. But, sir, the question is now on a very different footing; an angry debate of mischievous latitude and range has had a whole day, and every reason for its continuance is at an end; and, as I shall vote for the motion to lay the whole subject upon the table, I will now, sir, proceed to give my reasons for that vote.

The first motion, Mr. Speaker, contemplating the expulsion of the gentleman from Ohio, could not stand even in the judgment of its mover. The acceptance by him of the modification proposed by my colleague, is, sir, a concession, a great concession, to cooler thoughts and wiser reflections. The proposition of expulsion, the highest and most oppressive punishment in the power of this House, for the most flagitious crime, was too untenable to stand the "sober second thought" of a night. But, sir, great as has been this concession, it has not stripped the subject of its difficulty, nor given to this House what neither the Constitution of the country, the laws of the land, nor the rules it has adopted for its own government and proceedings, have conferred.

What right, Mr. Speaker, has this House to sit in judgment on either one of the citizens of the Commonwealth, or one of its own members? Only, sir, where that citizen or that member has violated its rules or its privileges. It is only as a question of privilege that this House can for one moment entertain this resolution. If the privileges of this House have been infringed by the member from Ohio, this House has jurisdiction; if they have not been infringed, the House has none, and its attempt to exercise it will be oppression and usurpation.

I turn, sir, to those who have proposed these various resolutions, and to those who sustain them, and I demand of them, upon what ground do they assume jurisdiction to try and punish the gentleman from Ohio? Put your hands upon the rule of this House, upon the law of the land, or upon the clause in the Constitution, which gives you the right, the jurisdiction, the power. Where is it—what is it?

Mr. WISE. Look at the fifth section first article of the Constitution, as follows:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member."

Mr. ELMORE. I expected the very answer, Mr. Speaker, which my friend from Virginia has given me. I have the very clause lying open before me. I have had it in my memory and reflection ever since the first note of this movement was sounded by the gentleman from Mississippi. I will, sir, examine it to the bottom presently.

Mr. PRENTISS. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the case of giving a challenge?

Mr. ELMORE. I shall certainly, sir, notice that case, too, in the course of my remarks; and that the House may see, and the gentleman understand, that I have never entertained any stunted ideas of its power, privileges, and dignity, I will ask the Clerk to read the paragraph marked with a pencil, from a report I had the honor to lay before the House at its last session, on a question of privilege:

"The privileges of members of Congress are not personal or private rights, but public trusts, assigned to the station and office for great public purposes and utility; they are the privileges of that multitude of persons in whose room and place the member is specially chosen, and of whose rights, power, and dignity, he is the delegated representative. His constituents, in all matters of public concern pertaining to his station and place, have the right to such privileges for their representative as will secure to them its entire service, without hindrance, peril, or molestation. The House of which he is a member has a right to his presence, counsel, and aid, in conducting the arduous and responsible duties of a common Government; and the people of the whole Union have the like rights and interests in the full, free, and unrestricted services of every member of the great national council which directs their affairs. The privilege of a member not being his own, but the right and privilege of his constituents, the House, and the country, it is not merely his right, but it is his duty, to maintain and assert it; and if he waive or surrender it, he violates a duty he owes to all these obligations, and himself commits a breach of the privileges of the House of which he is a member."

I have there, sir, expressed, upon mature deliberation, my opinions of the privileges, rights, and dignity of this House, and of its duty, and the duty of every member of it, on all occasions to assert and maintain them; to maintain them in their purity and vigor, with law and by law. I have reconsidered these views, and there is not one word I would retract, change, or modify. And, sir, whilst I would thus maintain them in purity and vigor, I conceive that no more fatal stab could be given to those rights, that dignity, and these vital privileges, than will be given by this House itself, if it makes a false step in this proceeding, and usurps a high prerogative, not given by law nor Constitution, to degrade one of its own members, and, in his person, to trample upon the constituency of freemen he represents. If, in a free and constitutional Government, anything is more likely than another to strip its Legislature of that high moral influence it should exercise over an enlightened nation, and which is worth more to it and to the country than volumes of parchment powers and whole armies of soldiers, it will be the assumption of privileges not conferred, and the usurpation of powers never granted for their maintenance, and which are, in their nature, inconsistent with the freedom and simplicity of republican institutions. Though the acts of a multitude, they are not less of the essence of despotism.

The magnitude of this question swallows up all consideration of persons. I do not rise, sir, to vindicate, excuse, or palliate the conduct of the gentleman from Ohio; it is a private affair, on which I express no opinions. The member from Ohio, and those who accuse him, are not of a feather's weight in comparison with it. I do not look at them, but over and above them. The issue is one of the highest and most elevated principle, and honored and esteemed as they may all be, of greater, immeasurably greater, importance than any one, or all of them put together. It is a great question of rights, of constitutional liberty. It goes to the very foundation-stone of our institutions, and is fraught with mighty consequences to every member of this body, and to every free citizen he represents. Deeply impressed with its importance I shall now turn, sir, to the immediate question, which I shall discuss with the freedom its magnitude demands, and without reference to the persons involved, beyond their necessary connection with the principle.

I again repeat, emphatically, the questions before put to those who sustain this resolution, upon what rule of this House, upon what principle of law, upon what article of the Constitution, do you ground your proceedings and derive your power? The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] a little while ago, answered, by referring me to the fifth section, first article, of the Constitution. I will now examine that article upon every member of its sentences and every grant of power. "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." There, sir, is the first grant. Has the House adopted rules of its proceedings? Yes, sir, here are the rules in my hand. Which of these rules have been violated?

Mr. PRENTISS. Look into the laws of Parliament.

Mr. ELMORE. Sir, I acknowledge, to a certain extent, the authority of parliamentary precedents and law, but, never, sir, to the arbitrary extent to which its privileged orders have carried it; nor, where its monarchical and aristocratic features come in conflict with rules or principles of constitutional liberty, essential to the existence of freedom in a Republic. We, sir, have adopted written rules for our proceedings; and I have in vain called upon gentlemen to show one of these rules which has been violated. Are we, under the examples of the British Parliament, which has no restraint upon its power, but claims and exercises unlimited authority, to step beyond the Constitution and our own written rules, constitute ourselves a censor morum—look into the private conduct of our members, and, at a discretion as arbitrary as it would make us odious, arraign and try every member whose habits or principles may be disagreeable to us? Shall we exercise, in defiance of the Constitution which protects it, a censorship over the freedom of his pen, and of the press? The right to discuss men and measures? Let it not be said there is no remedy but here for violations of private feelings, for coarse or vulgar or unbecoming publications. The courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, are open; and if they were not, this House has no right to assume either their appropriate duties nor those of a court of honor, when its own privileges are not violated.

The next power given by this section of the Constitution is "to punish members for disorderly behavior." Disorderly behavior where, sir? Does any man doubt, or has it ever been doubted, that it was here, sir, in the proceedings of this House or its committees? For interrupting the business of the country, interfering with or obstructing its Legislature in its high duties?

But the remaining power given is in words larger and more unlimited: "And, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member;" and this, sir, was the indication of the first resolution; an indication ominous and without precedent in this land of law and liberty.* Is it, will it be, pretended that this power of expulsion is a power to do it without good cause? Is it left to the House to exercise it in caprice? Is there no reasonable rule to be observed in its exercise?

If the power is to be considered a naked unqualified power, you may exercise it with or against reason. There is no restraint, no safety. You may expel a member because his coat is not cut in the fashion—because he turns his toes in, instead of out when he walks—because his attitudes are not graceful, nor his voice melodious—or because his principles do not please you, or his politics offend. Or, sir, you may follow him out of this House; spy into his private behavior; impeach him of immoral conduct; of degrading and debasing habits; of being a debauchee, a drunkard, or a gambler; or of conduct even more revolting, and bring him up in this House, and expel him under this section. No, sir, no. The proposition is too monstrous. The moment you act on principles so vague and undefined, you leave the landmarks of law, and are in the dim and shadowy regions of discretion, ever unpropitious to constitutional and well-regulated liberty. In naked truth, you create a despotism. You are, sir, substituting the will of a majority for the law, and turning loose that majority to act as prejudice, the passions of the moment, angry and excited by party collisions and party objects, may hurry them to establish precedents which you in turn may be ground down under, when your opponents gain the ascendancy. The experience of all time and the wisdom of ages tell us to bridle the passions and fortify the judgment. Could the framers of the Constitution have intended to reverse this rule, and give in this section unlimited license to power? Never, sir, never. Then, sir, let this House pause before it acts upon this vague authority—or who, sir, will be safe in or out of your walls?

This is not all. The power given is "to expel." The resolution proposes "to censure ALEXANDER DUNCAN." Even thus softened down to conciliate support, this resolution is, in my judgment, unconstitutional. I see no right, no power in this House to pass it.

But, sir, even if there was a power in the House to act, still I will say it was deserving of grave consideration whether it would be expedient to exercise it. The power to do so, at best, is of exceedingly doubtful right. Whether the privileges of the House go beyond those expressly granted in the Constitution, or where they have been defined by rules of the House, or by law solemnly passed, has been frequently and much questioned by some of the best minds in the country. I shall not here enter into that wide field, further than to say that I go with neither extremes of opinions on this subject. I neither go for the unlimited parliamentary discretion nor for disarming either House of Congress of the power of self-protection. I should consider this House reduced to the most deplorable helplessness and contempt, if it had not the power to protect itself and its members while in the discharge of their high duties, to shield them from violence or impediment. It has ample powers for doing so. I have heretofore spread upon the records of this House my opinions on this subject. I then said, sir, and I now repeat, that "while it is essential for the vindication of the privileges and dignity of the House, that its power shall be sometimes exercised, it should be done only in cases of strong necessity, and never carried beyond what is absolutely and imperiously required by the existing emergency." There is a wise jealousy against power in this country. Its proneness to abuse is well understood by the people. The dictate of a wise moderation should admonish us to forbear its exercise in doubtful cases, especially when they involve vital questions of high political and personal rights. In moments of calmness the judgment of all men will agree to this. When this House undertakes to assert privilege and exert power, it should be a clear case of right and duty; it should be with deliberation, not passion—in defense, not in vengeance; and its action should be tempered by as much of the spirit of moderation, nay of indulgence even, for the infirmities of nature, as can be made to comport with what is due to justice and its own dignity. Nor should the House forget that it is itself the accuser, the law-maker, the witness, the prosecutor, and the judge in its own case, and that from its sentence there is no appeal.

I ask the House if this proceeding is in the calm spirit of judicial inquiry? If the boisterous and angry passions which have been heaving and tossing the judgment of members to and fro since it began, bursting over the legitimate boundaries of calm and decorous debate, have fitted us to decide this grave and important matter with the caution and prudence its magnitude demands? Is it the calm judgment of the House, or excited feelings, which has brought this case up for trial? Do we not all see the difficulty which gentlemen have, to define the offense of the member from Ohio; to point to the law he has transgressed? What is it that has made him amenable to the judicial action of the House? He is not arraigned because he has committed any offense within these walls against the rules of its proceeding, or the law, or the Constitution? Has he impeded the action of this House, or its committees, or any member of it, in the discharge of their duties? Has he assaulted, challenged, or obstructed, or disabled the House, its committees, or any member of it, so that they, or any one of them, have been hindered for one moment from free and full service to the country and their constituents? No, sir; not so. However great his offense may be considered against other tribunals, against this, the only one alleged or put in issue by his accusers, is the publication in the Globe—just such an offense as is daily and hourly committed in every newspaper, and as will be to the end of time in every free country; just such a publication as got the Senate of the United States, in 1800, into its difficulty with William Duane, the editor of the Aurora newspaper. That editor, a Republican, made strictures on the Federal Senate, which it resented as "false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious," and an attack on their high privileges. He was summoned to their bar to be tried for it; and, eventually, refusing to appear, he was arrested by warrant from the Senate and punished—for what? do you suppose, sir; the breach of privilege? No, sir; no, they dared not do that; but they punished him for a contempt in not appearing, in obedience to their order, at their bar. Over that they had jurisdiction, but on "sober second thought" they let fall the question of privilege, and ended the affair by passing the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to instruct the proper law officer to commence and carry on a prosecution against William Duane, editor of a newspaper called the Aurora, for certain false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious publications in said newspaper, of the 19th of February last past, tending to defame the Senate of the United States, and to bring them into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against them the hatred of the people of the United States."—Senate Journal, vol. 3, page 98.

Thus, sir, even in that day of Federal usurpation, did the free principles of the Constitution achieve a triumph, and the Senate, with all its aristocratic tendencies, feel itself compelled to yield its untenable and high-handed procedure to a rule of conduct more conformable to the constitutional rights of the people. Let us pause here, sir, ere we are caught in the like predicament, and compelled to retrace our steps, or, if we persist, are rebuked and condemned by an enlightened and indignant public opinion.

The gentleman from Mississippi called my attention to the case of a challenge. I have, in the report, from which the clerk read an extract, stated my opinion, that "to challenge a member to fight a duel, during the session of Congress, while he is attending to his public duties, is a breach of privilege;" and I have, sir, in that report, given my reasons fully for that opinion, to which I refer the gentleman. But, sir, why this question now? Has it anything to do with the proposed measure against the gentleman from Ohio? Has any challenge passed? No, sir. Is the member from Ohio to be punished for what he has not done? In the resolution, which is the indictment, not one word is said of a challenge. The cause alleged is, that "he had written, and caused to be published in the Globe newspaper, the following publication," &c. Why, then, whilst in the resolution he is charged, and on trial, for the offense of writing and publishing this article in the Globe, are we referred to the doctrine of privilege embraced in challenges? Is it, sir, that while we hold the member on trial, under one charge, which is not tenable in law, he may be convicted under the other, for which there is law? The case made against him cannot be varied. It is there written in due and solemn form. It proposes to punish, for no act done in this House, nor within its privileges, nor as a member, but out of it, in the exercise of his rights as a citizen, and for which he is answerable to the courts of law, for all improper indulgence. Take jurisdiction of this case, and you are at sea. The same principle will cover every newspaper attack upon a member of the House. Punish him, and you may punish all offending in like cases. How many will have to be tried by you? Can you count

* At the time these remarks were made, the case of Matthew Lyon, of Vermont, was not remembered. There are some striking coincidences calculated to excite inquiry into times and principles. It occurred on the same day forty years before, under the Presidency of John Adams. The sedition law, in violation of the constitutional freedom of discussion and the press, had been enacted by the Federal party. Matthew Lyon had attacked the measures of the Government, then in the hands of the Federalists, and censured them with a freedom which is now of every day's occurrence. He was prosecuted; tried in the Federal courts; convicted; and fined and imprisoned. The Republicans of his State elected him a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, in which the Federalists had a majority. On the 20th of February, 1799, he appeared and took his seat, when a resolution was immediately moved in the following words:

"Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a member of this House, having been convicted 'of being a malicious and seditious person, and of a depraved mind, and wicked and diabolical disposition, and of wickedly, deceitfully, and maliciously, contriving to defame the Government of the United States, and of having with intent and design to defame the Government of the United States, and John Adams, the President of the United States, and to bring said Government and President into contempt and disrepute, and with intent and design to excite against said Government and President the hatred of the good people of the United States, and to stir up sedition in the United States, wickedly, knowingly, and maliciously written and published certain scandalous and seditious writings or libels,' be therefore expelled this House."

On the 22d of February, the vote was taken—ayes 49, noes 45. The Republicans resisted this arbitrary measure, and amongst the noes it is grateful to see the names of the old patriots of the party, Abraham Baldwin, Cabell, the Chabornes, Findley, Gallatin, Heister, Livingston, Nathaniel Macon, Nicholas, Thomas Sumpter, Varum, and others. 25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Citizens in Oregon—Mr. Linn.

them, or the cost? What editor of a newspaper will be exempt? Who, indeed, will be safe from your inquisition?

Could you succeed, there is an end of the freedom of the press and the freedom of discussion; but, sir, you cannot succeed; it could not be done with Duane in the iron rule of the sedition law, much less can it be done now, when popular rights and constitutional law have achieved so many triumphs, and are as well known as they are dearly prized by the people.

Mr. MENEFEE asked the attention of Mr. ELMORE to the following extract from Mr. DUNCAN's publication in the Globe of the 19th of February:

"On the 16th and 17th of January last, I made some remarks in the House of Representatives on the resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout, which remarks were soon after published in the Globe, and have since been published in pamphlet form. Mr. STANLY, of North Carolina, followed me in reply. At the commencement of his remarks, he insinuated that I was an Abolitionist. I promptly pronounced the insinuation a base falsehood and a foul detraction, whether it dwelt upon the lips of the unprincipled calumniator, or floated on the breeze in the corrupt, poisonous, and slanderous Federal sheets of the day. My intention at the time was to insult the member; so he understood me; so all who heard me understood me. My meaning was that the member was a base liar and a foul calumniator; and the only reason that he was indirectly thus denounced was, because the rules of the House prohibited me from doing it directly, without laying myself liable to its censure. All this, too, was well understood at the time; and for this intended and well understood insult I held myself in readiness to give the member any satisfaction which he might have the moral courage to seek. But no disposition to seek redress was manifested within the time I had a right to expect it, or within the time it might be expected, from a man who had any regard for his honor or reputation. So I was disposed to let the member go for what I believe him to be, a mean poltroon and a base liar; and which I believe he may, at any time and in any place, be pronounced with impunity."

Mr. M. said: I now call on the gentleman from South Carolina to note the fact disclosed by the member from Ohio, in the extract read from his publication, that he did, in this Hall, from his place, as a member of this House, in debate, and in what he acknowledges he knew to be a violation of the rules, utter what is here printed, with the intention to insult the gentleman from North Carolina. And now I ask, sir, if this does not constitute such an offense as is punishable by the rules of this House?

Mr. ELMORE. I reply, no, sir; it does not come under any law or rule of this House; but if it did, sir, it is not applicable to the case we are trying. The gentlemen who have originated and matured this proceeding have made a totally different charge. It was made carefully—presented deliberately—and, after a day's debate, and a night's reflection, modified to its present shape; it is couched in the clearest and most unequivocal language. There it is, sir, perfected in the resolution on your table; and, so far from being for words spoken here, it is expressly for words "written and caused to be published in the Globe newspaper." That resolution is the indictment, the declaration, the record of the gentlemen, precisely as they have chosen to present the case. The pleadings are made up, and the issue joined, in their own words, and on their own ground. It is not, I repeat, sir, for words spoken here in this House, but for words written and published out of the House. They cannot now swerve from, or vary the issue.

Mr. MENEFEE. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to this point: the member from Ohio, in his publication in the Globe, declares that it was his intention to insult the gentleman from North Carolina in what he said in the House, and has repeated in this publication. He yesterday, in his place in this House, avowed what is here published, and declared that it was his intention to insult the gentleman from North Carolina. This avowal is proof of the intention, and was made in the House. Does not that give jurisdiction?

Mr. ELMORE. It is all in vain, Mr. Speaker. Skilled as he is, adroit and practiced in this kind of warfare, the gentleman from Kentucky cannot escape, nor extricate those he acts with, in this way. With all his address, it is too late now to change the issue. There it is, sir, in the resolution, exactly as they have deliberately chosen to present it. It cannot be shifted, twisted, or changed from what it is. No, sir; not even by this new offense, heretofore unheard of in criminal jurisprudence. We are now told that it is not for the original sin he is to be punished, but for the proof his avowals or confessions here yesterday afford. Not for saying, or writing, or publishing, but for confessing the act. If this is law or justice, I have studied legal rights to little purpose. The experience of much practice, and some reading, has been entirely thrown away; for never yet have I seen or heard of such a principle.

There is even yet another answer, not less conclusive, in the laws of this House. Grant, sir, that the resolution on your table does not read as it is written, and that while it says ALEXANDER DUNCAN shall be "reprimanded by the Speaker," for writing and publishing, it really means for speaking the words complained of on this floor. Even then, sir, I tell the gentleman this House cannot now punish the member for it. The rules of the House make the law of the case, and I cite the gentleman from Kentucky the 26th rule, which is in the following words:

"26. If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky is in direct and palpable violation of that rule. This, sir, is the natural result of error. The original movement was wrong, untenable, indefensible. On a night's reflection it was abandoned for the modified resolution of my colleague; and that, sir, being equally indefensible, the gentleman from Kentucky comes to the rescue with a suggestion which will ride over the rules of this House, the Constitution, and the law, to strike down the member from Ohio. It will not do, sir. Through all its mutations, under all its modifications, it is not in the power of all the talents and skill of the movers to conceal the true character and bearing of this extraordinary and alarming measure; nor, if they succeed here, will we be able to justify to the people this precedent of dangerous usurpation, this unwarrantable violation of representative rights.

There is also, Mr. Speaker, one other consideration which demands the attention of the House. If this body determines to go out of its own curtilage, to examine into the conduct of a member, to sit in judgment on the words he writes and publishes of another member, or of this House, how much more is it bound to take cognizance of words of similar import when uttered on its own floor, in its own proceedings, and in its own ear? I mean, sir, nothing personal, I intend no offense to any one. How often is this House the theater of such exhibitions! Nay, sir, even this very debate has poured out in this Hall floods of denunciatory language, comporting, in my humble opinion, neither with the decorum of debate nor the dignity of this body. It is ringing now in our ears, and admonishing us how deeply we may commit ourselves in this very proceeding. I am, sir, at all times, ready to join in enforcing the rules of the House to prevent personalities; and if they are insufficient, to support amendments which will make them sufficient. I agree with all my heart to what fell heretofore from my friend from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] that such rules should be adopted as will compel members to refrain from personalities. This is most especially called for now, since you have passed the law against dueling.

But to recur to the argument. If you punish the member from Ohio for improper language written and printed out of the House, upon what principle of equal and impartial justice can you refuse to punish language equally objectionable uttered in the House and in its public proceedings? Is it not more your duty to preserve order and decorum in your sessions? Is not your character more deeply implicated by not doing it? Let us be under no mistake in this matter. The world will say justly, if we adopt this resolution, that we should be bound to bring the rule into the House, and give it here its fullest application. Are we prepared for the consequences?

Have gentlemen considered to what it would lead them?

I consider, Mr. Speaker, that at this late period of the session, it is exceedingly injudicious to go further in this business, over which we have, in my opinion, no jurisdiction. It is a waste of the time which should be devoted to the mass of highly important public business on your table, in idle and mischievous debate, which can result in nothing beneficial to us or the country. I believe we have no jurisdiction over the matter; but if we had, it is of so frail and doubtful a tenure that it would be the part of wisdom at all times to decline its exercise. It is now, in this juncture of affairs, our duty to pass it by. To justify us in departing from this course, the fact of violation of privilege should be clear, the law beyond dispute, the offense perfect, and the necessity for punishing it fully established. None of these appear in the present case.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I will notice one other ground commented on by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS.] He held up the law just passed against dueling, and charged that the publication of the gentleman from Ohio was calculated to produce a violation of its provisions. I hold that law now in my hand, and I have looked over its provisions. While I find ample powers given to the courts of justice to take preventive measures to arrest such proceedings, and to punish all who may be concerned in them, I see no power given to this House to punish a member under it—more especially, too, before he has given or accepted a challenge. To undertake to enforce that law in this House would be to usurp the powers and duties of the courts on which you have conferred them. That law leaves the powers of this House exactly where it found them—neither enlarged nor diminished. We have gained no new privileges under it, and it is no authority for this House in its proceedings. Let us leave it to the courts to which it belongs, and attend to our own appropriate duties.

I have said already more than I intended when I rose; and in compliance with the promise exacted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I renew the motion for the previous question.

CITIZENS IN OREGON.

REMARKS OF HON. L. F. LINN,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 22, 1839.

The Senate having taken up the bill providing for the protection of citizens of the United States residing in the Oregon Territory, or trading on Columbia river or its tributaries—

Mr. LINN said that he had, some days since, given his views at large on the merits of this bill, to which he had little now to add. In the course of that debate, he had ventured to prophesy that our difficulties with Great Britain would only be adjusted by war, as the causes for hostilities were rapidly accumulating, and old sores were in a state of irritation.

Great Britain does not hesitate to lay her hands on a portion of the State of Maine, because it suits her convenience, and to which she has no more right, in point of fact, than I would have to my friend's [Mr. PRESTON] property in South Carolina. In truth, she has not even a shadow of a claim to any portion of Maine.

But when did Great Britain ever refrain from taking possession of any country or position she deemed necessary to the advancement of her commercial interests, or to furnish food for her national vanity? Our friends of the northeast do not seem to relish British dominion or jurisdiction. They do not appear willing to permit their noble forests of pine and other timber to be cut down and carried to market by the New Brunswickers. They know the value of their trees; they calculate the value of each to a cent; they know the value of their soil, of their property, and of their Government, too well, not to be willing to fight for them. England has just as little claim to the Territory of Oregon as she has to Maine. By the conventions of 1819 and 1823, it was agreed that both countries should have concurrent possession and jurisdiction; but, Mr.

Public Lands—Mr. Parker.

Ho. of Reps.

President, this has been, and is now, a nullity to us; for Great Britain, through the medium of the Hudson's Bay Company, has built and armed several forts, equipped ships, erected houses, and improved farms; and opened a trade with all the tribes of Indians on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, as far south as the Gulf of California. Their hunters and trappers have penetrated all the valleys and glens of the Rocky mountains, scattering arms, munitions of war, and fomenting discontent against the United States in the bosoms of those distant Indian tribes. They have driven our people from the Indian trade, which yielded seven or eight hundred thousand dollars per annum, and even pushed their operations east of the Rocky mountains to the great Mississippi valley. To all of these aggressions we tamely submit. They have ruined our fur trade, and seem disposed to appropriate the forests of Maine to their own use.

I was mistaken when I said we quietly submit to these injuries. Our Yankee friends to the northeast are now showing a proper degree of indignation at British insolence and outrage, and manifesting a proper degree of war spirit. This is right; for I believe, with the member of the Irish Parliament, (when she had one,) that the best way to avoid danger, is to meet it plump in the face. The English now claim exclusive possession and jurisdiction over a part of the State of Maine, have entire possession and use of the Oregon territory, and have extended their laws over it, even to the confines of Missouri and Arkansas. Not satisfied with these aggressions, they liberated the slaves of southern gentlemen, when the ship that contained them was wrecked on the reefs of the Bahama Isles. Mr. President, if all our complaints and causes for collision with Great Britain were put together, I think the world would bear us harmless should we resort to the ultimate redress for wrongs. And should we ever take place between the two countries, I hope it will not cease until she is driven from the continent.

For my part, when I look back to the period when our sailors had to carry passes when traversing the wide ocean—which pass was often torn up and thrown in the sailor's face by some upstart midshipman, who impressed him into the British service in defiance of his American protection, as it was called; to the murder of our citizens in our own waters, in the sight of our own shores; to the burning and plundering of our ships on the public highway of nations, the ocean; the arming and exciting the Indians to murder and scalp our women and children, and devastate our frontier, with a thousand other insults and injuries, past and present, we have received at her hands, no wise, I assure you, Mr. President, disposes me to forget and forgive so haughty, insulting, grasping, and unjust a Government.

As regards this bill, I shall make no motion, leaving it in the hands of the Senate, as many esteemed friends around and near me seem to think that, at this critical moment, the passage of the bill might be misconstrued. But I pledge myself not to permit our claims to this territory to slumber.

Mr. President, I am far, very far, from desiring war with Great Britain; but I would not avoid it by a truckling policy or a mean submission to insult or injury.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill was committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. PARKER, OF NEW YORK,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 19 and 20, 1839.

The following resolutions, reported by the Select Committee on the Public Lands, being under consideration:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved, further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands this session;

Mr. PARKER said: As a member of the select committee on the public lands, and as a Representative from a State having so large an interest in the disposition of that subject, I may claim a small portion of the time of the House, while I state the reasons which led me to concur in the report of the committee, and why I shall oppose the amendatory propositions of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HARRISON] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] I occupy, Mr. Speaker, a middle ground between these two gentlemen, by no means yielding to the extraordinary doctrine of the former, and equally unconvinced of the propriety of the measure advocated by the latter. The fifth resolution of the member from Missouri, is as follows:

*"Resolved, therefore, As the States of this Confederacy, in all respects whatever, are equally free, sovereign, and independent," no conditions being imposed or required by the Constitution upon those that might be admitted into the Union, that all restrictions and conditions upon the new States, on their admission, being opposed to the fundamental principles and analogies of the Government and not sanctioned by the Constitution, are null and void; and that each new State, upon being admitted into the Union, being "as free, sovereign, and independent as the other States, in all respects whatever," was absolved, by the act of admission, from all terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations whatever, whether under deeds of cession, ordinances, or compacts; and became, ipso facto, the absolute, unqualified, and uncontrollable sovereign of the soil lying within its respective limits and jurisdiction."*

He claims that all the public lands lying in the new States belong, of right to those States—that the ownership of the soil of the vacant lands necessarily results from the sovereignty of a State, and is inseparably connected with its political jurisdiction. This is a bold doctrine, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it is not entirely new.

Several years ago, when a graduation bill was under discussion in the Senate, an amendment involving the same principle was proposed by a Senator from Indiana, but, after some discussion, it was withdrawn. I am told, also, that a pamphlet was published, about the same time, by a Governor of one of the western States, in which the same doctrine was advocated. But in all the discussion that has taken place on this floor on the subject of the public lands, no such monstrous proposition has ever before been asserted. It may be a very convenient doctrine for the gentleman from Missouri, and I doubt not his argument will meet the cordial approbation of those whom he represents. The glittering prize he exhibits may for a time dazzle the eyes of his constituents, and prevent their looking on this question with impartiality. If the principle contended for is recognized, the State of Missouri would immediately become the owner of more than thirty-three million acres of the public land now remaining unsold within its limits. But I cannot believe it will ever receive the sanction of this House or of the nation.

If the doctrine cited from Vattel by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] viz: "that the ownership of the soil of all the waste lands is a necessary attribute of the sovereignty of a State," was ever applicable to the lands in this country, it could only have been when we were emerging from the condition of colonies, and assuming the position of independent States. It was then that these States, as they became sovereign, became at the same time the owners of all the unappropriated lands within their limits. From this source is derived the present title of the Federal Government, resting entirely upon contract, and not upon any assumed exercise of jurisdiction. At the time of the Revolution, the public lands (with the exception of those since purchased from France and Spain) were claimed by the States, and these claims constituted the principal obstacle in forming the Confederation. Several of the States, that made no claim to the vacant lands, contended that they should be considered the common property of the United States, and Maryland did not yield her assent to the Articles of Confederation until March, 1781.

The first movement on the subject of ceding the unappropriated lands, was made by the State of New York, in March, 1780, when the Legislature of that State passed an act tendering to the United States a cession of its claims to the western territory.

This was followed by resolutions of Congress, one of which, passed on the 10th of October, 1780, contained a pledge as to the manner in which the lands that might be ceded by the States should be disposed of, and was as follows:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands which may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union," &c.

In consequence of this pledge, and relying on the good faith of the Federal Government, cessions were made by the several States that claimed the unappropriated land.

The deed of cession from the State of New York was executed on the 1st of March, 1781; one of the conditions of which was, that the lands ceded "shall be and inure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the Federal alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The Virginia deed of cession, which was executed on the 1st March, 1784, contained the following condition:

"That all the lands within the territory as ceded to the United States," &c., "shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederacy or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

A similar condition was contained in all the subsequently executed deeds of cession; the deed of Massachusetts being executed in 1785, of Connecticut in 1786, of South Carolina in 1787, of North Carolina in 1789, and of Georgia not till 1802.

On the 13th of July, 1787, Congress passed an ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, the fourth article of which contained the following provision:

"The Legislatures of those districts or new States, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulation Congress may find necessary, for securing the title in such soil in the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States," &c.

It is contended by the gentleman from Missouri that this part of the ordinance of 1787 is void and inoperative, because it is, as he says, a violation of the compact with Virginia, inasmuch as the deed of cession from Virginia does not expressly authorize the United States to retain the unsold land in the new States, and to hold it exempt from taxation. Now, I deny that this clause in the ordinance is at all inconsistent with the deed from Virginia. On the contrary, these lands could not be held as a "common fund," for the use and benefit of all the States, as required by the deed, except in the manner specified in the ordinance. To surrender the lands to the new States would violate the condition of the deed of cession, by depriving the old States of their share in this common fund. Such a disposition of the public lands would not operate for the benefit of all the States, "according to their usual respective proportions of the general charge of expenditure;" and as evidence that Virginia understood her deed of cession as authorizing the Federal Government to retain the right of soil in the unsold lands in the new States, I call the attention of my friend from Missouri to some resolutions passed by Congress as early as the 23d April, 1784, relating to the new States that should be formed in the Northwest Territory, in which the same reservations as to the right of soil, and holding the lands exempt from taxation, were expressly made. These resolutions were passed during the month next succeeding that in which the cession was made. The acts were almost simultaneous; and the same delegates from Virginia, who executed the deed of cession, were members of the Congress that passed the resolutions. It cannot, therefore, be supposed there existed at that time any difference of opinion as to the right of the General Government to make these reservations.

Mr. HARRISON said that the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 were never sanctioned by the State of Virginia.

Mr. PARKER. I will satisfy the honorable member from Missouri that he is in error on this point. On the 30th of December, 1788, an act was passed by the General Assembly of Virginia ratifying and confirming the fifth article of the ordinance of 1787. In that act the fifth article of the ordinance is recited at length. One clause of that article is in these words:

Public Lands—Mr. Parker.

HO. OF REPS.

"Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles."

Thus, by ratifying the fifth article, the General Assembly of Virginia, in fact, confirmed the whole ordinance in regard to the principles and terms upon which new States were to be formed in the Northwest Territory. So much for the allegation that the proceedings under the ordinance have been in violation of the compact with Virginia.

This last argument of the gentleman cannot apply to the State of Missouri. That State formed no part of the lands ceded by Virginia. It was included in the purchase from France, and paid for out of the national Treasury. His objection would only be applicable to the land lying east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio, for that was the only territory affected by the ordinance of 1787. The same reservations, however, have been made by Congress in all cases on the admission of new States, whether the territory was ceded by the States for the common benefit, or paid for out of the common Treasury.

I also understood the gentleman from Missouri to urge that the ordinance and subsequent acts of Congress making reservations of the land were void, because there were no agents or representatives on the part of the Territory.

Mr. HARRISON explained by saying that the ground he had assumed was, that the compacts by which the new States were admitted were void, as there was but one party to the compact capable of contracting.

Mr. PARKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, this is, in substance, a plea of infancy, and before I proceed to discuss it, I will call the attention of the House to the first clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which provides:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Th acts of Congress on this subject are, therefore, constitutionally binding, and no assent on the part of a Territory or the inhabitants of a Territory is required. But if it is necessary to go further, there is enough to show that valid compacts have in all cases been entered into. Take Missouri for example. On the 6th of March, 1820, an act was passed by Congress prescribing the terms on which Missouri might become a State, and authorizing the calling of a convention to frame a constitution. The usual conditions, that "the Legislature of that State should never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil," and that "no tax should be imposed on lands the property of the United States," were exacted. These conditions were assented to by the people of Missouri, in convention, on the 19th July, 1820, and were recited and expressly acknowledged in the tenth section of the constitution framed at that time. But if a plea of such a character is interposed—a plea of infancy, for the purpose of avoiding a fair and express contract, on the ground that Missouri was not a State at the time of the contract, then I call your attention to the fact that Missouri, after she became a State, and while exercising the full powers of sovereignty, expressly ratified the contract she had made during her minority. In an act passed by the Legislature of that State on the 1st of March, 1825, for the purpose of raising revenue, the unsold lands are admitted to be the property of the United States, and are declared exempt from taxation. I have not examined the statutes of the other new States for the purpose of showing that similar laws have been enacted in all of them; but of that fact I suppose there can be no doubt; and I am not aware that any attempt has ever been made, in any of them, to tax the lands belonging to the General Government.

It was also objected that the reservations made by Congress were unconstitutional. So far from it, sir, the rights of the Federal Government to the public domain are expressly reserved by the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which, on the subject of the territory of the United States, provides that

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular States."

This left the rights of all parties to these lands precisely as they existed before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and was no doubt intended to protect the rights of the United States to their lands under the deeds of cessions, and also the rights of North Carolina and Georgia, which had not at that time ceded to the General Government. The lands of the United States continued to be held as a common fund for the benefit of all the States, and the ownership of all the unappropriated lands became complete in the Federal Government, when the deeds were subsequently executed by North Carolina and Georgia.

For the purpose of showing that the convention which framed the Constitution did not intend the General Government should retain the disposal of the soil of the vacant lands, reference has been made to the proceedings of the convention, by which it appears the following amendment was proposed by the delegates from Maryland on the 30th of August, 1787:

"The Legislature of the United States shall have power to erect new States within, as well as without, the territory claimed by the several States, or either of them, and admit the same into the Union: Provided, That nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to affect the claim of the United States to vacant lands ceded to them by the late treaty of peace."

This amendment was rejected, eight States voting in the negative, and only three in the affirmative. It is now urged that, in consequence of the rejection of this amendment, it is fair to infer the convention did not intend the United States should retain the right to these lands. At best, this is a negative argument, and rests entirely upon inference. Yet, I confess, it struck my mind with some force, and it was not until I had carefully examined the proceedings of the convention, that I became satisfied it was entitled to no weight. To what was this amendment proposed? Not to the Constitution as it now exists; if it had been, the inference would be legitimate; but it was offered as an amendment to the draft of a constitution, reported by a committee of five, which was then under discussion. At that time, the clause of the Constitution to which I have referred, and which reserved the claims of the United States to these lands, had not been adopted; but it was proposed and adopted on the same day, after the rejection of the amendment alluded to, and in place of it, only one State voting in the negative.

The gentleman from Missouri also cited the case of the People vs. Godfrey, reported in seventeen, Johnson's Reports; and with an air of triumph that denoted his confidence in the correctness of his position, called my attention to the opinion there expressed by the supreme court of my own State. Courtesy, therefore, requires me to point out to him its inapplicability to the question before us. The only point made in that case was whether the State courts or the Federal courts had jurisdiction of a murder committed in Fort Niagara; and that question arose, not under that section of the Constitution to which I have already referred, but under another section of that instrument, viz: the eighth section of the first article, which provides that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever "over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." The court says the right to exclusive legislation is exclusive jurisdiction, which I freely concede; and it was held by the court that the State courts had jurisdiction of the offense charged, because it did not appear the United States had ever acquired title and jurisdiction by purchasing the fort with the consent of the Legislature, in the mode pointed out in the Constitution.

Apply this doctrine to the new States. Missouri has the right to exclusive legislation within her limits, and she therefore has the exclusive jurisdiction. But does it follow that she must, therefore, be the exclusive owner of the soil? I can by no means subscribe to this doctrine of eminent domain. I cannot admit that the reservation by the United States of the right to the "primary disposal of the soil," is at all inconsistent with the sovereignty of the new States. Political jurisdiction does not necessarily carry with it the right of soil. In Maine, a large portion of the vacant lands is still owned by Massachusetts. Is the ownership of these lands, by Massachusetts, inconsistent with the sovereignty of the State of Maine? Was New York any the less sovereign when the State of Massachusetts owned lands within her limits? Or did it detract from the sovereignty of Ohio, that Connecticut owned the "Western Reserve" in that State? On the contrary, the distinction between jurisdiction and right of soil is expressly recognized. If land for a fort be purchased by the United States, the right to the soil is usually obtained from an individual, but the jurisdiction is conferred by act of the State Legislature. In the deeds by which the States conveyed the vacant lands to the United States, this distinction is fully recognized, the expression used being "all right, title, and claim, as well of soil as of jurisdiction." On the 28th April, 1800, an act was passed by Congress, authorizing the President to convey, by letters patent, to the State of Connecticut, all the right and title of the United States to the soil of that tract of land called the "Western Reserve," on certain conditions; one of which was, that Connecticut should release to the United States its jurisdictional claim to the same tract of land. This condition was complied with, and deeds were accordingly executed by both parties. It cannot be necessary to cite other instances, in which jurisdiction and right of soil in vacant lands, have been transferred separately, and vested in different States.

But the Federal Government, by the several compacts with the new States, has continued to hold the public lands exempt from taxation, and this is characterized as an act of injustice and oppression. As an answer to this charge, I have only to say that the grants to the new States, as a compensation for this exemption, have been more than an equivalent; they have been liberal in the extreme. By the terms of admission, each new State is entitled to one thirty-sixth part of the lands within its limits for the support of common schools. Under this provision alone, the new States and Territories have become the owners of nine million three hundred and five thousand two hundred and eighty-seven acres. In addition to this, four hundred and eighty-four thousand three hundred and twenty acres have been granted to the new States for colleges, academies, and universities; thirty-five thousand three hundred and eighty-nine acres for seats of government and public buildings; three hundred and twenty-nine thousand six hundred and twenty-nine acres for salines; two million five hundred and thirty-five thousand seven hundred and thirteen acres have been granted for roads and canals; making an aggregate of twelve million six hundred and ninety thousand three hundred and thirty-eight acres of land conveyed to the new States and Territories. It is further provided that each new State shall have the benefit of five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of land within the State; and this now amounts to nearly four million dollars. As to the States north of the Ohio river, two per cent. of this sum was to be expended, under the direction of Congress, in constructing roads leading to these States. This has furnished the pretense for the construction of the Cumberland road, upon which more than six million dollars have already been expended by Congress, although the two per cent. reserved would amount to but little over a million and a half of dollars.

I do not complain of these grants of land to the new States; I have only called the attention of the House to them, to refute the charge of injustice that has been made; to prove the liberality that has been exercised; to satisfy, if possible, even the gentleman from Missouri himself, that his State has been provided by the General Government with means of education and internal improvement, infinitely more ample than any one of the old States has enjoyed. The rapid advancement of these new States in wealth, population and improvement, furnishes conclusive evidence that the General Government has been actuated by no narrow policy in regard to their interests. I fully appreciate the merits of the hardy and enterprising settlers of the West, and I would continue to protect their interests as far as justice to others will allow. I would secure the right of preemption in all cases to the occupant, and, if practicable, I would have the sales confined to actual settlers. This could only be done by passing preemption laws in advance, as an inducement to settling on the public lands and requiring continued occupation and cultivation, to entitle the claimant to preemption. There is danger that immense tracts of the public domain will fall into the hands of rich capitalists, and that a dependent tenantry, with its consequent evils, will be, to some extent, entailed upon a portion of the now unsettled lands of the country. More than two hundred and thirteen million acres still remain unsold in the new States and Territories; and when this vast domain shall have become covered with a denser population, there will yet remain more than seven hundred million acres, lying still further west, to which the Indian title has not yet been extinguished.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, answered, I trust satisfactorily, the arguments of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON.] Some attention is due to the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] Indeed I believe that is the principal question that ought to occupy the attention of the House, and in regard to which the select committee of one from each State was appointed. He proposes to strike out the resolution reported by the committee, and insert the following:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause separate accounts to be kept of all moneys paid into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands, to be disposed of in the manner herein provided, unless otherwise by law specially directed, viz: he shall, on the 1st day of July succeeding the next census, and thereafter semi-annually, on the 1st day of January and July in every year, divide all the said moneys then in the Treasury among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their Federal numbers: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, or such portion thereof as may be requisite to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government for any year in which the receipts from customs and other sources of revenue shall be estimated to fall below—million dollars, and when it shall be deemed proper, on that account, to apply the said proceeds, by special appropriation, to supply the deficiency and meet those expenditures: Provided, also, That, in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign Power, the said semi-annual division shall cease, and be suspended during the continuance of such war: Provided, moreover, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right and obligation of Congress, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that benefits from the use of the public lands, or the proceeds thereof, have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, conferred on particular States, to extend as far as practicable to each and all the States, in their due and just proportions, who may require or be willing to accept them, similar benefits, upon the same or equivalent terms."

"Mr. DUNN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON by inserting before the first proviso:

"First paying to the States in which such lands are situated twelve and a half per cent. of the proceeds of public lands sold within such States respectively."

This amendment proposes the adoption of a system of distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and taken in connection with the further amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNN,] bears a strong resemblance to the bill generally known as "CLAY'S land bill," which passed both Houses of Congress, and was returned with objections by the President in 1833. That bill was limited to five years in its operation, and no limitation is proposed by this amendment. With the view of showing that the people of New York are in favor of a distribution, the gentleman from Virginia has referred to resolutions adopted by the Legislature in 1831, as being the last expression of its opinion on this subject. In this he is mistaken. On the 24th of March, 1834, the following resolution was passed by the Assembly of the State of New York:

"Resolved, That we approve the message of the President of the United States dated December 4, 1833, returning, with his objections, to the Senate, the bill entitled 'An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and to grant land to certain States.'"

The vote on the adoption of the resolution was—88 in the affirmative, 8 in the negative.

Eleven to one opposed to "CLAY'S land bill." That is, I believe, the last resolution of the Legislature of New York on the subject of the public lands.

I shall not follow the gentleman from Virginia into an examination of the resolutions that have been passed in other States, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he may not have been equally misinformed in regard to them. I will only remark, that if other States expressed themselves in favor of a distribution several years ago, I doubt much whether it is fair to take that as the existing sentiment at this time, when the revenues derived both from lands and customs are inadequate to meet the wants of the national Treasury. It will be found that such resolutions were passed when there was a full Treasury—perhaps a surplus—and they cannot be considered as evidence of public sentiment at this time.

It strikes me as very extraordinary that such a proposition should be brought forward at the present time, when our national Treasury is exhausted; when there are still unredeemed two or three millions of Treasury notes, issued during the last year; when we have found it necessary, within the last few days, to extend the act so as to authorize the issue of more Treasury notes to meet the expenses of the current year; and when the revenue from customs is rapidly decreasing under the compromise act of 1833. The greatest reductions of the tariff under that act are yet to take place, and do not reach the minimum until 1842. Yet it is proposed to deprive the General Government of one entire branch of its revenue, at a time when it is indispensable to its exigencies. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that this movement is made for political effect; yet I could not fail to mark the fact that, simultaneously with the introduction of the resolution in this House, at the present session, a distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] introduced in the Senate a similar proposition, as an amendment to the graduation bill. Nor could I fail to perceive that it was calculated, if it was not designed, to affect the approaching presidential contest. I was impressed by the remark made yesterday in this House by an honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] that the most important bills have always been acted on by Congress during the year next preceding a presidential election. It has been upon such occasions that measures of policy, from which it was believed strength might be gathered for an approaching contest, have been pressed with most earnestness. I do not charge that any such motive has prompted the agitation of this subject at this time, with a view to press it still more zealously at the next session of Congress; of that I leave the public to judge; but I do think the proposition is calculated to hold out expectations to the States which, in the present condition of our national finances, cannot be realized; that it is ad captandum in appearance, addressed to the cupidity of the States; and that it cannot bear the test of scrutiny.

By reference to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen he estimates the amount of revenue that will probably be received from customs in 1842 at ten or twelve million dollars. Now it cannot be supposed this sum will be sufficient to defray the expenses of the Government. In the present condition of the country, with the most rigid economy in expenditures, it can hardly be supposed the expenses of the Government will fall much short of $20,000,000. If the revenue from the sales of lands in 1842 should amount to $5,000,000, this added to the highest sum named by the Secretary of the Treasury, would amount to $17,000,000, probably not enough to meet the wants of the Government. But we are required to divide the $5,000,000 among the States. Of course, there is at least so much deficiency in the National Treasury. How is this deficiency to be supplied? By direct taxation? The gentleman from Virginia has been silent upon this subject. Surely, if he proposes to take from the public Treasury the money that is needed for national purposes, he ought to instruct us how to meet the deficiency. Is it intended to distribute among the States, and to collect the same amount by direct taxation from the people? Or is it proposed to collect it by indirect taxation, by again raising the tariff, and thus compelling the people to pay the tax by paying a higher price for every article they find it necessary to purchase? It would hardly seem best to distribute the money, if it is to be immediately collected back again at an increased expense.

Let us look at the effect of dividing the $5,000,000 under such circumstances. In the first place, twelve and a half per cent. is to be deducted and given to the States in which the lands lie. This amounts to $625,000, and leaves for distribution only $4,375,000. Suppose the distributive share of New York to be one sixth, (for the exact proportion is not material to our inquiry,) that State would receive $729,166. Now, how is it with supplying the deficiency of $5,000,000 in the Treasury? One sixth is to be collected from New York, and this amounts to $833,333. The expense of collecting could not be less than twelve and a half per cent., and this amounts to $104,165—making an aggregate to be collected from the people of that State of $937,498—being $208,332 more than the share distributed to that State. If this system is carried into practice, it will be found that the sum to be collected will be at least twenty-five per cent. more than the sum distributed. For every dollar that is given to the State, $1 25 is to be collected from the hard earnings of the people.

It may be said I have estimated the revenue from customs in 1842 too low; perhaps it is so. If the importations are large, it may amount to $14,000,000; add to this $5,000,000, as the revenue from the sales of lands, and you have $20,000,000, the sum needed for the expenses of Government. In dividing the sum of $6,000,000, after deducting $750,000, for the exclusive benefit of the new States, New York would receive only $875,000, whilst the State would have to raise, including expenses of collection, $1,125,000. This is the economy of the proposed system.

But it may be said the resolutions provide for a deficiency in the revenue. In what manner? Why, they provide, that if the receipts from customs fall below a given sum, "and when it shall be deemed proper on that account," the proceeds of the sales of the lands may be applied by special appropriation to supply the deficiency; that is, Congress shall have power by special appropriation so to apply them. Congress would have the power without this provision, but Congress might not anticipate the deficiency. It might occur when least expected. Congress, too, has the power to call on the States for the money deposited with them under the act of 1836; but it is doubted whether that power will ever be exercised.

There is another objection to this plan. Why should the new States receive twelve and a half per cent. more than the old States out of the proceeds of these sales? Such a distribution would be a violation of the most solemn compacts between the General Government and the States. These lands were to constitute a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States "according to their usual respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure," and were "to be disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Why this unequal distribution? It cannot be an allowance for the supposed more rapid increase of population in the new States, for it is not proposed to distribute till after the next census.

But why is it necessary to the interests of the States that distribution should be made? The money arising from sales of lands has been applied towards the extinguishment of the national debt, and to the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of Government. Does not every State enjoy the full benefit of its share, by having it applied to pay its proportion of these debts and expenses? As long as the revenue from this source is applied for national purposes, it saves the necessity of calling on each State to contribute, and thus every State enjoys the benefit, in proportion to what would be "its share of the general charge and expenditure."

If "Clay's land bill" had become a law, what would now have been the State of the national finances? By a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I now hold in my hand, it appears there would now have been a national debt of over $48,000,000, in case the proceeds of the land sales had been distributed according to the provisions of that bill; and a deficiency of more than $19,000,000, if the money deposited with the States, under the act of 1836, is still considered as available to the Treasury. Let us pause before we adopt a measure that shall again involve us in a heavy national debt. It is evident that, for several years to come, not a dollar can be spared for distribution. And why are we called on to legislate on this subject so long in advance? The adoption of this measure will be in time when the state of the Treasury will justify it. The duty of deciding on this question does not devolve on us. It will belong to those who shall represent the people on this floor when this source of revenue can be spared from the Treasury without sacrificing the interests of the nation, and without imposing unnecessary taxes upon the people.

PUBLIC LANDS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 8, 1839.

The bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands being under consideration, and Mr. YOUNG having addressed the Senate as given in the Globe of January 22—

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remarks on the impropriety of taking notes of what Senators might say in the warmth of debate, for the purpose of holding them responsible for the language on subsequent occasions, and characterized it as uncorroborated, &c.

Mr. YOUNG said, by way of rejoinder, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] objects to my taking notes of what may be said by honorable Senators in their places here, of words spoken in the heat of debate, often incautiously and unguardedly. Mr. President, I, too, would condemn such a practice in ordinary cases. I willingly admit, with the Senator, that words spoken in the heat of debate, incautiously or unguardedly, ought not to be treasured up in this way for use in our cooler moments. But, sir, this was an extraordinary case. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had stood forth as the prominent opposer of the preëmption bill, and had, on more than one occasion, used such expressions as I attributed to him towards the settlers upon the public lands in the new States. I took it, therefore, that he had used them deliberately, and was not disposed to take back a word that he had uttered. I being from the West, sir, a Representative from a new State, supposing that, on some future occasion, it might become necessary to make reference to that debate, took note of what was said, as near as I could, in the very language of the speaker, in order that I might be accurate, and not subject myself to the charge of misrepresentation, which has been made in the course of this debate.

The Senator complains that in all this there is a want of courtesy, which should, on all occasions, characterize our intercourse on this floor, regardless of party predilections. Sir, perhaps the Senator is right. I know, Mr. President, that a degree of courtesy highly creditable to this body does, in general, prevail here. I only wish, sir, that it was more universal. But does this charge, under all the circumstances, come with a good grace from that side of the Chamber? How often, within the short period in which I have been honored with a seat on this floor, have I heard the Senator's colleague, [Mr. CLAY], when speaking of the political organization of this body, exclaim with emphasis, that, constituted as this Senate was, he had nothing to hope or expect from it! And what is this, sir, but a denunciation of the whole Administration party here as being either servile to Executive dictation, or something equally improper? Let those, therefore, who would inculcate the doctrine of courtesy on this floor, set me the example. In relation to the notes which I took on the occasion referred to, and to which I made reference in the course of my remarks to-day, it is due to myself to say with what view and for what purpose they were taken down. They have not been published in the newspapers here or elsewhere; no one has a copy of them, and but few have seen them. I may have shown them on a few occasions, but most frequently at my own home, in my own domestic circle, as well to the Senator's [Mr. CLAY] own political friends as my own. But, sir, they were not taken for any purpose of electioneering, as has been supposed, as I am not in the habit of making stump speeches over the country. Sir, is it a subject-matter of reproach that I should defend my constituents against what I consider unjust and unmerited denunciation?

Mr. President, the people of the new States do not consider themselves as trespassers or violators of the law in going upon and fixing their homes upon the public lands. They are not trespassers. It is true, sir, that the act of Congress of 1807, prohibiting settlements upon the public lands under certain penalties, has not been repealed, but it has become obsolete—long since inoperative, at least in practice. Since their settlements have been legalized, and their improvements secured to them under the various preemption laws from 1813 down to the act of the last session of Congress, they consider, and not without reason and precedent, that they have the tacit consent of the General Government to go upon these lands, to make their farms upon them, and to occupy them in peace when made; and such, sir, has been the practice since my residence in Illinois, now twenty years and upwards; and no one on the part of the Government has, within that period, to my knowledge, offered to turn them away from any lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished. No, sir; so far from it, they have from time to time been quieted in their possessions, and allowed the preference in the purchase of the land in the manner I have mentioned.

The Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] says that the condition of the squatters in Kentucky, of which I made mention in commenting upon his honorable colleague's Richmond speech, was totally dissimilar from that of the squatters on the public lands in the new States; that in Kentucky the squatter went upon the land with his title in his hand, in the firm belief that he was the rightful owner of the land; whereas the squatter upon the public land went upon it in the full knowledge that it not only did not belong to him, but that, in so doing, he was violating the law. I cannot, Mr. President, perceive any substantial difference in the parallel of the two cases.

The squatter in Kentucky believed that he had a title, when in point of fact, he had not. He made his improvements in good faith, believing that he was the owner of the land, and in the expectation that he was to enjoy them when made, and his children after him, and it was hard to turn him out without either making him full compensation for his labor, or permitting him to become the purchaser from the true owner at the assessed value of the land in its unimproved state, at the time he first went upon it. This, sir, was but fair, but reasonable and just, as was conclusively shown by the argument of the Senator's colleague, in his Richmond speech in 1822, from which I have quoted. And how, sir, is it with the squatter in the new States? He, too, went upon the land, as he believed, with the tacit consent of the Government; he made his home upon it; incorporated his labor with the soil, and rendered it productive, in the firm belief that the Government would give him the preference in the purchase at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, when it should be brought into market; that the same indulgence which had been extended to others since the year 1813, would also be extended to him. I now ask the Senator [Mr. CRITTENDEN] if there would be any more propriety in turning him away as a trespasser, without full compensation for his labor, because he had no title under such circumstances, than there would be in the case of the Kentucky squatter whose title had been found to be defective?

Sir, there was a time in Illinois, during the early part of the territorial form of government in that country, when the registers of the land offices were authorized to grant "permits" to persons to settle upon the public lands, upon their paying some small amount of money in consideration of the privilege; but such instructions have long since ceased to be given to the registers; and, in my judgment, taking the whole practice of the Government together, this law of 1807 should be considered as obsolete, for this purpose at least, and ought not now, at this late day, to be interposed as a barrier to the settlement and improvement of the country. Sir, I have never heard of the first attempt on the part of the Government to enforce that law, except in a few cases where a very few persons only had gone upon the lands that had been reserved as lead mine lands, to be leased by the Government, or upon Indian lands to which their titles had not been extinguished.

Mr. President, since I commenced these remarks in defense of the position I occupy in this debate, an extract from the speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIPTON], on the subject of the preëmption bill of the last session, has been placed in my hands, containing the Senator's [Mr. CLAY] own declaration as to what he did say on the occasion referred to; and, for the purpose of showing that I did not misrepresent him in attributing expressions to him which it has been intimated he did not utter, I beg leave to read the extract to the Senate:

"Mr. TIPTON said: I will repeat, as nearly as I can, what was told me yesterday; and if I go wrong, he [Mr. CLAY] can correct me. I understood that he denounced the settlers on the lands as a lawless banditti of land robbers, unjustly grasping at the public treasure."

"Here Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he would repeat what he did say on the occasion referred to by the honorable Senator from Indiana: he did say that the squatters on the public lands were a lawless rabble; that they might as well seize upon our forts, our arsenals, or on the public treasure, as to rush out and seize upon the public lands."

Here, sir, is an exposition of what was said by the honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY], in his own words, as taken down by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. TIPTON]; and in what does it differ as to the material part of my statement, as quoted here to-day? Mr. President, in the course of a very few remarks which I made at the last session, I read at my table here, from the notes I had taken, from this same paper used here to-day, a portion of these same expressions which I have attributed to the honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY]; and I did not understand him as then denying them.

Mr. CLAY said it was untrue that any such paper had been shown to him; that he did not know that such a paper was in existence, until very recently informed by a member of the other House, from Illinois, that such a one had been used to his prejudice by the Senator from that State, [Mr. YOUNG], during the recess of Congress; and he was also understood as denying the correctness of the statement.

Mr. YOUNG said he did not say that he had shown the paper to the Senator, [Mr. CLAY], but he did say that he had read from the same paper at the last session, at his table, when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was in his seat, and must have heard him. He may not have seen the paper in his hand, but certain it is he (Mr. Y.) read from it a portion of the same expressions which he attributed to him to-day, and he did not then understand him [Mr. CLAY] as denying them, or as disposed to take back a word that he had said.

Mr. President, I do not undertake to say that the expressions attributed to the Senator [Mr. CLAY] were used in connection, as I have them noted, and as I read them. They were used in the course of his remarks, and such only were taken down, as he went along, as were deemed most exceptionable and offensive to the settlers on the public lands. When he had concluded, and before I left my seat, I made the copy from them used here to-day, and at the last session. All that I have now to add, is, that whether the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] saw the paper or not, the statement it contains, as read from my place to-day, is correct and true, and very nearly in his own language as I understood him. It is for the Senate to judge whether I have misrepresented him or not.

Mr. LINN, (in an audible voice.) It is true, every word of it.

Mr. TIPTON observed that he did not rise to prolong the debate; but as his position on a former occasion did not seem to be understood, he thought it right to make a brief explanation. He would just state how it happened that he made any remarks with regard to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, which he did not hear. When the preemption bill was under discussion at the last session, he was absent for a short time in a committee-room, preparing a bill, and when he returned to his seat in the Senate, the Senator from Kentucky was reading from a newspaper. He (Mr. T.) inquired of a friend what was going on, and was told the Senator from Kentucky was reading a newspaper published in Indiana, and had been saying hard things of his (Mr. T.'s) constituents. The next day he took occasion to reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky, defending the squatters on the public lands, and quoted the words which he was informed the Senator from Kentucky had used. A few days after this the Senator from Kentucky called his attention to a report of his (Mr. T.'s) speech as published in the newspapers, and stated that he did not use the words there attributed to him. He repeated words which he said he used on the occasion referred to. I adopted his own words, and they were published in the pamphlet copy of my speech. If these are the words now quoted by the Senator from Illinois—and I believe they are—they are the very words furnished by the member from Kentucky. He surely has no just grounds to complain of these words being now repeated. Now, from what has been said to-day, it might be inferred that I used words in my speech which I retracted next day; but the fact is, I had nothing to do with the correction but to tell the truth. When a thing is said or done here, I have no other object than to let the truth go to the people concerning it.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1839.

The message of the President of the United States on the subject of the troubles on the north-eastern boundary line of the United States having been received, and, with the principal documents accompanying it, having been read,

Mr. HOWARD moved the reference of the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; that they be printed, and that the committee have leave to sit during the sittings of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the printing of an extra number of the message and documents. He said it gave him special pleasure, in this instance, that his peculiar position on the floor was such as left him at liberty freely to censure any acts of the Administration which appeared to him to deserve censure, and as freely to praise where its acts merited commendation. There was one point at which all party feeling ceased. Whenever our Government was engaged in any controversy with another Government, he cast to the winds, he trampled beneath his feet, every consideration but that it was our own Government. In this case, he could commend the Administration most justly. He thought that its whole course in regard to this matter was wise, just, patriotic, and honorable. None could take more pleasure in saying this than he did.

As to the question of right, he should degrade himself by discussing it. The House had unanimously voted that our right to the country in question was clear and indisputable. On the point of right, we had already passed the Rubicon. We must stand by our determination, and never give it up unless for a just equivalent. The point of honor must be maintained at all hazards, as it always has been: What was the condition we were now thrown into? The soil was ours; and though there was not any State in the Union (judging from what he knew of her) that he would not rather couch a lance with than this very State of Maine, yet she was not to be left to fight her own battles; we must see the adversary off her soil; then we should settle our own disputes. A more frivolous pretense of right never was set up than that of Great Britain to this land. It all amounted to this: she wanted a right of way through a part of our territory, because it would be a great convenience to her in uniting her provinces. There was a tone and temper in that letter of Sir John Harvey which, he confessed, raised his feelings as an American. To talk to us and say, "go out, or I will soon bring a force that will put you out!" Mr. T., if he was going out, would stop on hearing such language. If he had taken his leave and made his bow in a gentleman's house, he had no idea of being kicked out of the front door. Mr. T. was acting under no excitement, however. He had long expected that this thing would come. The honorable and venerable gentleman before him [Mr. ADAMS] had believed the same. Yet none could more regret the necessity for hostilities than he should. He came from the portion of the Union where the storm would spend its fiercest and greatest fury. The country might expect an instant seizure of Cuba, or an alliance with Texas. There was no knowing when such a contest, once begun, would stop. But stop or begin when and where it might, our rights must be maintained. Never could we think of giving up any the least portion of our soil under belligerent threats from any quarter. He exhorted gentlemen to devote themselves to this question. It was most vitally important; it could scarce be, but blood had already been shed; the chances of actual collision seemed to be as twenty to one; there remained but part of one week in which to act. He trusted, if a war must come, that the spirit of the country would not be crushed by a state of utter unpreparedness to meet the contest.

Mr. PEARCE did not rise to speculate about war, the seizure of Cuba, or anything of the kind. The subject should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who, he did not doubt, would examine it with that calmness which its importance demanded. He had risen to repel the assertion of the gentleman from South Carolina, that his peculiar position was so felicitous as to afford him alone, of all the House, the opportunity freely to censure or freely to applaud the Administration, as its acts might deserve.

Mr. THOMPSON said the gentleman was wholly mistaken. He had used no such language, nor thrown out any such idea.

Mr. PEARCE said the gentleman had certainly spoken of his peculiar position, and of its affording the opportunity freely to censure or to praise.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have already said that I did not. If the gentleman chooses so to understand me, he may. It was a gross misunderstanding of my language.

Mr. PEARCE again referred to Mr. T.'s language, and said his own impression was strengthened by that of every one around him; but if the gentleman disclaimed the sentiment, Mr. P. had nothing more to say.

Mr. EVANS said the momentous importance of the matters communicated in the message and papers which had been just read, must be his apology for asking the attention of the House, for a few moments only, although he was aware of the vast amount of public business yet to be transacted, and of the shortness of the time which remained to perform it. The peculiar and responsible position in which the State he and his colleagues represented here was placed by the proceedings now officially made known to Congress, seemed to him imperiously to require that the course she had pursued and the ground she had occupied should be distinctly and clearly understood. He was aware that, in some quarters, and among a portion of the public journals, it was thought Maine had been too precipitate, and had proceeded with a degree of rashness which the circumstances of the case did not call for. He desired to place her conduct in this respect right in the eyes of the House and of the country.

Many things are contained in the message which I rejoice to hear; which I have not heard before for many years, and which I heartily commend; yet I cannot forbear to say that the leading sentiment which the reading of these papers impresses upon my mind is, that the President does not fully appreciate the exigency of the occasion. He underrates the emergency, the critical condition, the imminent danger of our pacific relations with Great Britain. He seems to think it does not admit of "doubt" that such representations may be made to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and to the Governor of Maine, by the united counsels of the British Minister and himself, as will at once dispel all apprehensions and lead to most peaceable results.

Mr. E. feared it was altogether too late to indulge such anticipations. If collision had not actually taken place before this time, it was scarcely possible it could be prevented many days longer. Had the House attentively listened to the reading of the documents? Had gentlemen weighed the contents of the communications which had passed between Governor Fairfield and Sir John Harvey? Had they considered the proclamation issued by the latter? If so, they will perceive that both parties declare, in the most absolute and unqualified terms, their determination, on the one hand, to expel the American forces by arms and with the bayonet from their position on the Aroostook, and, on the other, to maintain it at every extremity, and at all hazards. Sir John is committed in the face of the world, and, as he says, bound by the most explicit orders from his Government to carry this determination into execution; and Governor Fairfield says, if Maine falters now in maintaining her possessions against any force which she can successfully resist, no language can speak the depth of her ignominy and disgrace. Such is the position, deliberately taken on both sides, of the respective Governors of the Territories now in arms against each other. And what is the feeling of the people; of the people on both sides of the line? We learn, as well from the proclamation of Sir John Harvey as through other channels, that upon the first receipt of intelligence in the Provinces of the movements of the authorities of Maine in arresting the trespassers upon the territory, they flew to arms to defend them. Notwithstanding their entire confidence in the zeal, readiness, and ability of Sir John Harvey, to maintain what they denominate their rights, they would not wait for orders. They broke open lawlessly the public arsenals at Woodstock, armed themselves, and rushed to the field, with the avowed purpose of driving the civil authorities of Maine from the territory they occupied.

Sir, we all know that the feeling of the Province is highly exasperated against us; it has long been so. Such is the state of things on the British side of the line. How is it on ours? The Legislature of the State, with entire unanimity, sustains the determinations of the Governor. Public opinion sustains them also. Troops are flocking by thousands to the conflict, determined to stand for the rights of their State; and stand they will, depend upon that, sir. All unprepared as she was for such a conflict, Maine has now put her armor on, and she will not be recreant to her cause. Now, sir, in such a state of things, what ground is there for indulging so confident an expectation as the message expresses, that any representations which can be made will arrest collision, and that by arms? I repeat, I do greatly fear the President vastly underrates the critical condition of our affairs. I fear he does not appreciate the peril that awaits our peaceful relations. On what ground does he expect to avert the impending collision? On what he very rightly termed the "long forbearance" of Maine hitherto. And on this ground he presumes that she will forbear yet longer. But no, Maine forbears no more. Her rights—her rights: these she demands; these she will have.

Mr. E. was surprised, but gratified, on hearing the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] vent his indignation against the use of such language as had been employed by the British Governor; surprised, because it seemed to be new to him; gratified, that he was prepared to resist it. At the last session, Mr. E. had urged and entreated action on the part of Congress in this matter, and on that occasion he had read this very language, and had stated that it had been used toward the State by Sir John Harvey and Sir Archibald Campbell, also, years ago. In 1837 he used language yet stronger. It was sent here, but it passed unheeded. When Maine had claimed as a right; had urged, had entreated, nay, had almost begged, that Congress would consider and act on this state of things, it had been in vain. Sir John Harvey had told the Governor, in 1837, that he had peremptory and positive orders from his Government to maintain possession of the disputed territory at all hazards; that he should do it; and if all the power of the British arms in America was necessary to that purpose, it would be placed at his command. He had told the House, at the last session, and a Senator from Maine had stated the same in the other House, and this had been repeatedly communicated to the President, and, moreover, we most expressly told you, that unless the bill then pending, which provided for the running of the boundary line, should pass, this very identical result which had now taken place would inevitably happen. It had happened. And now gentlemen seem to be aware of it for the first time! He had told the House over and over that it would happen; that the only way to preserve peace was to pass the bill he introduced last year, but he had spoken to unwilling ears and almost to vacant seats. Nobody would listen to his remonstrances. Now these very things had come upon the country; and now the President said that the past long-suffering exhibited by Maine induced him to believe that she would yet forbear, and that the whole affair would be easily adjusted. Mr. E. begged the House to examine the facts calmly, and then to tell him how much more she was to put up with; how much longer she was to be patient and unresisting under repeated and aggravated wrongs. It was proper that the views of the State should be known as to the imminency of the danger, as a guide by which the Executive might be aided in his anticipations and decisions.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Evans.

There were in the documents accompanying the message some things Mr. E. was delighted to see. The Secretary of State has now told the British Minister that the ground that he, as well as the Governor of New Brunswick, proceeded upon was altogether untenable; and that was, the assumption of a subsisting agreement to permit the territory to remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. He assures him no such agreement or understanding ever existed. Mr. E. rejoiced that the hour had at length come when the Government spoke out on this subject. He took it to be true. The delusion is dispelled. I hold the Government to this declaration, now and hereafter. But Mr. E. said he was sorry that any ground whatever for such an assumption had been given in the past negotiations. One of the grounds of his complaint last year against the Government had been the tacit submitting to such a claim without instantly repelling it. The claim had been advanced and advanced again, in all the communications from the British Government. Maine always denied it; she had called upon the Government to deny it; but her call had never been answered; her complaints and remonstrances had been unheeded till this very hour.

And what had been done by the British authorities under this pretended agreement? Of all the many arrogant acts which had been founded upon it, he would produce but one, and he adduced it in proof of how far the State had been humbled and brought down by this groundless assumption.

In 1831, the Legislature of Maine had incorporated a town within this territory now in dispute; all the forms of law had been observed, and when our own citizens, under the warrant of that law, proceeded to exercise their functions in relation to the town thus created by their own State Government, they had been arrested and incarcerated in the jails of New Brunswick. And when Maine, under these degrading circumstances, had appealed to the President, and when all the proceedings were shown to have been perfectly regular, and the demand was made that the General Government should protect the State and her citizens, what had been done? The President had replied that the case would call for very different action if the first departure from the understanding between the two Governments had not proceeded from the persons who had been arrested. Maine had then asserted her right to proceed in the exercise of her own sovereignty, as she herself saw fit. Yet the General Government never had so much as demanded the release of the men thus seized and imprisoned; and an unhappy phrase, then employed inadvertently by the Executive of Maine, had given occasion to the President to yield to some extent to the assumptions of Great Britain. The Governor of Maine had said that what had happened had taken place "unexpectedly" to him, and thereupon the President had turned round and disavowed the proceedings of the State, as the acts of rash and inconsiderate individuals; stating also that Maine herself disavowed them; and he thereupon requested as a favor, the release of the men by the British authorities. Great Britain had instantly seized upon the idea thus put forward and had forthwith granted a formal pardon to these American citizens for the offense they had committed against his Majesty's authority; and the President had returned his thanks to the British Government for the readiness with which this condescending favor had been accorded! Now, thank God, however, the President of the United States held language more becoming his station; he now tells the House that it belongs to Maine herself, and to her only, to judge of the exigency of the case calling for her interference. She is to be the judge of her own policy and course of action, and we shall have no more disavowals. That was the doctrine now. Mr. E. rejoiced to hear it. He was glad that the idea of an informal arrangement and understanding that Great Britain was to have exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory was repudiated and utterly denied. Let it never be heard of hereafter.

A brief description should be given of the state and history of the existing controversy—I do not mean the boundary controversy, but of the present collision—that the whole matter might be rightly understood. This he would now endeavor to present to the House.

It was known, he presumed, to all, that the territory in dispute was situated in the extreme northeastern corner of the State of Maine, and that it lay on both sides of the river St. John, which, running in a southeasterly course, divides the territory into two portions; that lying on the northeastern bank of the stream being about two fifths, and that on the southwestern side being about three fifths of the whole. The entire tract contained about six million acres. It was quite true that on the northern side of the St. Johns there existed a settlement on the Madawaska river, (a tributary of the St. Johns,) within which Great Britain had, at various times, in some degree, exercised authority and jurisdiction, practically; but the right of jurisdiction, even there, had always been strongly contested by Maine. It should be understood that the whole territory in question lay remote from the densely-settled portion of the State, two hundred miles away in the wilderness, on the Madawaska; therefore Great Britain has been permitted to continue in possession, though her right was constantly and formally denied by that State. There was, as he had said, another large district of the territory which lay south of the St. Johns, upon another of its tributary streams, called the Aroostook; and it was the valley of this stream which was the theater of the present disturbance. This portion of the territory lay nearer to the settled part of the State than the Madawaska settlement. As to the question of jurisdiction in this Aroostook settlement, the authority of Maine and of Massachusetts had both been exerted there for a long period. The movement of Maine at this time to expel intruders and exert authority was no new movement. She has taken no fresh authority in her hands. As many as thirty years ago, Massachusetts had caused surveys to be made of certain portions of this territory, divided it into townships, made grants to individuals, and others to corporations, and the grantees had entered on possession, and held it without any disturbance or interruption from the British authorities.

When the claim of jurisdiction was first put forth by Great Britain, it had been done in a very modest way. It was only that both parties should abstain from exercising any jurisdiction within the territory. That was the first step. Then came the next advance; which was a proposition that neither party should "extend" its jurisdiction over the territory. This was not very alarming, though Maine resisted such curtailment of her rights. In a few years the claim took a new form: neither party was to extend its jurisdiction. Oh, no! But what was the jurisdiction at present exercised? Then it was that Great Britain put forth the monstrous pretension that her jurisdiction extended over the whole territory and every part of it; a pretension for which she advanced the most extraordinary argument. The misfortune had been that our own Government did not at once repudiate this claim the moment it was set up. True, they did not assent to it; but they did not rebuke and refute it with the sternness and explicitness the occasion demanded; and thus new demands, new interpretations, were put forth from year to year, and new extensions of jurisdiction by the provincial authority. One evidence of this Mr. E. had commented upon last session, and which he was afraid had not yet been sufficiently reprobated by the Executive. As long ago as 1832 or 1833 the British had appointed an officer with the title of warden of this territory; and in communicating to the British Minister here certain complaints made by this warden against the operations of Maine and Massachusetts, he said that the warden had been appointed with the knowledge and concurrence of the President of the United States, and that it was a most remarkable thing that he should have been interfered with in the exercise of his authority, when he was acting in obedience to the wishes, and he might almost say the instructions, of both Governments.

Mr. E. had said that Massachusetts had made grants within the Aroostook territory thirty years ago. Other grants have been made by the State of Maine since the separation from Massachusetts, and sales have been made of timber. Trespassers have been expelled, and the timber seized and sold by Maine; and no attempt has been made to interfere with this exercise of authority until very lately, and none whatever to prevent it by force. The British authorities have scarcely ever interfered there. In 1828 or 1829, a British peace officer had attempted to serve on an American citizen within that territory civil process, issued by the courts of New Brunswick. The consequence was, that fifteen or twenty of the settlers got together and drove the officer out of the territory, and the process was abandoned. The settlers considered themselves on American soil, and successfully, then, resisted the assumption of authority over them. No attempt was made to punish this act.

And what was Maine doing now? She was making grants in this very territory. Within two or three years past she has constructed a road extending some miles into the territory; and it was at the termination of that road where the forces of the State were now stationed. The British Government had, indeed, remonstrated against these acts, but rather feebly; the remonstrance, in fact, was more like a protest that this should not be construed into an admission by them of our right of jurisdiction, than like an assertion of her own right.

Mr. E. said he would answer an inquiry just propounded to him by a gentleman near, [Mr. POTTER.] A portion of the disputed territory belonged to the State of Maine; a portion of it to the State of Massachusetts, and the remainder to the two States jointly.
